Samnium, and many rich and mighty Nations confederate with the Romans, were on their backs to furnish them with store of victuals. And Annibal contrary-ways was like to take up his wintering place, within the crags and rocks of Ferula, amid the Sands of Luturnum, and the mossy standing pools. Well wist Annibal now that he was laid out hardly, by the same cunning sleights, that he had used himself. And therefore when as he could not escape away by Capitulum, and seeing that he must needs to the Mountains; and passe over the top of Gallia, for fear lest that the Romans should set upon his army enclosed in the valleys between the Mountains, he devised a stratagem, by way of a ridiculous illusion, to beguile the eye-sight of his enemies, and to frustrate and deceive them of their expectation: by means whereof, he purposed in the beginning of the night, boldly and by stealth to gain the Mountains. The manner of his crafty device was this. He caused to be gathered out of all the villages thereby many fire-brands then took he certain bayons or small fagots of birch-wood, dry sticks, and such like trash, and tyed them fast to the horns of the Oxen, whereof he had tame and wild, a great number that he drove before him amongst other prizes gotten out of the country: so as he might make wel-near two thousand head. To Asdrubal he gave in charge, that so soon as it grew to be dark night; he should drive those Oxen with their horns set a fire toward the Mountains, and especially if he possi he could, to the very streights and gullet which the enemy kept. It began no sooner to be dark, but Annibal with great silence dislodged and removed his camp, and the Oxen aforesaid were driven a good way before the ensigns and the army. When they were come to the foot of the Mountains, and to the Crightest passages, immediately the signal or watch-word was given to fire the Oxen horns, and to chase them up against the Hill. The beasts, what with fear to see a light fire blazing over their heads, and what with pain to feel the heat now come to the quick flesh and the roots of their horns, fell tumbling up and down, as if they had been mad. By this their gadding thus all at once every way, all the coppies and springs thereabout were set on a light fire, and seemed as if the whole woods and hills had burnt withal: the shaking of their heads also to and fro without stay, made the blaze greater, and gave shew and semblance of men running from one place to another. They who were appointed and set to keep the passages of the streights, so soon as they saw certain fires upon the tops of the Hills, and over their heads, supposing themselves to be entrapped and enclosed with fire on every side, abandoned their hold, and kept their standing no longer: And whereas the flame shone most out, thinking that to be the safest way, they sped them thither, then to the top and ridge of the Mountains. Then and there, they light upon certain of the Oxen wandering astray from their company, and at first seeing them a far off, but not well discerning them, they imagined that they spit fire, and breathed their blazing flames out of their mouths: and wondering at the strange sight, stood still amazed and astonished. But when as afterwards they discovered the device, and found it out to be a subtle and deceitful invention, proceeding from mans brain, they mistrusted withal some secret trains and ambush, and with an exceeding noise fled away as fast as ever they could, and stumbled upon the vantage-grounds of their enemies, that were lightly armed. But they were afraid as well of the one side as the other, to begin any skirmish in the night season, and layed until day light. In the mean while, Annibal E having conducted his whole army through the streights, and killed some of his enemies in the very pale, encamped himself in the territory of Alifan. Fabius deservied this tumult well enough, doubting some privy ambush, and abhorring utterly all night battles, kept his men within the strength of their rampiers. At the break of day there began a skirmish on the side of the hills in which the Romans as being far more in number, had environed on every side the light-armed fouldiers of the enemies, and soon defeated them: but that a band of Spaniards, sent back of purpose from Annibal, came to rescue them: who being better acquainted with the Mountains, and more light and nimble in running among the crags and cliffs, by reason of well of the agility of body, as the fashion of their light harness; easily in that kind of skirmish, avoided and shifted from their enemy, heavily armed at all pieces, and used to fight upon the plain, and to stand firmly and keep their ground. Whereupon in the end they parted asunder one from the other, but nothing near on even hand: for the Spaniards in a manner all, went clear away unhurt, the Romans lost some of their men; and so on both parts they returned to their camps. Fabius likewise removed, and having halloed over the streights of the forest, encamped in an high ground, and strongly situate even over Alifan. Then Annibal making as though he would march through Samnium toward Rome, returned back, waiting and spoiling the country as far as to the Peligni. And Fabius hovered still upon the Hill tops between the army of his enemies and the City of Rome; leading his host so, as neither he departed far, nor yet encountered and affronted his enemy. Then Annibal turned his way, and departed from the Peligni, and retired himself into Apulia, until he was come as far as Grius, a City abandoned and forsorn of the inhabitants, by reason that a part of their wall was fallen down, decayed and ruined. The Dictator fortified his camp in the territory of Luturnum. Now was he sent for home from thence to Rome, by occasion of certain solemn sacrifices: whereupon, he conferred and dealt with the General of the Cavalry, not only by way of absolute commandment, but also with advice and persuasions, yea, and as one would say, by prayer and intreaty: "That he would trust more upon confederate counsel, than doubtful fortune; and be directed and guided rather by him, than follow the steps of Samnium and Flaminium; and not think there was nothing done and effected, and make no reckoning of this; That the enemy had been and extolled the valour of the enemy; or rehearsed & reckoned up the losses and spoils received forth two years space, through the rashness and unskilfulness of the Commanders: and said withall, that the General of the horsemen was to answer and give account for fighting against his edict and express commandment. Moreover, (quoth he) I was in place of sovereignty and government, & to do all according as I thought good. I would effect and bring to pass, within few daies, that men should know that a good warrior was to make small reckning of fortune but without win, & counsel were to guide and direct all. And for mine own part, I deem it a great honour & glory to have preserved an army in a time of trouble and danger from shame and ignominy, than to have slain many thousands of enemies. After he had made these and such like speeches & reasons in vain and created for Col. M. Autilius Regulus: for that he would not be present to debate the question concerning the right and authority of his own government, he departed by night stealth toward the army: even the very day before that the foresaid law should be propounded. The morning came, and the commons were assembled to an audience: wherein he seemed rather secretly in their hearts to malice the Dictator, & to affect and favour the General of the horsemen, than durst come forth and be seen to perswade and set forward that which pleased them all in common. And notwithstanding the bill was exceedingly well liked of yet there wanted one to give credit and authority therunto. At length, one stepped forth to set it on foot, namely, C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Prator, a man not only of oblique degree by calling, but also of vile & base parentage descended. His father was (as they say) a Butcher, who kept sheep and sold meat himself, and trained up his son as his apprentice in the same mechanic and servile occupation. This Varro being a young man, and well left by his father (who was grown rich, and gained greatly by his trade) gave his mind and conceived some hope to live more gentlemanlike, and took a great liking to the common place, and pleading at the bar: exercising himself in entertaining causes of base persons, against the estate and name of honest Citizens and of good reputation: by means whereof he grew to be known among the people, and afterwards was advanced to place of worship and honour. And having been Treasurer of the City, and born both Adulteries, as well that of the Chair. As the other of the Commissions: and at length gone through one Pratorship, he aspired now higher, in hope to be Consul: and full craftily waited his time, and sought to wind himself within the favor of the people, by means of the ill opinion and hard conceit they had of the Dictator: & thus he alone went away with all the affectionate love of the Commons. All men that were either at Rome, or in the Army, both good and bad, in general (excepting the Dictator himself) received and admitted that bill as made to his disgrace and shameful reproach. But he with the very same gravity and countenance of heart, endured these injurious courtes & dealing of the people raging against him, wherewith he had born his adversaries standing & charging him before the multitude: and having received in the way as he journeyed, letters importing the decree of the Senat for dividing his authority equally with the General of the horsemen, and being assured that notwithstanding his commission were parted and communicated with another, yet his skill and sufficiency of conduct and command, remained still with himself with a mind invincible as well against Citizens as enemies, he returned to the army. But Minutius, who before that time was hardly to be endured, both for his fortunate success, and also for the favour of the Commons: now verily beyond all measure and bounds of modesty, vaunted and gloried in that had conquered & got the mastery over Fabius as well as over Annibal: That Fabius (say) who in time of distress and calamity, was the only warrior and Captain that could be found out to match Annibal: that the superior Magistrat was by the consent & approbation of the people, (a thing never to be found in any record of Chronicles) made but even equal with the inferior to wit, the Dictator with the General of horsemen: and in that City, wherein the Commanders of the Cavalry were wont to quake and tremble at the rods and axes of the Dictator, so conspicuous and evident in theories of the world, was his felicity and prowess above all others. And therefore minded was he to follow his own fortune, and to take his time in case the Dictator still continued ingringling in sloth and idleness, condemned in the judgment both of God and Man. Wherupon the very first day that he & Fabius were met together, he said that they were above all things to determine & set down in what sort they might order this their equal authority of government. He for his part thought it best, that each other day (or if longer time between were supposed better) they should one after the other alternatively have the full and whole command of all for the time in their several turns: that if any occasion of fighting a battell were presented, they might be able to countervail the enemy, not only in counsel, but also in power and strength. Q. Fabius liked not of this: supposing that whatsoever lay in the hands and disposition of his rash colleague must needs be subject unto the arbitrement of Fortune: saying moreover unto him, That he was indeed to impart unto him government and rule, but not wholly to depart thereof, and shut himself out. And therefore he would never willingly fail, but (to his power) to manage by counsel and discretion one part or other: neither would he divide with him either time or daies, but the forces and armies: that Minutius might have one moeyty, and himself another: & since he might not preserve all by his own counsel & policy, yet he would endeavour (so far as he could) to save somewhat. And so much he prevailed, that they parted the Legions between them, as the manner of the Consuls was. The fifth and fourth fell to Minutius, the second and third to Fabius. In like manner they divided the horsemen number for number, and the auxiliary souldiers of Allies and Latines. The General of the horsemen would needs likewise that they should be encamped alunder.

Annibal

Annibal conceived hereupon a two-fold joy, (for he was not ignorant of all that was done among the enemies, partly by intelligence given him from thence by fugitives, and partly by means of his own scouts and spies) for he made this reckoning, both that he should deal well enough with the lavish rashness of Minutius, and handle him in his kind; and also that the prudent policy of Fabius was abridged and diminished by the one half. Now there was a little hill between the Camp of Minutius and the Carthaginians: and no doubt there was, but that he who could gain it aforehand should have the vantage of the enemy, in regard of the ground. That hill Annibal was not so desirous to get without skirmish, (& yet it had been a matter of good importance) as willing thereby to give some occasion of fighting and scuffling with Minutius, whom he witt very well to be always forward enough to encounter him and make resistance. The plain all between, seemed at the first fight nothing commodious nor good for men that would lay an ambushment, because it was neither over-grown with any weeds, nor yet in any part roughly over-spread and covered so much as with briars and brambles. But in very deed, the ground was naturally made for to cover and hide an Ambuscado: and the rather, because in so naked and bare a valley none would have imagined and suspected any deceitful trains, and lurching of wait. And yet there were in divers nooks and corners thereof certain hollow rocks and caves, and some of them of sufficient capacity to receive 200 armed men. In these lurking holes there were belovewed 5000 of horsemen and footmen one with another, some in one place, some in another, according as they might commodiously lie there closely hidden. And yet, lest the stirring of any one that might chance to go forth unadvisedly, or the glittering of armour, should bewray the trains in so open a valley, Annibal by sending out at the break of day some few for to seize the afore said hill, withdrew the eyes of his enemies another way. Thence at the first view were deprived of the Romans for their small number, and every man was desirous to be doing with them, and their fingers itched for to set the enemies back, and drive them from thence. The General himself Minutius, as fool-hardy and forward as he that was most, sounded the alarm, and commanded to go to the winning of the place, braving and threatening of the enemies full vainly. First, he lent forth his light armed men to skirmish, but afterwards, the Cornets of horsemen, set close and jointly together in array: and at the last, seeing the enemies seconded with new succours and supplies, he advanced forward himself with his Legions in order of battell. And Annibal, wherefore he perceived his men to be distressed, made out continual fresh aides one after another, both of horse and foot, ever as the fight increased and grew hotter: so as now he had his full army in field, and they maintained battell on both sides with all their power and main forces. First, the light armed Romans, notwithstanding the disadvantage of the ground, desirous to get up against the hill, (possessed aforehand of the enemy) were put back, and beaten down again: in much, as in their retire, they put the horsemen in fear that followed hard upon them, and fled for refuge to the Ensigns of the Infantry. The main battell of the Legionary footmen, among all the rest that were affrighted, only remained without fear, undaunted: and seemed in a plain, level, and downright field without ambush, likely enough to have held their own, and in no respect to have been over-matched: so courageous they were, and had taken such heart upon their late victory, some few daies before. But the enemies starting suddenly out of their Ambuscadoes, so troubled, disordered, and terrified them, flanking them on both sides, and charging withall behind, that neither their heart served any of them to fight, nor their hope remained to fly and escape away. Then Fabius hearing the first cry, and knowing thereby that they were in great fear, and seeing besides a far off their battell disordered and in dismay, (I thought even as much (quoth he) and no sooner than I feared, it is fallen out) he sent forth some few, with such over-rough fool-hardiness and taken it tardy. The man, forsooth, that most needs be made equal with Fabius in government, seeth by this time, that Annibal is his good Master, & his benefactor by odds in prowess and fortune: but we shall find out some other time to chide and to angry. Come on now, forth with your standards and ensigns, let us wrest from our enemies hands the victory, and wring from our Citizens mouths confession of their error and trespass. Now when some of them were slain, and others looked about which way to make escape and flee: Fabius with his forces shewed himself as sent down from heaven to relieve them. And before he came to lance one javelin, or began to joyn battell and fight one stroke, he not only flaid his fellows from running away, but also his enemies from further heat of fight. As many of the Romans as were disbanded and scattered asunder all abroad, repaired again speedily from all parts, and talked themselves to the entire battell: the rest who by whole troops had turned their backs, made head again upon the enemy: and one while giving ground and retiring by little and little, another while standing in a ring and round together steadfast, kept this order of turns: so as now, both they that were discomfited, and those that were unmoiled became reduced into one body. G of a battell, and advanced their ensigns against the enemy. By which time Annibal sounded the retreat, and openly confessed and said, that as he had vanquished Minutius, so he was foiled and overcome of Fabius. Thus when the more part of the day was spent with variable fortune, and all retired again to their Camps, Minutius called together his souldiers, and spake unto them after this manner: I have oftentimes heard it spoken (my good souldiers) that he is the best man that will be ruled and directed by sage advice & counsel: but he that neither hath the skill to advise, nor the grace to be advised by another, is simply of the worst nature, & good for nothing.

"Since that we therefore are not so happy as to attain unto the highest degree of wit, and perfection of nature, let us content our selves with the second place, and keep a mean between: and whilst we learn to rule, let us settle our selves and resolve to obey him that is wiser than our selves. Let us joy in Camp with Fabius, and when we have preferred our selves and our ensignes before his pavilion and tribunal, see that when I salute him by the name of Father (as is becoming his excellency and majesty, and the benefit by us of him received) that ye also call those souldiers your Patrons, whose valiant hands and trusty arms erewhile protected you: that this day may give us yet, if nothing else, the honour and name of thankful persons. Having thus said, he gave commandment to pack up bag and baggage, and to dislodge: and as they marched in good array toward the Camp of the Dictator, they struck both him and also all about him into a wonder and admiration. And having pitched their ensignes before the Tribunal: then Minimus the General of the horse went forth before the rest: and after he had greeted Fabius himself as his Father, and the whole Army likewise saluted those about Fabius, by the name of Patrons: "To my parents (quoth he) O Dictator, unto whom I have made you equal in name only (as much as my tongue will give leave) I am bound and beholden for my own life only and no more: but to you I am indebted for saving both my life, and all these here. The Act therefore and ordinance of the Commons which hath been a clog and burden to me rather than an honour, here of my self I renounce, revoke, and abolish: and (that which I pray God may prove to the good both of you and me, of mine army and yours as well that which is preserved, as that which is the protection) I submit and surrender again my self under your command and government, together with these ensignes and legions thereto belonging: beseeching you to pardon me, and to entertain me in the room of the General of the Cavalry, and thole here with me, every man in his former place. Then interchangeably they gave their hands one to another: and the souldiers (after the assembly dismissed) were courteously invited, and friendly entertained, as well by them that were unknown unto them, as of their acquaintance, and so the day, dolorous, heavy, and almost dismal and accursed, turned to be joyful and festival.

So soon as tidings came to Rome of their occurrences, and the same confirmed as well by the letters of the Generals themselves, as also by the common voice of souldiers from both Armies, every man, the best he could, praised and extolled Maximus up to the sky: whose honour and reputation was as great in the opinion of Annibal and the Carthaginians, for then and never before, they found, that they had to deal and war in Italy, and with Romans. As for the two years past before, they set to fight both by Roman Captains and souldiers, that they could be hardly persuaded, that they warred with that Nation, whereof there went to great a fame, and of whom their forefathers had reported such wonders and terrible things. They say also, that Annibal as he returned out of the field, gave out these words, "That the cloud which hid on the hill tops, hovered so long in the wind that it proved a tempestuous storm in the end."

Whiles these things were doing in Italy, Cn. Servilius Geminus the Consul, having sailed about the coasts of Sardinia and Corfica with his fleet, and received hostages both of the one Isle and the other, passed over into Africk: and before that he landed in the continent and firm land, he waited the Island Meninx, and having received ^{ten} talents of silver of the inhabitants thereof, for fear lest their Territory also should be consumed with fire, and spoiled as well as the rest: he came to Africk, and there let his forces ashore. From thence he led his souldiers and mariners likewise, one with another, disbanded and out of order, as if they were to rob and spoil some desert Islands, unpeopled and void of Inhabitants. Whereupon they felt unadvisedly into an ambush, and being unskillful of the country, and therewith but few and scattered, they were soon enclosed among many, and with much slaughter and shameful flight were driven and beaten back to their ships. The fleet thus having lost a thousand men, and one Treasurer of the Army among them, called Sempronius Blaesus, looted in great haste from the shore (which now was overcast by enemies) and held their course for Sicily, and at Lilybaeum was let over and delivered to T. Gracilius the Praetor, so to be brought back again to Rome, by P. Sura his Lieutenant. Cn. Servilius himself journeyed through Sicily by land, and crossed the narrow seas into Italy: for both he and his Colleague M. Atilius were sent for by the letters of Fabius, to receive the Army at his hands, now that his six-months-foreign government was well near expired. All the Annals in a manner do record, that Fabius was the man, who during his Dictatorship, fought and waged war with Annibal. Cassius writeth also, that he was created Dictator by the people. But both Cassius and the rest, either knew not, or else forgot, that the Consul Servilius, who then was far from Rome, and in the Province of France, had the lawful right and authority only to nominate a Dictator: and because the City so affrighted, by reason of that notable overthrow could not stay so long, they were driven to this shift, That there should be created by the people a Pro-Dictator or Dictator his Deputy. But the noble acts and glorious renown of that General, together with the title of his Image, which might recommend his house more honourable to posterity, gained easily this point, and caused the Pro-Dictator to be created Dictator, and so called.

The Consuls, M. Atilius Regulus, and Cn. Servilius Geminus, having received the army (as is before said) fortified in good time the places for wintering harbour (for it was then the Autumn season) conducted and managed the wars together in great concord, and followed the same politic course that Fabius had done before them. For as Annibal made rode at any time to purvey corn, they would meet him just at every turn, in sundry places, and either cut off the trail of his

A men, or intercept and catch them as they went scattering, but never hazard all in one set field: is the only thing that the enemy shot at, by all the means he could devise. And so near driven to Annibal, and to those terms of want and scarcity, that but for very shame (left by his dislodging and departure he might be thought to flee) he would have retired back into Gallia, as being out of all hope to maintain and sustain his Army with victuals in those parts, in case the new Consuls who next succeeded, should hold on still the same policy and manner of warfare. Whither now approached, and all the war that was continued and rested about Gervion: at what time there arrived at Rome Embassadors from Niples, who brought with them, and presented into the Council-House, forty massive boles of beaten gold: and withall delivered this speech, and said, "That they knew full well, how the Treasure of the people of Rome was waited and continued by long wars. And forasmuch as the said wars were maintained, as well for the defence of the Cities and Lands of allies, as for Rome, the very head, mother City, and principal Citadel (as it were) of all Italy, and for the sovereign dominion and Empire thereof: the Neapolitans thought it meet and reason, that what store of gold their ancestors had left unto them, were it for to adorn and deck themselves, or to relieve them in time of need and necessity, with it they were to aid and help the people of Rome in their adversity. And if they could have brought themselves of any other means besides, wherein they might lead and befieid them they would as willingly and frankly have made presentment thereof: saying, moreover, that the Senators of Rome should do them an high pleasure, if they would make account of all that the men of Naples had, as their own; and judge them worthy, at whose hands they would vouchsafe to accept a present, much greater, and more precious in regard of the mind and affection of the givers than the substance and value of the thing. The Embassadors were highly thanked, as well for their liberality and munificence, as for the care they had of them: and that boil was only received which weighed least.

About the same time, a Carthaginian spy, who for two years space had walked unknown and unsuspected, was detected and apprehended now at Rome: and after his hands were cut off, was suffered to depart. Five and twenty slaves were crucified for a conspiracy conceived in Campus Martius. The informer was made free, and had ²⁰⁰⁰ pound of brass bullion given him for a reward. There were also sent Embassadors to Philip King of the Macedonians, to demand again Demetrius Pharius, who having been vanquished in plain field, was fled unto him. Others likewise were dispatched to the Liguans, as well to expostulate with them and complain, that they had succoured Annibal with men, money, and other munition: as also toarken and learn (seeing they were so near) what the Boians and Infubrians did or went about. Besides, a third Embassage was addressed as far as to Illyricum, unto King Pneus, to enquire and call for the Tribute, whereof the term was expired and past: and if he were minded to take a longer day, than to receive hostages and pledges of him for security. See how careful the Romans were, and what a provident eye they had, notwithstanding the great way which lay heavily upon their necks and shoulders, to their other affairs: inasmuch as no one thing in the world, how distant and remote soever, was by them neglected. But as concerning religion, and Church matters, they made some scruple of conscience, that the Temple of Concord (which L. Marcus, L. Deputy in Gallia, had vowed two years before in time of a sedition and mutiny of souldiers) was not as yet set out to workmen for to be built or edified accordingly. And therefore two Dummies were for that purpose created by Emilius the Praetor, or L. Governour of the City, namely, Cn. Pupius, and Cassius Quintus Flaminius: who gave order, that the Temple should be built upon the Capitol hill. The same Praetor, by virtue of a decree of the Senate, sent his letters unto the Consuls, importing thus much, That if they thought good, one of them should repair to Rome for the creation of new Consuls; and that himself would summon the Parliament against that day which it should please them to appoint. The Consuls wrote back again according to the prebibles, that they might not depart far from the enemy without damage of State: advising them to hold an assembly for the Election aforesaid, by authority of an interregent, rather than that one of the Consuls should be called away from the wars. But the LL. of the Senate thought it better to have a Dictator chosen by one of the Consuls, for the holding of that high Court of Parliament. So L. Veturius Philo, was nominated Dictator, and he chose for General of the Horsemen M. Pomponius Mauro. But their men being not duly and lawfully created, were commanded at the forthnights end to give over their places, and then the matter grew to an Interregent. The Consuls had their Commission, for government and conduct of the Army, continued and confirmed for one year longer. The Senators named for Interregents, first Cn. Claudius Cento, the son of Appius: and after him, P. Cornelius Africa. During the whole Interregent, the Parliament was holden, with much contention and debate between the Nobles and the Commons. The vulgar people endeavoured to advance unto the Consulship C. Terentius Varro, a man of their own coat and condition, one crept into good liking and favour with the common sort by opposing himself and contesting against great personages, and by other popular practices and courses that he used to win grace among the people: as namely, by abasing the greatness of Fabius, and the Majesty of the Dictatorship: for nothing was there else, in him, to commend him to the world, but a malicious mind to bring others into disgrace. The Nobles withstood the Commons all they could, to prevent this mischief: That men should not take a custom to be their equals, by means of inveighing and making head against them. Bibulus Herennius a Tribune of the Commons,

 Augurs, in that they forbade the Dictator to finish and go through with the election: and so by drawing them into hatred, sought to purchase favour and credit unto Tullius his Candidate, who stood to be Consul. "First quoth he whereas the Noblemen for many years together sought

 "that M. Minutius in the absence of Fabius had a lucky day: two legions only and no more, were "offered and exposed as it were to the enemy to be hewn in pieces: and then afterwards, they "were relieved and saved from massacre, and the very edge of the sword: to the end that Fabius
 "might be called Father and Patron: even he, who to say a truth, first impeached the Romans for "vanquishing the enemies, before that he saved them from being vanquished. Moreover, the "Consuls that succeeded, following the same course and artificiall fetches that Fabius pra-

 "the Commons were once enkindled and set on fire with these speeches and remonstances, albeit "three of the Patricii were competitors, namely, Pub. Cornelius Merenda, L. Manlius Volsus, and M.
Emilius Lepidus, and two new Noblemen, who were already familiar and acquainted with the "Commons, to wit, C. Attilius Serranus, and Q. Fabius Pansa, of whom the one had been High Priest, "and the other Augur: yet at length was C. Terentius only created Consul, to the end that the elec"tion should be in his power, that he might choose unto him a Colleague at his pleasure. Then
 "the Patricians having a sufficient tryall, that their Candidates and Competitors were of small force "and not able to prevail, urged and put forward L. Emilius Pansa, who sometimes had been "Consul with M. Lelutius, in the condemnation as well of himself as of his companion, escape
 "the peril of being burnt, and was well finged and scorched, as it were in the fire: a man of all "others most mischiefously bent against the Commons: him they urged, to say to stand for a Consul-
 "ship notwithstanding he refused a long while, and alledged many reasons against it. And to the "next Comitiall or Parliament day, by occasion that all the concurrents and competitors afore-
 "said that stood with Varrus, gave place and left off their suit, he was chosen to match with the Consul "elect, for to thwart and cross him, rather than to be assistant unto him in the government. This "done, they proceeded to the election of Prætors, wherein M. Pomponius Mabo, and P. Furius Philus were created. Unto Pomponius fell by lot the jurisdiction within the City of Rome: and un"to P. Furius Philus, between the Citizens of Rome and forreiners. Two other Prætors besides were "chosen, M. Claudius Marcellus, to be sent L. Deputy unto Sicily, and L. Posthumius Albinus into Gallia. All were created in their absence, and excepting Terentius the Consul only, there was no
 "Magistracy conferred upon any, who had not aforetime born and exercised the same: for divers
 "valorous and hardy men were passed over and left out, because in such a time of trouble, it was "not thought good to prefer any man to a government, wherein he was raw and unexercised.
 "The Armies also were augmented: but to what proportion they arose, either in Cavalry, or In"fantry, I dare not set down any thing for certainty: so greatly do authors vary both in the num"ber and quality of the forces. Some say, there was a new supply of 10000 footmen enrolled. O"thers affirm that to the five legions there were were adjoynd four new besides, to the end they "might employ nine legions in the wars. Alas, that the legions were increased in number both "of foot and horse: to wit, with the addition of one thousand footmen, and three hundred horse"men in every Legion: for sometime before, a Legion contained 4000 foot, and 200 horse; as "old Quadratus saith; whereas at first Romulus ordained it to be 3000 of the one, and 300 of "the other: so as a Legion consisted now of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse; and that "the associates should double the number of horsemen, and find even proportion of footmen with the "Romans.

Some Historians have written, that at what time as the battell of Canus was fought, the Romans were in Camp 8200 strong. But in this they all agree, that the Romans warred with great preparation, and more force and fury than in years past, because the Dictator had put them

A in good hope, that the enemy might be vanquished and subdued at once. But before that these new Legions advanced under their ensigns and banners out of the City, the Dictators were commanded to go and permit the books of Syllaba, by reason that men were commonly put in ignorance, and terrified with news of strange fights and prodigious things. For the manner went, that both at Rome, in the Aventine, and also at Ardea, it rained stones many about one time; and that in the Sabins Country (which no doubt portended a great massacre and slaughter), there issued out of a certain fountain, waters hot, with much blood: and men were more terrified therewith, because it did so many times together. Besides, in the street called Formica, toward Capua, many mistery persons were blasted and smitten to death with lightning from heaven: and the prodigious signs were expiate and purged with due remedies put out of the fore-aid books. Fabius does also from the City of Pestum, brought unto Rome a prefect of malle, holes of beaten gold, thanked they were like as the Neapolitans before them, but the gold was not received.

At the same time there arrived at Orbitum C. Hiero a fleet of ships, ready rigged, and furnished with store of victuals. The Syracusan Embassadors were brought into the Senate house, with they declared, "That K. Hiero so soon as he heard of the death of C. Flaminius the Consul, and the "defeat of the Army, took it to heavily, that no proper calamity of his own, or of his kindred, unto "his kingdom, could have troubled him more, and touched him nearer: and therefore albeit he "knew full well, that the grandeur and courage of the people of Rome, was ordinarily more admi"rable in their adversity than in prosperity and welfare, yet he had lent all those things, where-
 "with good friends and faithful Allies are wont to furnish their associates in time of war, praying
 "the LL. of the Senat, in any case not to refuse the same, but to take all in good worth. And first "to furnish for good luck sake and fortunate preface, they have brought with them the Image of Victory in gold weighing 320 pound: requesting that it would please them to accept the same to "have and so hold it, as their own for ever. Moreover, they have transported with them 100000
 "Modios of wheat, and 200000 of barley, to the end they should be at no faultier victuals, and
 "were ready moreover to bring in more, according as they should need, and to what place they "would appoint. As for footmen heavily armed and horsemen he knew well the people of Capua
 "would use none but natural Romans, or at least wife Latines. But forasmuch as he had seen and "observed in the Roman Camp, forrein aide consisting of light armed souldiers, therefore he had "sent 1000 Archers and Slingers, a meet and competent power to match with the Baleares and "Mores, and other nations that use shot, and to reach their enemies afar off. Oxer and buldies
 "these gifts and real presents, they compelled and advised them, that the Lord Deputy of Sicily
 "should pass with his fleet unto Africk, both to find the enemy work, and give him his hands
 "full of war at home: and also to afford him less service, and worse opportunity, to send aid
 "incomer to Annibal. The Senate returned this answer again unto the King. That King Hiero
 "had done the part of a right good man, and a singular friend and ally: who ever since that he was "entered into amity with the people of Rome, hath held on the same course still, in keeping his "faithfull allegiance, and never failed, but at all times and in all places, uncoined and advanced "the State and Empire of Rome, with all bounty and princely munificence: which the people of "Rome took most thankfully, as in right they ought. As for gold some other Cities likewise had "brought and offered unto them, but accepting only in good worth their kindness received it not.
 "But the Image of Victory, and the happy preface and forerunner thereof they gladly accepted, and "for that blessed Saint they appointed and dedicated unto the Capitol, and Temple of Jup. Opt.
 "Max, to be the seat and shrine thereof: that being consecrated in that Cattle and highest trea"sures of the City of Rome it might be propice and gracious, and remain firm and fast to the peo"ple of Rome. As for the slingers and archers, together with the corn they were delivered to the
 "Col. Five and twenty galleys, with five ranks of oars to a side, were joined to the Navy which was "under the conduct of T. Octavius the Pro-prætor in Sicily: who had commission, if he thought it
 "good and expedient for the commonweal to pass over into Africk, The Consuls having finished
 "the matters and levied souldiers, and a few daies, until their allies were come with aid from the "Latines. Then were the souldiers particularly (a thing never done before) by their Colonels, put "to their corporal oath, and sworn to make their repair at the Consuls commandment, and with"out their leave, not to depart: for until that day there passed nothing but a sacramental promise "and simple promise in general. For whensoever the horsemen resorted to their Decuries, and footmen
 "to their Centuries; both they of the Cavalry in their Decuries, and also of the Infantry in their "Centuries, (where after a sort) voluntarily among themselves, that they would not abandon their
 "enigms by way of flight, or upon any fear, nor go out of their ranks, unless it were to fetch either
 "some offensive armour, or to imitate an enemy, or to save the life of a Citizen. Which having been
 "aforetime a voluntary covenant and accord between themselves, was now by the martial Tribunes
 "or Colonels, reduced to a formal and solemn oath, and bound the souldiers to observe them same,
 "of necessity. Yet before the ensigns set forward and marched out of Rome, the Consul Varrus dealt
 "many hot words and brave orations in the assembly of the people, intimating & purporting thus "much in effect: That the Nobles had called for war in Italy where it was like to remain long e"nough, and to stick close to the ribs of the common-weal, if he were served with many in. h. Ge"nerals as Fabius was. "As for my self (quoth he) I shall (I trust) vanquish the enemy, the first day "that I set eye upon him yea, and finish the war at once for ever. But his Colleague Pansa made
 "but one only speech, even the day before they were to take their leave of the City, which was not

The Oration
of Q. Fabius Max. to L. Aemilius

to well taken of the people for the present, as it is proved true in the end. Wherein he gave Varro many hard words, nor girded at him otherwise than thus: "That he marvelled much, how any Captain, before he had experience either of his own Army, or of his enemies, and knew the situation of the place and ground, and the nature of the country, sitting as yet within the City in his gown, could perfectly tell what he was to do in the field, and in arms: and be able also to foretell and set down the very day, wherein he was to encounter and joyn in raised battle with the enemy. For his own part, he would not cast thus aforeshand, nor plot his designs and counsels before due time & season, which present occurrences are worse much more to minister unto men, than men to sit them to the occurrences that shall happen. This would he wish with all his heart, that the enterprises taken in hand warily and with discretion might prove as lucky and fortunate. As for I, inconsiderate rashness, besides that it importeth folly, hath ever to that day sped but ill. Thus it was well seen, that this man of himself inclined to prefer safe proceeding & advised counsel before doubtful waies & fool-hardy counsels: & to the end that he might persevere in that resolution more constantly. Q. Fabius Maximus at his departure (by report) bad him farewell, in this or such like manner. "If either you, O L. Aemilius, had a Colleague like unto your self, (which I could rather wish) for that your self were suitable to your Colleague, these my words to you were altogether needless, and superfluous. For you twin, being two good Consuls, would even without my speech do all things faithfully to the good of the Commonwealth: and contrariwise, if both of you were bad, ye neither would vouchsafe to give ear to my sayings, nor ponder in mind my counsels. But now, when I consider your companion what he is, and your self, to be a man of that quality & worth, I say, you are he to whom alone I am addressed to direct my whole speech: to you, I say, whom he thinks I foresee already, like to be in vain and without effect, an honest man and a good Citizen. For if the Commonwealth be hale and lame, but of one side, as great sway and authority will bad projects & lead courses carry, as the good face, and wholesome counsels. For you are far out of the way and much deceived, O L. Aemilius, if you think to be less troubled with Annibal, than with C. Terentius. And I wot not well, but I greatly fear, that you shall have a more cumbrous adversary of the one, than a dangerous enemy of the other. For, with Annibal you are to fight in the field, and in time of battle only; but with Terentius you shall have to do in every place, and at all hours. Against Annibal and his Legions you shall make head, and have the help of your own Cavalry and Infantry: but General Varro will assail you even with your own footsouldiers. Far be from you in any ill sense the late remembrance of C. Flaminius, for I love no such unclay prelagging. Howbeit, he began his mad fits when he was once Consul, and never before: when he was in his Province with command, & in the Camp with his Army, and never else. But this Varro, even before he stood for the Consulship, and all the whiles he was a sutor therefore, and now likewise, that he is Consul, before that he seeth camp or enemy in field is horn-mad, and talketh like a man besides himself. What foul work then (think you) will he make, when he shall see himself with armed youths about him in the Camp, who now amongst peaceable Citizens in their gowns and long robes within the City, stirreth so great storms and tempests, cracking and vaulting at every second word of nothing but fight, skirmish, and battle? What a coil, I say, will he keep there, where no looser a word spoken, but a blow given: and when upon direct command, presently enforceth execution? But in case this man (as he saith flatly he will) fall immediately to strike a barrel, either I know not what belongeth to Art military, and have neither skill how to conduct this kind of warfare, nor any experience of the quality and nature of this enemy, or else there will be another place more noble and memorable by our defeat and overthrow, than was the Lake Trasimene. But it is no time now to stand upon these terms, and to glorifie my self in comparison of this one person who have loved (as it is well known) to exceed and go beyond all measure in despising glory & honour, rather than in desiring and coveting the same. But the truth is this & so it will be found in the end, that the only way to war against Annibal, is that which I took and alwaies used. Neither is it the issue and event alone (for that is matter and teacher of fools) which sheweth & proveth this unto us, but even reason it self which hath said, and will be still the same and immutable, as long as things in the world hold on as they do. We war, (you see) in Italy, at home, in our own ground and place of residence: all quarters round about us, full of our own Citizens or friendly Allies: who daily help us, and will be ready still to furnish us with armour, men, horse, and victuals. Sufficient proof and testimony of their faithfulness have they given us already in our hard distress and adversity. Space and process of time maketh us better stronger, wiser every day than other, and more constant and resolute. Contrariwise, Annibal is in a strange and foreign land, in his enemies country, in the midst of all things that are crots and adverse unto him, far from his house and home, far from his native soil, having peace no where, neither by sea nor land. No Cities receive him and give him entertainment, no wals he hath, within which he can retire himself in safety. Nothing seeth he, whereto ever he goeth, that he can say is his own. From day to day, from hand to mouth, he liveth of rapine and spoil. Scarce a third part hath he of those forces, which he transported over the river Tiber. Hunger and famine hath wasted more of them, than the edge of the sword: and for this small remainder that is left, he is hard and scant provided of food and sustenance. Make you any doubt then but we shall vanquish him, whiles we sit still and take our ease, who day by day decrease sensibly, and waxeth old and feeble, who neither hath store of victuals to maintain an Army, nor supply of men to make up his broken bands, nor mals of money to entertain them.

How

A "How long was he faine to fight for Gerion, a poor little Castle in Apulia, as if it had been the howls of Carthage it self? Neither will I boast and magnifie my self at all before you, O Aemilius. "Do you but only consider, how Cn. Servilius and Atilius, the last Consuls, played mock-holiday with him and deceived him. This is the only way of safety. O L. Paulus, which I hear me our own Citizens will make difficult and dangerous unto themselves, more than the enemies can. For you shall have your own souldiers, and your enemies both of one and the same mind. Varro the Roman Consul, and Annibal the Carthaginian General will aim and reach at one and the self-same thing. And you, being but one man, must make account to resist two Captains: and resist them you shall well enough, if you will stand firm and hold your own against all bruits and speeches of the people, if neither the vain-glory of your fellow that shall be blazed, nor the infamous rumours that shall be fastly blown abroad to your disgrace, shall once stir you from your constant resolution and maintenance of the truth. O L. sayings these be, and common provs, that right and true-dealing may well be fickle, but it shall not die: it may be bleeding but shall not miscarry. And he that will despise vain-glory shall attain in the end to true glory. Let them call you and spare not fearful for careful, cold and slow for wise and considerate, an ill souldier and ignorant for a skilful warrior and experienced. But be not you daunted: I had rather hear a wise and sober enemy to fear you, than see foolish and brain-lick Citizens to praise you. Adventure all things boldly. Annibal will concern you: enterprise nothing rashly, he shall dread you. And yet my purpose is not, neither speak I this that you should enter into no action at all: but my meaning and advice is, that in all your doings you be guided and directed by five reasons, not haled and carried away with blind fortune. Order the matter so, that all things live within your compais, and at your disposition. Stand ever armed and upon your guard. Have your eye about you still, and keep good watch, that neither you lose any opportunity that shall present itself unto you, nor yield unto the enemy any occasion for his advantage. Take time and leisure, your shall find all things clear plain easie, and certain. Contrariwise, that maketh waste: it is ever to seek it foreteth nought, but is stark blind.

The Consul answered to these speeches, with no light from cheer and gladiome countenance, as consoling, that all he spake was rather true in substance, than easie in execution. "For (said he) if the General of horsemen were so violent, and not to be endured of you, who were his Dictator and to overaign Commander: what course shall I take, what shift may I make, what power and authority sufficient, am I like to have to sway against my seditious, quarrelsome, and heady Colleague? For mine own part, in my former Consulship, I hardly escaped a scolding, and much ado I had to pass through the light fire of the flaming peoples doom and heavy censure, wherein I was well scorched and half-burnt. I wish all may be well in the end. Howbeit, if any thing shall fall out otherwise than well, I had rather hazard the pikes and darts of the enemies, and leave my life behind me among them, than put my self to be tried again by the voices and suffrages of angry and teety Citizens. Paulus had no sooner delivered this speech, but (as the report goeth) he went forth on his journey and the chief LL of the Senat accompanied him. The Roman Commoner Consul was likewise attended of his favourites the Commons, more looked on & gazed at for their multitude and number, than regarded for the worth & quality of their persons.

So soon as they were arrived at the Camp, and that the new army was intermingled with the old, they divided the whole army into two camps & ordered the matter so, that the new which was the lesser should be nearer to Annibal: and in the old, the greater number and the whole strength and flower of the main forces should be quartered. Then they sent away to Rome M. Atilius the Consul of the former year, who excused himself by reason of his old age, and desired to be gone. But they gave unto Cn. Servilius the charge and conduct of one Roman Legion, and besought two thousand horsemen and footmen of their allies in the lesser Camp. Annibal, notwithstanding he well perceived that the power of his enemies was re-enforced by one half more than before, yet wondrous joyful he was at the coming of these new Consuls. For not onely he had nothing left him of victuals, which from day to day he purveyed for, to serve his present need and no more; but also there was no more to be had, and nothing remained for to fill his hands with: by reason that after the iteratory was not safe to travel in, the corn from all parts was conveyed unto the strong walled Towns, and there laid up: so that (as afterwards it was known for certain) he had scarce corn enough for to serve ten daies: and the Spaniards, by occasion of the dearth and want, were at the point to revolt unto the Romans, if they might but enjoy a good and commodious time therefore. Over and besides to the inbred rashness and over-hasty nature of the Consul. Fortune also ministered matter to confirm him therein. For in a certain tumultuary skirmish (to stop and impeach the torragers and Plunderers of Annibal, and which began rather by chance as the souldiers happened to encounter one another than upon any considerable council aforeshand, or by direction and commandment from the Generals) the Carthaginian had the foil, and went by the worst: for of them there were 1700 slain: but of Romans and Confederates not passing 100. And when in the train of victory they hotly followed the chase in disorder, the Consul Paulus, who that day had the absolute command (for they governed by turn each one his day) restrained and staid them, Varro thereat calied and fretted, crying out aloud. That he had let the enemy escape out of his hands: and if he had not thus given over the pursuit, the war might have been ended at once. Annibal took this loss and damage nothing near the heart, but rather made full reckonie, that he had caught began to dye to plot and enter into new deuicements, but also their Captain himself was of many and loose shot, close to the main battel of the Roman Legions; and of all the rest of light armed auxiliaries, consisted the van-guard. The Consuls led both the parties, Terentius the left, Æmilius the right, Cn. Servilius had the conduct of the main battel. Now Anibal by the break of day, having sent before the Balære slingers, and his other light armor, passed over the river, and marshalled them in battel array, ever as they came to land. The horse as well Gauls as Spaniards, he opposed in the left point, near to the bank, even against the horsemen of the Romans: the right consisted of the Numidian light horse: and the main battel was strengthened and fortified with his Infantry: but in such manner as the Africans flanked both, in manner of wings: and between them were betwixt the Gauls and the Spaniards in the midst. A man that had seen the Africans, would have taken most of them for Romans, so armed were they with Roman armor, I gotten much of it at Trebia, but most of all at Thrasymenus. The Frenchmen and Spaniards had targets neer of one fashion, but their swords were unlike and far differing. Those of the Gauls were very long and not pointed. But the Spaniard, whose manner is rather to fight with the thrust and to loyn, then to slash and strike edglong, had handsome short cuttillases, and sharp at the point. And after this sort flood these two nations armed before the rest (terrible to behold, both for the bigness of their persons, and also for their habit and attire.) The Gauls all from the navel upward naked: the Spaniards with linnen waistcoats or jackets, glittering wondrous bright, bordered and embroidered with purple and scarlet. The complete number of all, as well horse as footmen, that flood embattelled, amounted (as they report) unto forty thousand foot, and ten thousand men of arms. These Captains had the leading of these two points, to wit, Asdrubal commanded the left, Maburba the right. Anibal himself in person with his brother Mago, conducted the middle battel. The Sun shone sidewise upon the flanks both of the one and also of the other army, very indifferent and commodious to both parts, were it that they were so placed and marshalled off purpose, or chanced at adventure so to stand: the Romans with their faces full toward, the Carthaginians into the north. But the wind which the inhabitants of that country call Vulturnus, arose and blew full upon the faces of the Romans, and raised such flore of dust, and drete it so upon their eyes, that it took away their sight and prospect. The cry and shout began on both sides, and the Auxiliary foildiers put themselves forth first to skirmish, and charged one another with their light shot. Then the left point of the Gauls and Spanish men of arms encountered and ran full upon the right hand of the Romans Cavalry, nothing at all after the order of horle-service, for they were of necessity to affront one another straight forward, as having no room left about them to ling out and ride at large, being flanked on the one hand with the river, and enclosed on the other with the battailon of footmen. Whereupon I say, they were forced to charge full butt from both parts, directly before them, so long as their horses flood close and thrust together: but at length when they began to stir and wince, the riders, man to man, fell to take hold and clasp one another, and every man to pluck his enemie besides his horle, (as now they were driven much what to fight on foot. This conflict was rather sharp then long: and to be short, the Roman Cavalry was difcomfited and put to flight. And anon, as the horle made an end of their fight, began the skirmish of the foot also. At the first the Gauls and Spaniards equal to their enemies both in force and courage maintained the conflict right hardily, and kept their order and arrais. At length the Romans call about and devised on what side, and with what form of a close battailon, to force back that pointed squadron of the enemies, ranged very thin, and by so much the weaker, and bearing out withal, from the rest of the battel, now when they had once driven them to retreat, and give ground, the Romans pressed on still at one instant, and with the same violence pierced through them as they fled for fear headlong, until they were entred as far as to the very midit of the vanguard and main battel: and finding none able to stand in their way and make resistance, they gained in the end the very reward of the Africans: who having drawn in from both sides their skirts and wings, flood together strong, and firmly kept their ground. The Gauls and Spaniards continued still in the midst, somewhat advanced without the rest of the battel. Now when this pointed squadron was driven by the Romans, and made even and equal still with the front of the battel, and afterwards upon farther enforcement, gave way for them to pass in a lane through the midit thereof: by that time the Africans charged upon their flanks: and while the Romans unwarily were engaged over far within them, they came about them on the skirts, and within a while having stretched out and spread their wings, enclosed the enemies round on their backs also. Hereupon the Romans who had performed one battel and conflict in vain, were forced to give over the Gauls and Spaniards, whom they had disraied and put to flight, and were to begin a fresh fight with the Africans: and that to their own great disadvantage: not only because they being enclosed and pent up in a straight room, were to deal with them that had compassed them all about and were at liberty, but also because they being wearied, were to maintain a new skirmish with those that were fresh in heart, and lusty. And now by this time, in the left point of the Romans battel, where the horsemen of their associates were marshalled to affront the Numidians they were fain to close fight: which at the first these Numidians began but coldly and faintly, after the deceitful manner of Carthaginians, unto whom they were fast and neer neighbours. For 500. of them or thereabout, having besides their usual javelins and darts which they commonly carry, short daggers or skeins hidden under their cuirass and helmets, made semblance of riding away from their own companies, and siding to the Romans, with their bucklers at their backs, all of a sudden dismounted from their horses, and throwing their bucklers, targets,

And spears at their enemies feet, were received within the main battel, and from thence conducted to the hindmost in the rearward, were commanded there to abide behind at their back: And until such time as the skirmish joined on all sides, they continued quiet. But when they saw every mans eye and mind busied and occupied in the conflict, then they caught up those bucklers that lay strewd and scattered among the dead bodies all abroad, and played upon the battel of the Romans from behind: and what with wounding their backs, & cutting their hamstrings, they made foul work and slaughter among them; and more then that, raised a greater fear and tumult by far. Now when the Romans in one place were fought and ran away, and in another fought for life, armed only with despair of a means to escape: Asdrubal who had the charge of that side, I caused the Numidian horsemen, who fought but coldly with those that flood affront them, to be withdrawn from the midit of the battel, and sent them to pursue the enemies in the chafe. And so the Africans over weary now with execution and killing, rather then with any other fight, he joined the Gauls and Spanish footmen to assist them. On the other side of the battel, Paulus, albeit at the very first shock and encounter, he was sore wounded with a bullet from out of a sling, yet oftentimes he made head against Anibal, and kept his battailons close and thick together, yea, and in divers places renewed the conflict, and evermore the Roman horsemen guarded and protected him. But at the last they left their horses, because the Consul his strength failed him to rule his own, and to fit him. Whereupon there was one brought word unto Anibal, that the Consul had commanded his men of arms to light aloof. Then (quoth Anibal, as the report goeth) Yea, mar? For by how much gladder would I be, if he delivered them into my hands bound hand and foot? And surely the horsemen fought so alter they were alighted, as if there had been no doubt, but that the enemy had the victory. Howbeit, although they had the worle, yet they chose rather to die in the place, then to flie: and the victors angry at the heart with them for thus staying the accomplishment of the victory, went down with them, and killed outright all those whom they could not make to give ground and yield. And yet a few such as were wearied with much toil and overcharged with many wounds they enforced to retreat. Anon they were all disbanded and scattered asunder: and as many as could, recovered their horses, and fled away. Cn. Lentulus Comandeeing (as he rode by) the Consul sitting all agore blood upon a stone. Ah L. Æmilius (quoth he) whom the gods ought of right to regard and save, as being the only guileless man, and innocent of this days work and unhappy overthrow, take here this horle of mine, while some vigor and strength remaineth in you. Able I am to mount you upon him, to accompany and protect you also. Come I say, and make not this battel more curfed and sorrowful by the death of a Consul. Without it, I wot, we have cause enough already, and too much, of dolorous tears and wofull lamentation. Whereunto the Consul made this answer: Give thee thanks, O L. Cernius, gra-mercy for thy kindness, and God bleis thee in this thy virtue and prowess. But take thou heed to thy self, lest by thy foolish pity of me, thou lose that little time which thou hast to escape out of the hands of the enemies. Save thy self, and go thy ways to the LL. of the Senat, and wilt them all from me in general, to fortifie the City of Rome, and man it well with strong guards, before the enemy follow the train of victory, and come against it. But more particularly, let Q. Fabius understand, that L. Æmilius yet, was mindful of his whollom precepts: all the whiles he lived, and now also forgot them not at the hour of his death. And suffer thome to yield unto nature, and let go my last breath, even here among the heaps of mine own slain foildiers, that I may end my days and die neither an accused and guilty person, nor in my Consulship stand up to accuse my Colleague, and to defend mine own innocency, and justifie my selfe, by the blaming of another. As the Consul uttered these words, first the multitude of his own citizens in the rout, and then the enemies in pursuit, ran over him: and not knowing who he was, overwhelmed him with javelins and darts good store. As for Lentulus, his horle carried him away to a little hill. Then they fled all again as fast as they could, 7000. recovered the lesser camp, and ten thousand the greater: and upon two thousand put themselves into the village it self of Canna. But because it was an unvalled and fenceless town, they were immediately environed by Cn. Paulus and the horsemen, and so perished every one. The other Consul made no semblance, that he was offended or displeased with the companies that thus fled, were it of purpose, or as it chanced: and accompanied with fifty men of arms or thereabout escaped to Venusia. In this battel were slain of Romans (by report) 40000. footmen, and 2700. horsemen: and in a manner, as many besides of Allies, as of natural Citizens. Amongst whom there was one Consul, two Treasurers, L. Attilius and Furius Bibaculus, 21. Colonels: some also who had been Consuls, Pretors, and Ediles. Of which number was Cn. Servilius, and C. Minucius Nautius, who the year before had been Commanders of the Cavalry for some certain days. Besides 80. Senators, or such as were Senators fellows, and had borne those dignities, in regard whereof, they were to be chosen Senators. These served as volunteers and were enrolled among the Legions. There were taken prisoners at this field, as the general speech went, 3000. footmen, and 300. men of Arms.

This is that noble battel, so famous for the overthrow at Canna, and comparable to that defeat at the river Allia. For like as this was of less importance, then the other, in respect of that which ensued after the conflict, because the enemy stayed his hand, and pursued not his victory: so if we consider the loss of men and defeat of the army it was the greater, and for the shameful flight more dishonorable. For the running away that was at Allia, as it betrayed the City, so it saved the Army: but at Canna, when the one Consul fled, there were scarce 50. of his army that accompanied him him, and as for the other Consul, whiles he lay a bleeding and dying, all his forces to speak of took their heels.

The speech of
P. Sempronius Tudianus to
soldiers.

Now there being a number in both camps, half disarmed, and wholly without their chief Commanders: the Captains of the greater Camp sent a messenger unto the other, willing them to come over thither, that they might march in one entire company together, and depart to Cannus in the night season, whyles their enemies were fast asleep: as partly wearied with long fight and partly charged with wine & good cheer after their joyful victory. This advice, some there were that misliked together and rejected. For why (say they) might not they come hither themselves to us, as well as send for us, since we may as soon join together? Because, I would all the ways between are full of enemies, and they chose rather to hazard the bodies of others, when adventuring their own persons in to great danger. Others were not so much displeased for any dislike of the motion, as their hearts faked them to take in hand the enterprise thereof. Then spake P. Sempronius Tudianus a Colonel. And will ye rather chuse (quoth he) to be taken captive by a multitude of foes and cruel enemy? And to have your heads valued at a price? And that Chapmen coming to buy you in open market, should ask every one of you this question, Whether art thou a Roman Citizen, or a Latin Confederate? And so by thy disgrace, reproach, and misery, another man shall get honor, and thy self none. Ye are not (I see well) like to Lucius Emilius, who made choice to die valiantly, then to live in shame and obloquy: nor to many other to brave and hardy men, who lie about him dead on the ground by heaps. But before day light surprize us, and greater troops of enemies beset the passages, let us break through these, that in disorder and out of array, make to trouble our gates. The point of sword and edge of courage, is able to pass through enemies, stand they never so thick and close together. We will make a pointed bayonet, tailon in wedg-form, and pierce through their loose and thin squadrons, as easily as if nothing stood in our way. Go with me therefore as many of you, as are willing to save yourselves and the Common-weal. The word was no sooner out of his mouth, but his sword was out of scabbard, and with a pointed battailon took his way through the midst of the enemies; and when the Numidians flanked them, and shot hard at their right side that lay open to them, they shifted their targets to their right arm, and so escaped, to the number of 600, unto the bigger camp, and forth from thence joining to the other greater company, they retired themselves safe to Cannus. These exploits were performed by men vanquished, more upon a present fit of courage, as hath many natural instinct guided, or chance led him, then either any sage advice of their own, or command of other.

Now when all the rest came about Annibal, immediately upon this noble victory to congratulate and rejoice with him, yea, and to advise him, that after to great a battle performed, he should rest of that day, and the whole night following, both refresh himself, and also give rest and repose to his wearied soldiers: Maharbal, General of the Cavalry, was of mind that it was no giving over thus: Nay (quoth he) that you may know of what consequence this battle is, you shall break your fast and eat your dinner five days hence in the Capitol. Follow hardly with your horses, that they may see you are come, before they hear that you are coming. No faith Annibal says, let carriers on Gods name go alone, and spare not to carry news thereof: Your words are good, and it is a gay matter and plausible you speak of: but the way thereto is longer, and more than I can presently conceive and comprehend: I give you thanks Maharbal, and I commend your good mind and forwardness: but we had need to deliberate and pause further upon this point. Ah (quoth Maharbal) true it is, I see well, that God hath not ended one man with all gifts. Thus halt the way O Annibal, to win a victory, but not the grace to use a victory. And surely, in this one day's delay, as it was certainly believed, stood the safety and preservation of the City & Empire of Rome. The morrow after, so soon as ever the day began to appear, they minded only and intended the gathering of spoils, and to view that great butchery and slaughter: a pitiful and lamentable sight even to the very enemies to behold. So many thousand Romans lay there alone in every place, horsemen and footmen pell mell, one with another, according as their hap was to meet together: and either to join in fight, or die in flight. Some were seen to arise up all bloody from out of the midst of the slaughtered bodies, such as the bitter morning cold had nipped their wounds, and made them to start up by reason of their smart, and were by the enemy knocked down again and killed. Other some they found lying along still alive, cut shorter by the thighs & bays, who offered their bare necks & throats to be cut & called upon them to let forth the rest of their blood. Divers were found with their heads covered within the earth, who, as it appeared, had made themselves holes & gutters in the ground for this purpose, to inter themselves, wherinto they thrust their mouths & faces, & being buried with mould cast over them, were so stifled & choked. But above all the rest, there was one that drew every mans eye upon him & made them all to wonder. Nemidius with his nose and ears pitifully mangled & cropt, but yet alive, lying under a Roman dead. For when his hands so wounded as they were, would not serve him to handle a weapon, for very anger he set mad & lay (so long as he had any breath within him) biting his enemy with his teeth.

After they had spent a good part of the day in gathering spoils, Annibal marched forward to attack the lesser camp and first and foremost he turned aside the arm of the river that flanked them, and so excluded them from the water. But they all within being over-wearied with toil, with watching and bleeding of their wounds, yielded sooner than he looked for: and expounded, Impetris to deliver up their armor and horses: Item, to pay 300, Quadrigates

A peeces of silver, for every Roman: 200, for every one of the Allies: and every bondman 100 a pece. Item, that after this ransom paid, they should depart in their single apparel. Thus they received their enemies into the camp, and were themselves put all in ward: but, Allies and Citizens by themselves, apart one from the other. While they trilled time there, there were about 4000, footmen, and 200 horsemen, even as many as either their strength or hearts would serve, who out of the greater camp fled to Cannus, some marching in order, others scattering abroad over the fields, which was not the worst way of the twain, and less safe. And then the camp was surrendered to the enemy, by those that were hurt and heartless, upon the same conditions that the other war. A rich booty was there gotten: and letting aside horses, and men, and silver, which they used much in trappings and caparisons of their horses, (for soldiers, be ye sure, occupied very little silver, either in their own apparel, or at their board) all the pillage was given to be rifled and ransacked amongst them. Then he gave commandment that the dead bodies of his own men should be gathered together for to be buried. And as men say, they were to the number of eight thousand, all right valiant and hardy men. Some Authors report, that the Roman Consul also was fought up and interred. As for those, which escaped to Cannus, were by the Canusins entertained only within the walls, and lodged in their houses: but a noble Lady and a wealthy, named Bulla, relieved them with some victual, apparel, yea, and money also in their purses for their journey. In regard of which bountiful liberality of hers, after the war was finished, she was highly honored by the Senat of Rome.

Now, there were amongst them four Colonels; namely, Fabius Max, of the first Legion, whose father had been Dictator the year before: and L. Publicius Philus, of the second Legion, together with P. Cornelius Scipio, and Appius Claudius Pulcher of the third Legion, who had been Edile but lately afore: and by general consent of them all, P. Scipio, a very young man, and Appius Claudius were chosen to bear the sovereign rule, and to have the absolute command and conduct of the army. But as they sat with some few others, in counsel together about the managing of their main affairs, behold P. Furio Philus, whose father had been a Consul, gave them to understand, that all their consultations were in vain, and that they did but foster and cherish a foolish hope of an overthrown state: for the Common-weal was in a desperate case, past all cure, and remediless. Also that certain noble young Gentlemen, of whom L. Cecilius Metellus was the principal, minded nothing else but to take sea, and were ready to embark, to abandon Italy, and to fly for succor to some King or other. This evil tidings as it was most grievous and heavy in itself: so falling out as it did, presently upon other misfortunes so suddenly and unlooked for, put them into their dumps, and wonderfully amazed and astonished them all. And when they that were present in place laid their heads together, and thought good to call others to counsel upon this point, Scipio a young man, even then predestined to be the fatal Captain of this war, answered: What do we here? (quoth he) it is no time now to sit consulting in so great extremity, but letting all discourse, presently to proceed to action, and to do some exploit. As many therefore as are willing to save the Common-weal, take arms and go with me forthwith: for no where are our enemies (to say a truth) encamped against us more, then where such designments are plotting and contriving. Forth he went with a few following after him, unto the lodging of Metellus: and finding there the young Gentlemen afore said, close together in counsel thereabout: he drew his sword, and brandished it naked over their heads, as they sat in consultation. "I swear before you all (quoth he) and I swear from my very heart, and no man urgeth me thereto, that I for my part will neither forsake the Common-weal, nor suffer any Citizen else of Rome to abandon her. And if I fail with it, willing and willing, then confound me O Jup. Opt. Max, and bring a most shameful end upon my house, my family, and all that I have, swear thou O L. Cecilius after me, as I have done, I advise thee: and ye all that are here present take the same oath: for whoever shall refuse, know he assuredly, that upon him I have drawn this sword. Hereat they being no less terrified, then if they had seen the Conqueror himself Annibal in person, took the oath every one, and yielded themselves unto Scipio, for to be kept in ward to serve against Annibal.

At the same time, whiles these things were working at Cannus, there arrived at Venusia, upon four thousand foot and horsemen together, such as in their flight had been separated asunder all over the fields, and repaired unto the Consul there. The Venusins took order for them all, that they should be gently entertained, and carefully tended, and divided into several houses: and they bestowed upon the horsemen, a hide cassock, a coat, and * 25, Quadrigates a pece: and gave ten Quadrigates to every footman: and armor besides, to as many as wanted. And in all other courtesies of hospitality, both publick and privat, they strove and endeavored that the people of Venusia should not in any kind of friendly offices, come behind one woman of Cannus. Howbeit in regard of the great multitude, the burden and charge lay more heavy upon dame Bu. Celsiorum their number was then to be ten thousand. Then Appius and Scipio having intelligence that the other Consul was alive and well, dispatched a messenger presently, to advertise him how many footmen and horsemen there were in all with them: and to know his pleasure what, whether he would command the army to be brought unto Venusia, or abide still at Cannus. But Varro (the Consul) of his own accord brought his forces to Cannus. So as by this time, they made a pretty good show of a Consular army, and seemed sufficient to defend themselves, if not by the force of arms in the field, yet at leastwise, with the strength of walls within the town. But the news came to Rome, that there was not so much as this small remnant left of Citizens and Con-

Confederates together: but that the two Consuls and both the armies were put all to the sword, and hewn in pieces to the last man, Never was there known so great a terror and turmoil within the walls of Rome (and the City still remaining in safety.) I will therefore even at first, sink under my load and saying nothing at all: and never will I go about to recount those things by discourse of words, which in reporting, I should make less than they were indeed. For there was not now, a flying rumor first of one foil, and then of another: to day of this foil, and to morrow of that: as the year before, when the Consul and his army were defeated at Thrasymeneus, but manifold overthrows together were multiplied, and altogether at once, to wit, how both the Consuls were slain, and two Consular armies lost: no camp, not a pavilion of the Romans left standing: neither Leader nor Soldier remaining alive: and how Annib. I was now become Lord of Apulia, of Samnum, and well near of all Italy full and whole. And verily, there is not (I suppose) a nation under the cope of heaven besides, but would have been overwhelmed and crushed utterly under the huge heap and heavy weight of so great a ruin & overthrow. Should I compare the defeat and foil that the Carthaginians received at the Island Ægates, in a conflict at least wherewith they were so quelled, and their backs so broken, that at one clap they lost Sicilia and Sardinia both, and that which more is, yielded themselves tributaries and subjects to the people of Rome. Or should I make comparison of their unfortunate and unhappy battle in Africa afterwards? wherein this very Annib. gave overplay, yielded the bucklers, and confessed himself vanquished. Nay, they are not any way comparable with this, but only that they were born and supported with less courage, and valour of mind.

Well, to proceed, P. Furius Philus, and M. Pomponius the Pretors, assembled the Senat in the Court Hofilia, for to consult about the defence and guard of the City: for they made no doubt, but now that the armies were both defeated, the enemy would speedily come to assault Rome, the only piece of work, and warlike service that remained behind undone. But being to seek what counsel to take, and what remedy to devise for redress of these calamities, to exceeding great and grievous, and yet not known to the full, and interrupted and shrewdly troubled besides with the clamorous noises and plaints of women: whilst that in every house almost, they ceased not to mourn, weep, and wail confusedly, as well for the quick as the dead (because as yet it was not openly and for certain known who were alive, and who were slain.) Then Furius Max. gave his opinion, that certain light horsemen should be made out and sent forth by the highways Apulia, and Latina, and to ride along, and enquire of them whom they heard to meet with, (first I mean as fled, and were scattered here and there abroad) if happily some of them could report upon his knowledge, what was become of the Consuls, and the armies: and in case the immortal gods had of their mercy and compassion: read some poor remnant still of this miserable and woful Empire, for the Roman name: where that residue of small forces was; what way Annib. took; and whither he was gone after the battle was fought: what preparation he maketh what presently he is doing, or intendeth for to do. His advice was, I say, that to spy, hearken and learn certainly, these premises, certain lusty young men, active and industrious, should be employed. But for the LL. of the Senat thus much, that considering there were few Magistrates at home, and those not able to rid the City of this tumultuous and fearful hubbub, therefore they should take upon themselves, to debar the dames and women for coming abroad, and force them every one to keep home, and tarry within doors: to restrain the plaints and outcries of households and families: to cause silence throughout the City: to take order that all Posts, and messengers of news, should be brought before the Pretors: and that every man should attend at home the tidings, good or bad, that concerned himself, or his own state. Over and besides, that they should let warders at the gates, to see that no person went out of the City: and compel every man to hope for no other earthly safety for themselves, but in the preservation of the City, and walls thereof. And when the tumult and hurry is once hushed, then (quoth he) may the Senators well be called again into the Council-House, and consult for the defence and safeguard of the City. When all the assembly liked well, and approved of this opinion, and went every man on Fabius his side without contradiction, so as the market place, by authority of the Magistrates, was cleared and voided of the multitude, and the Senators were divided and gone sundry ways to appease the uproars: then at last, came letters from Tarentum the Consul, importing, that L. Æmilius the Consul was slain together with the army: that himself was at Cannum, busied in rallying the reliques of so great an overthrow, as it were after a shipwreck upon the sea: and there were ten thousand soldiers of them, or very near, and those much out of frame and good order. As for Annib. he sat still now at Cannæ, busily occupied about the ransoming of prisoners, and intensive to the rest of the spoil and pillage: not measuring the victory with the mind and courage of a conqueror, nor yet after the guile and manner of a noble warrior and great commander. Then were the private and particular losses also divulged and spread abroad through every man's house and family, and the whole City was so filled with sorrow and lamentation, that the Anniversary solemnity of sacrifices to Ceres was foret, because it was not lawful for those that mourned to celebrate the same: and there was not a matron throughout the City, but was in heaviness and sorrow for the time. Left therefore other sacrifices likewise, as well publick as privat, upon the same occasion, should be neglected and discontinued, there passed an Act of the Senat, by virtue whereof a term was prefixed, to make an end of mourning within thirty days. Now was the trouble of the City no sooner allayed, and the Senators called again into the Council-House: but to mend the matter, there were other letters brought out of Sicily from T. Otacilius the Vice-pretor, notifying thus much, That the realm of Hiero was much wasted by the Carthaginian navy: and when he would have succored him at his earnest suit and petition, there was another Armado ready rigged, decked and furnished, riding by the Islands Ægates, waiting the opportunity of the time, that when the Carthaginians perceived once that he had turned and bent his forces to the defence of the coast and river Syracusæ, they might immediately set upon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman province. And therefore in case they were minded to aid and maintain a confederate King, and defend the Realm of Sicily, they must of necessity rig and man another fleet out of hand. When the letters both of the Consul and also of the Vice-pretor were read, agreed it was, and thought meet, that M. Claudius Admiral of the fleet which rid in the harbour of Ofis, should be sent unto the army at Cannum, and letters be dispatched withal unto the Consul, willing him upon the delivery of the army unto the Pretor, to repair unto Rome with all speed possible, and not fail, so far forth as he might, without any detriment and hindrance of the Common-weal. Besides these to great losses and adversities, men were put in fear with sundry prodigious tokens: and among others, in that one year, two Vestal Virgins, Opimia, and Floronia, were detected and attainted of manifest whoredom: the one of them was buried quick, as the manner was, under the ground at the gate Collina, the other killed her self, L. Caninius (a Secretary or Scribe unto the Bishops, whom now they call Minors Pontifices) the party who had committed fornication with Floronia, was by the chief or high Priest to beaten with rods in the Comitium, that he died under his hand. This heinous fact, and enormous offence falling out among so many misfortunes and calamities, was reckoned, I say, (as usually it is) for a portentous sign: and therefore the Decemvirs were commanded to search and peruse the Books of Sibylla, and Q. Fabius Pictor was sent to Delphos, to consult with the Oracle there of Apollo, and to learn, by what prayers and supplications they might pacify the gods, and what would be the end of so great and fearful miseries. In the mean while, out of the learning contained in those books of delivies, there were performed certain extraordinary sacrifices among which a Frenchman together with a French woman; likewise a Grecian man and woman, were let down alive in the beast market into a vault under the ground stoned all about: a place sometime embred and polluted with the blood of mankind sacrificed, but not according to the ceremonies and religion of the Romans. When they had sufficiently (as they thought) pacified the gods, M. Claudius Marcellus sent from the haven of Ofis for the defence and guard of the City, 1500, soldiers; whom he had levied and enrolled for the service at sea. Himself having lent afore the legion belonging to the Armado (which was the third) with Theon a Sidonian a Colonel, and delivered the fleet unto P. Furius companion with him in commission: within few days after made haste, and with great journey arrived at Cannum. At Rome, by virtue of the Authority of the Senators, M. Junius was created Dictator, and T. Sempronius General of the horse, who proclaimed a muster, and enrolled all the younger sort above 17, years old, yea, and some also under that age, that yet were in their Prætextæ, and were not come to Toga virilis. Of these were made up four legions full, and a thousand horsemen. Likewise they sent unto their Allies, and namely to the Latine Nation, to receive soldiers from thence according to the form of the league: giving commandment, that harness, weapons, and all other habiliments of war, should be in readiness. Also to furnish out the army, they plucked from the Temples, and publick Galleries and walking Places, the ancient spoils and armor of their enemies. And for very need and want of free men, they were compelled to devise a new kind of mustering never used before: for they bought up in open markets, with the City money, 8000, lusty strong young men, miser bond-slaves: but they demanded first of every one by himself, whether they were willing to serve in the wars, and if they put them in armor, And they thought it better to take up and levy soldiers thus, than to redeem and buy again their own who were captives, albeit they might have been ransomed for smaller sums of money. For Annib. after this to fortunate field fought at Cannæ, setting his mind wholly upon affairs belonging to an absolute conquest, rather than any more wars; caused his captives to be brought forth, and severed the Roman confederates apart from the rest: and unto them (as he had done aforetime at Trebit, and the Lake Thrasymeneus) he spake graciously, and lent them home unarm'd. The Romans also he called unto him, and gave them kind and loving words, more than ever he had done before. "What? we and the Romans (quoth he) war not mortally and deadly one with the other to the utmost: nay, our quarrel is rather for honour and sovereignty. And as my father and progenitors afore me, were lubdub'd of the Romans, and yielded at length to their valor and prowess: lo the only thing that I seek for, and indeed or unto this, That they likewise in their alternative turn, may give place unto my felicity and virtue together. And therefore I grant the Romans this favor and liberty, to redeem their prisoners: and this shall be the ransom, for every man of arms I demand 500 Quadrigræ, 300 for a foot-man, and 100, for a bondman. And albeit the horsemen ransom was somewhat inhand, above that sum which they capitulated for, when they yielded, yet glad they were to accept of any condition and covenant whatsoever. So it was agreed, that ten out of them should be chosen by voices, to go to Rome unto the Senat: and he took no other pledge for assistance of them but their oath, that they would return again. With them was sent Carthago, a Noble man of Carthage with commission (if he could perceive haply the Romans sent to peace) to offer unto them conditions, and to capitulate with them. They were not so soon gone out of the camp, but one of them (a man of a Roman nature and disposition) made semblance, as if he had forgotten somewhat behind him, and so to discharge himself (forthwith) of his oath, returned into the camp, and before night overtook his company again. When word was brought, that they were coming to Rome, there was a Lictor sent out to meet Carthago upon the way, and to warn him in the name of the Dictator, before night to depart out of the confines of the territory of Rome. But the Committees of the Captives had audience granted them in the Senat-house by the Dictator. And the principal man among them, Marcus Junius, spake in this manner.

"Right honourable, and my very good LL. of the Senat, There is not one of you all ignorant, that never any City whatsoever, hath been at less charge for redeeming of prisoners taken in wars, and made to small regard of them, then ours. But if we be not blinded in our own conceit, and think better of our cause, then there is reason: never were there any soldiers that fell into the hands of our enemies more to be accounted of by you then we are. And why? We yielded not our weapons in battell for cowardize and fear, but after that we had stood well neer upon night fighting over the dead bodies of our fellows slain, and so maintained the fight to the very last, then we retired our selves into the camp. The rest of the day and night following, notwithstanding we were weary with travel, and faint of our hurts, yet we manfully defended our rampart. The morrow after, when we were beset and invested round about by the conquerors army, yea, and excluded from water: and saw no other hope at all to break through our enemies, ranged to strong and close together, and thinking it not a matter of reproof, and against the law of arms, that when 5000. of our Citizens were slain in field, some Roman soldiers should remain alive after the battell of Cannæ: then and not alone, we agreed upon a sum of money, that being ransomed, we might be set at large, and so we yielded unto the enemies our weapons, wherein now we saw no help at all. We have heard likewise, that our ancestors deemed themselves from the Gauls with a sum of gold: and our fathers also, notwithstanding they were most straight laced, and hardly brought to capitulate and compound for peace, yet sent Embassadors to Tarentum, for to redeem their captives: and both those battells, first in Italy with the Gauls, and then before Heraclea with Pyrhus, were not so ignominious and shameful for the losse it self, as for the fright and beauly running away. But the plains of Cannæ are covered all over with heaps of Roman bodies: and we that be here, had not remained alive after them, but that the enemies strength held out no longer, nor their sword would serve to kill any more. And yet there be some of our men also who fled not back in battell: but being left behind to guard the camp, were taken prisoners by the enemy as well as we, at what time as it was surrendered into their hands. Certainly I envy not the fortune, nor repine at the welfare and good estate of any Citizen or fellow souldier, neither would I be thought the man, who by deserting another, would seem to advance my self. But even they verily (unless peradventure good footmanship and swift running deliver reward) who for the most part fled out of the field unarmed, and never flinted before they gat Venusia or Cannusum over their heads, cannot justly prefer themselves before us, nor boast and glory, that they stand the Common-weal in better stead, then we. Find them you shall (I doubt not) good men and valorous souldiers: so shall you too, yea, and more ready to do true service to our country, in that by your bounty and good means we have been ransomed and retired again into our country. Ye have levied souldiers of all ages and degrees, and I hear say, there be 8000. bondmen in arms. We are no fewer in number our selves, and redeemed we may be with as small moneys as they are bought, I say no more, but so, for if I should make farther comparisons between us and them, I must do wrong to the Roman name and nation. This is a special thing moreover (my LL.) which in mine advice ye are due to consider in this deliberation, in case ye be hard-hearted, as to have no regard of us, or of our desert, namely in what enemies hand ye leave us. It is with Pyrhus peradventure, who used us being his prisoners, like friends and guests. Nay, is he not a Barbarian and Carthaginian? who whether he be more covetous or cruel, can hardly be imagined. O that ye saw the irons and chains, the nasty filthiness and foul usage of your Citizens. I am assured, you would be no less moved and affected to compassion at the sight thereof, then if ye beheld on the other side your Legions lying slain all over the plains and fields of Cannæ. Ye may observe and behold the sorrowful cheer, and faint tears of our kinsfolks standing here in the porch and entry of this Court, and waiting for your answer. And if they to fare, and are so penitive for us, and for them that are absent, what heavy hearts have they themselves (think ye) whose liberty and whose life lieth now a bleeding? And in good faith, if so be Annibal himself would, contrary to his nature, be respective and merciful to us, yet should we think our lives did us small good, so long as we are reputed of you unworthy to be ransomed and redeemed. There returned in times past to Rome certain captives, sent home by Pyrhus without any ransom paid, but the returned accompanied with Embassadors, right honorable personages of this City, who had been sent for their redemption. And shall I return unto my country again not esteemed a Citizen worth 300. Deniers. Every man hath a mind by himself, and a fame of his own my LL. And I wot well, that my body and life is in jeopardy. But I fear more the hazard of honor and good name, lest we should be thought condemned and rejected by you. For the world will never believe, that you did it to spare your purse, and to save money.

When he had made an end of his speech, immediately the multitude who were gathered together in the common place, set up a lamentable and piteous cry, and held out their hands unto the

A Council-house, beseeching the LL. of the Senat to let them have and enjoy their children, their brethren, and kinsfolks again. The very women also, for fear and necessity, thrust themselves among this prels of men in the market place. But when all others besides the Senators were voided, they began to debate and contend about the matter in hand. Great variance there was in opinion, some thought it reason, that their ransom were disbursed out of the common chest: others were of mind, that the City should be at no charge at all for their redemption: marry they would not be against it, but that they might be enlarged and delivered at their own cost and expenses. And in case there were any that had not ready coin enough for present payment, the chamber of the City should lend them money, so as the people might have good security, as well by tories B bound, as by their good lands, mortgaged for the satisfaction of that debt. And when T. Mellius Torquatus, a man of the old world for precise severity, and as most folk thought too hard and austere in this point, was demanded his opinion, he spake, by report, to the cause in this wise.

"If the Committees (quoth he) had treated and made suit, for the redemption of them only that are captive in the hands of the enemies, and there staid: if they had not touched the person of any other besides, I would in few words have knit up my verdict and judgement of them. For what need I to have done else, but put you in mind, and exhort you, to observe the custom delivered unto you from your ancestors, and to maintain the example so good and necessary for the service of war. But now, seeing they have not only justified, but also (as it were) glorified themselves, in that they yielded unto the enemies, and thought it good reason to be preferred, not only before them that were taken prisoners by the enemies in the field, but also those that saved themselves, and escaped to Venusia and Cannusum; yea, and before C. Terentius himself the Consul: I will not hide any thing from you my LL. but acquaint you with every thing that was done there. And would to God, that the words which I will utter here in your presence, I might deliver at Cannusum, even before the body of the army, the best witness of every mans cowardise or valour: or at leastwise, that P. Sempronius were present here alone whom, if these fellows would have followed as their leader, they had been souldiers at this day in the Roman camp, and not captives at the devotion of the enemies. For whilst the enemies were wearied with fight, joyous and jocund of their fresh victory, and most of them retired into their own camp: they might have had the whole night to have themselves at their pleasure: and it that were D not, yet being less than strong, they had been able to have made a lane through them, were they never so thick, and to have broken away in despite of their hearts. But neither attempted they so much of themselves, nor yet would follow the leading of another. P. Sempronius Tudianus ceased not all night long almost, to exhort, to admonish, and encourage them, for to follow his conduct, to take the time when but a few of their enemies were about their camp, whilst they were at repose and rest, and whilst the night lasted favourable unto them, for to hide and cover their enterprise: perswading with them, that before day light they might easily reach unto places of security, and arrive safely at the Cities of their Allies. Like as in the days of our Grandfathers, P. Decius a Tribune Colonel in Stumium: like as of late time when I was E a young man my self, in the first punick war, Calpurnius Flaminius said unto three hundred his voluntary souldiers, at what time as he minded to lead them to the gaining of a little Hill, standing in the midst of his enemies: Let us die hardly my souldiers, and by our death save and deliver our Legions, beset and besieged round about. If P. Sempronius had said so much to you, he would never have esteemed you men of valour nor yet Romans, if no man among you would have born him company, or seconded him in that singular vertue. But he showed you a plain and easy way, leading as well to life and safety, as to honour and glory. He offered himself to be your guide, to bring you to your native country: to your parents, your wives and children: yet would not your hearts serve you to escape and save yourselves. Where had your hearts been, then, if he would have had you to die for your country? 50000. of our Citizens and Confederates, lay that very day slain at your feet. If so many examples of manhood and vertue, could not move you, nothing in the world will ever move you: it is to great a soil and overthrow, that not able to make you despise and set little by this life: none will ever do it, Desire home a Gods name, and long after your native country, whilst ye are free and in safety: nay, desire to be in your country, whilst it is your country, and whilst ye are Citizens thereof. Now your desire and longing cometh too late, being disanchored, having lost your former estate and sight of Citizens, and made your selves bondslaves to the Carthaginians. Think ye for a peece of money, to recover your liberty again, and to return to your former degree, from which through faint-heartedness and cowardize ye are fallen? You would not hearken nor give ear to P. Sempronius your Citizen, willing you to take weapon in hand, and to follow after him: but anon after ye G could listen after Annibal, commanding you to betray and render the camp, and deliver up your camp. But why blame I their littleness and dastardly fear: when I may reprove and accuse them for willful and lewd wickedness: For they not only refused to be ruled by his good counsel and exhortations, but also attempted to hinder and stay him in his intended enterprise, had not right hardy and valiant men with their swords drawn, set these dastardly beasts farther off. P. Sempronius, I tell you, had somewhat ado, to pass the ranks and squadrons of his own countrymen before he could break through the battallion of his enemies. Longeth our country to have these for her Citizens? who if the rest had been like them, should by this day, have had never one a one of them that fought at Canna, for her Citizens. Of seven thousand armed souldiers, there were found 600 that had the heart to break away, maugre the enemies, to escape and return with liberty, and with their armor, home into their country, notwithstanding there were forty thousand enemies to resist them: how easily then and safely, deem you, might a power almost of two Legions, have passed through them and gone their ways? Ye had had this day my Lords twenty thousand at Canninum, of right brave hardy, and loyal souldiers. But now which way can these cowards possibly be reputed true and faithful Citizens? (for valiant souldiers, I am sure, they will not think themselves, nor take up on them to be, unless a man could be periwaded and leave they were such) who would have impeached and withstood the self getting away even when they were at the point to open a passage: or that they rather do not envy now, both the safety and also the honor of others which they have won by provells: knowing in their own conscience, that their timoroussness and cowardlines was the cause of most ignominious and shameful service. They loved better to die within their pavilions, and to look for the day of fight and the enemy together: whereas in the still dead time of the night, they had the opportunity to escape. But how then? Although their hearts failed them to break away out of the camp, yet to defend the same manfully they had courage and valor enough. Besieged they were, strictly beleaguer'd: in the day and night for a good time; and in their armor forced to stand upon their guard, and manfully they quit themselves within their rampart, at length (God wot) when they had assayed and endured all extremities, when all succors failed them, sustentation of this life: so pinched with hunger and so enfeebled, that they were not able to bear their own armor and lift up their weapons: overcome at the last, rather with the necessity of mans frail nature than by the violence of the enemies they, good men gave over and yielded themselves. Nay forsooth, it is neither so nor so. The morrow morning when the sun arose, the enemies advanced and approached toward the rampart: and within two hours after, without any trial and hazard of skirmish, they delivered up their weapons and themselves. Thus ye see what their good service was, for two days together. When they should have stood to it in field, and fought, then they fled back to their tents: when they were to guard and defend their trench and rampart, they surrendered them to the enemy: good no where, neither in battle nor in basil. I agree to ransom you, you (I say) when you ought to have sallied forth of the camp, linger behind and stay still: and when need was, to abide by it and to defend it like valiant men, surrender camp, give up your weapons, and yield your own bodies to the enemy? Nay, but to speak what I think, my sentence is (my LL.) that these fellows deserve no more to be ransomed, then those to be delivered unto Annibal, who issued out of the camp, pierced through the midst of the enemies, and most valiantly saved themselves, for to do service another day in their country. When Manlius had said, albeit the prisoners were allied near in kindred to most of the Senators: yet over and besides the precedent of the City itself, which never from the first beginning favoured the redemption of such souldiers, as suffered themselves to be taken prisoners: the ransom itself, which amounted to a good round sum made them to pause: because they were unwilling both to empty the public treasury; (having already disbursed great sums, in buying up bond-slaves, and arming them for the wars) and also that Annibal (who as the voice went, was at a very great stand for money) should be enriched thereby. When this their answer was returned, it to wit, No redemption of captives: there was a new fit of weeping and wailing afresh added to the former sorrow of the people, namely for the loss of so many Citizens; and so with many a tear that they shed, with sundry piteous and moans which they made, they accompanied the Committees above said, as far as the gate. One of the ten went home to his house the same time, who upon a fraudulent and cautelous return made into the enemies camp, as is afore said, supposed he had acquit himself and disordered his confidence of his oath, Which being known and recommended to the Senat, they were all of mind that he should be apprehended, and attended with a good and sufficient guard at the charge of the City, and so carried back to Annibal. There goeth another report of these Captives, that first there came ten of them as Committees: and when it was debated in the Senat, and dook made, whether they should be admitted into the City or no: they were at length received, but so, as that they had no audience in the Senat: and upon longer stay made then they looked for, three others followed after them to wit, L. Scribonius, C. Calpurnius, and L. Maelius. Then by mediation of one Tribune of the Com, a kinsman of Scribonius, the matter was propounded in the Senat concerning the ransom of the captives: but granted it would not be: whereupon the three latter Committees returned to Annibal, and the other ten that first came, remained still behind: who upon a colourable occasion, had made an errand back to Annibal, when they were well onward on their way, to take a note, forsooth, of the names of the prisoners, and thereby seemed to have discharged their confidence of the oath. Also, that in the Senat there was hard hold, much question and variance, about the delivering of them again into the hands of Annibal: and how at last, they who were of opinion to have them rendered and sent back, failed of their purpose. by reason they came short by some voices and opinions, and that the other side carried it clean away. But by the next Censors that came in place, they were so marked and branded with all notes of disgrace and shame, that some of them immediately made themselves away with their own hands: and the rest forbare, not only the common place and market all their life time after, but also came not abroad, in manner, to be seen in the very streets, and never looked out of their doors. Thus a man may rather marvel, that authors should so differ among themselves, themselves, than from any of them pick out and discern the truth. But how much greater this overthrow and loss at Canna was, than any other before time, appeareth by this evident argument, in that those Allies, which ever to that day stood fast and sure unto them, now fell to shrink and fail: and surely for no earthly thing else, but because they began to despair of the main chance of the whole State and Empire. For hereupon there revolted unto the Carthaginians, the Arretians, the Calatins, the Hirpins, a part of the Apulians, all the Samnites, except the Petellins, all the Brutii in general, and the Lucans. And more then these, the Surrentins, and the whole trust well-near of the Greeks along the sea coast. The Tarentins, Metapontins, the Crotonians, the Locrians, and all the Gauls within the Alps. And yet for all these defections, and rebellions of their Allies and Subjects, were not the Romans one whit inclined to make any mention of peace, neither before the coming of the Consul, nor yet after that he was returned, and renewed again the dolorous remembrance of that woful overthrow received. And even at that very instant, so high minded was the City, and so far from drooping and being cast down, that as the Consul returned homeward from so great a defeat, whereof himself only was a principal cause, he was not only upon the way by all the States and companies of the City in great numbers, but also highly thanked, in that he despair'd not of the State of the Common-weal: who, if he had been the General and Leader of the Carthaginians, should have been sure to have inoaked for it, and endured all extremity for torment and punishment.

The Campanians revolted unto Annibal, Mago was sent to Carthage, with news of the victory at Canna: and in the entry of the Council-House, he poured out (on the floor) the golden rings which had been plucked from the fingers of the Romans there slain, which by report exceeded the measure of a Modius. Upon these tidings, Hanno the noblest personage among all the Carthaginians, persuaded with the Senat of Carthage, to sue unto the people of Rome for peace, but he prevailed not, by reason of the Bacchin side and faction, that gain-said him. Cl. Marcellus the Pretor fought fortunately before Nola, in a sally which he made out of the town against Annibal. The Army of Annibal fell to riot at Capua, and gave themselves to such sensuality, while they wintered there, that both in bodily strength, and also in courage of mind they became much enfeebled. Castilium was besieged by the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants within were driven by extreme famine, to eat thongs and leatherns, plucked from off their shields and targets, yea, and to feed upon Mice and Rats. They lived with Nuts which the Romans sent unto them down the river Volturnus. The body of the Senat was replenished by receiving unto them a new supply from out of the order of Knights or Gentlemen to the number of 197. L. Posthumus the Pretor, with together with his army defeated by the Gauls, and put to the sword, Cneus and Publius Scipios, vanquished Aldrubal in Spain, and had the conquest thereof. The remnant of the army defeated at Canna was sent away and confined into Sicily, and commanded not to depart from thence, before the war was fully finished. A league and society was concluded between Philip the King of the Macedonians and Annibal, Sempronius Gracchus the Consul, discomfited and slew the Captain. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate exploits achieved by T. Manlius the Lord Deputy in Sardinia, against the Carthaginians and the Sardi: who took the General himself Aldrubal, together with Mago and Hanno, prisoners. Claudius Marcellus the Pretor vanquished and defeated in a set battle before Nola, the army of Annibal: and was the first that put the Romans in some good hope of better success, after they had been routed out with so many foils and losses.

The three and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Annibal after the battle fought at Canna, and the winning and ransacking of both the Roman camps, dislodged anon, and was removed out of Apulia into Samium, being sent unto, for to come unto the Hirpins country, by Statius, who promised to betray and deliver the City of Cons into his hands. Now there was a Citizen of Cons, named Trebin, an able personage and of great name in his country. But the bend and faction of the Cons (a family of great power, by favour of the Romans) kept him down and over-weighed him: but rather than said any thing directly befitting the present estate of our fortune. For what have we let us at all, after this discomfiture of Canus, that we should be willing to have that supplied by our allies which is wanting? As who would lay, we had somewhat already. Should we demand of you footmen, as though we were furnished with horse? Should we say that we lacked money, as if money only were wanting, and nothing else? No, no, Fortune hath dealt hardly with us, that she hath left us just nothing, nor to much as that, which might be made up, and supplied by others. Our Legions of footmen, our Corners of horse, our armor and munition, our standards and Ensigns, horse and man, money and victuals, all is gone, lost, and perished; either in the battell or the morrow after in the ruin of our Camp when we were turned out of our tents and pavilions. And the more ye are not, O Campans, to aid and help up in this war; but in our behalf and for us, ye ought to take the whole charge of the war upon your own selves, against the Carthaginians. Can't you remember how in time past when your ancestors and forefathers were fearfully driven to keep within your walls, standing in dread and bodily fear, nor of the Samnites only your enemies, but also of the Sidicins: we took them into our protection, and defended them before Sarculia; and how for your sakes we began war with the Samnites, and maintained the same for the space of an hundred years, and in great variety of fortune, giving and taking sundry foils all the whiles. Over and besides, call to mind how we concluded an indifferent and equall league with you, to the disadvantage of neither parts: how we granted unto you the liberty of living under our own laws: and how at the last (a matter I wote of right great importance and consequence, before this our late overthrow) we granted unto a great part of you, the freedom and privilege of Burgheis, and parted with you on the franchises of our own City. And therefore ye ought of right (my Matters of Capua) to repune this loss and misfortune now received: to be as well yours as ours; and to make reckoning to defend the common state and country of both. It is neither Samnite nor Tuscane that we have to deal with; to whom if we lost and parted with our Empire yet it remained still within the compass of Italy: but the enemy that puniteth us, is a Carthaginian, drawing after him a train of footmen, who are not to much as born in Affrick, but coming from the farthest and most remote parts and bounds of the world, from as far as the streights of the Ocean, even from Hercules his pillars: void of the knowledge of all law, right, and discreence of condition without reason and discretion, and (in manner) without commerce of mans language. The fouldiers, so fierce and fell by nature, so cruell and merciless by use and custom, their captain hath withall made more wild and savage, by making bridges, cauleys, and high-waies, over heaps of dead mens bodies: and (which I labor to speak, by teaching them to eat men flesh, to see and endure these men to be their LL, whom feeding as they do upon the execrable meats and viands, which even to touch and handle without great horror we may not: to resort for justice as far as into Affrick and Carthage, and to suffer Italy to be reduced into a Province under the Numidians and Moors, what is he that would not detest and abhor, were he but born only within Italy? A worthy honour and immortal glory it will be for you, O ye Campans, if the Roman Empire and dominion, thus growing to ruin and falling down prostrate under the weight of this late overthrow, might by your fidelity and forcible power be raised and upheaved, and set upright again. I suppose ye have levied and enrolled already thirty thousand foot and four thousand horse, out of Campain: for corn, for corn ye have store and plenty: Now if your faith and truth be unwelcome to your wealth and fortune, neither shall Anniball find that he hath won the victory, nor the Romans feel that they have lost a journey. With this Oration thus ended, the Consul gave the Embassadors their discharge, and dismissed them. As they returned homeward, one of them, Sibus Virius by name, said thus unto his fellows, 'Now is the day come (quoth he) wherein the Campans may be able, not only to recover again the lands which in time past the Romans have wrongfully taken from them; but also obtaine and enjoy the sovereign rule & Empire of Italy. As for Anniball, we may on Iudee, on Ant, and captivate with him what articles and conditions we list our selves, to our best behoof and benefit: And it is all to nothing, that Anniball, having now dispatched and finished the war will of his own accord depart like a Conquerour into Affrick, and withdraw his forces out of these parts: so as the dominion of Italy shall be left wholly to the people of Capua. Virius had no sooner delivered these speeches, but they all applauded him and accorded thereto. And in such terms they related their Embassage, as all men thought no less but the Roman Empire and name was utterly perished and extinct for ever. Incontinently the Commons and the greatest part of the Nobility of Capua inclined to revolt and rebell: Yet by the continuance and authority of the Ancients and Elders the matter was laid and deferred for some few daies. At length, the greater part prevailed: whose opinion was, That the same Embassadors which were sent to the Roman Consul should be addressed in embassie unto Anniball. But I find in some Annall records, that before they went, and before their resolute determination to revolt, there was an Embassage sent from the Capuans to the City of Rome, demanding thus much, That if they meant to have any help and aid from them, one of their Consuls might be a Capuin. Whereat the Senat of Rome took much snuff and indignation, that the said Embassadors were commanded to void the Council-House, and a Sergeant sent after them at their heels, to set them out of the City: charging them at their perill, to take up their lodging that night without the territories of Rome. But because this demand jumpeth too neare to the like that the

Latines made long before: and both Calpurn and other Historians have (not without good reason) passed it over and said nothing thereof, I dare not avow it for a truth. Well, Embassadors there came unto Anniball, and concluded peace with him under their conditions, and covenants: Imprimis, That no General, Captain, or Magistrate of the Carthaginians should have any jurisdiction or power over a Citizen of Capua: Item, That no Citizen of Capua should be compelled against his will to serve in any wars, or execute the charge and office of a souldier. Item, That the Campans still enjoy their old Laws and Magistrates of their own: Item, That Anniball deliver unto the Campans three hundred Roman Captives: such as they themselves shall choole: whom they might mortgage and exchange for these three hundred horsemen of the Campans that were in garrison, and served for pay in Sicily. These were the Articles of the accord. But the Campans stuck not to do more than so, and to go farther than their capitulations: committing divers and sundry outrages. For the Commons suddenly at once apprehended all the Roman Captives over the confederate souldiers, yea, and attached other Citizens of Rome, that were either employed in any military charge, or otherwise occupied in their private affairs: and caused them to be clapt up within the stoves and hot houses, as in ward and late custody, where their breath being stifled and flopped up with exceeding heat, and steaming vapours, they were stifled, and died miserably. But there was one Decius Magnus, a man who wanted no means of sovereign authority, but only the sobriety, discretion, and wisdom of the Citizens with whom he lived: who withstood all that ever he could such enormous and audacious courtes, and endeavored to hinder the Embassage sent to Anniball. And so soon as he heard that Anniball was lending a garrison, he recourded unto his fellow Citizens the proud and lordly rule of Pyrrhus, the miserable and wretched thraldom of the Tarentines, as precedents sufficient to give them warning. He called them to a stand in open place and audience, first, that they should not receive the garrison into the City: then, that being admitted they should either be thrust out again: or rather if they would expiate and make amends by some valiant and memorable act for that shameful lend part of theirs, reverting to some of their most ancient Allies, yea, and kinsmen by blood, they should fall upon the Carthaginian garrison, and kill them every one, and to reconcile themselves again to the Romans. Anniball having intelligence of these plots (for they were not a forging and contriving in a corner) sent certain messengers to summon Magnus to repair unto his presence within his Camp. After that, seeing he stoutly denied to go, (for he pleaded that Anniball had no authority nor power to command a Citizen of Capua) he waxed wroth, and commanded the man to be apprehended, and to be hald perforce bound unto him. But fearing, upon better advice, lest by doing this violence some tumult might arise, and in the heat of blood break forth into an uncontrollable fray, he dispatched beforehand a messenger of purpose unto Marius Blotus, the Praetor or L. Governor of Capua: signifying, that the morrow next following he would be personally in Capua: and so with a small guard about him, he set forth of his Camp, and put himself on his journey. Marius assembled the people together, making proclamation, and warning them to be ready in all frequent solemnity, with their wives and children, to meet Anniball upon the way. They of the adverse side unto Magnus and the Romans performed this not only obediently, but also most effectually and with great diligence and endeavour. Yea, the common folk were very forward in this action, as desirous especially to see this great General and brave warrior, so noble and renowned for his many victories. Decius Magnus neither went forth to meet him, nor yet kept his house, because he would not seem to fear and carry a guilty conscience: but walked up and down idly for his pleasure in the Market place with one of his sons, and a few of his vassals and followers, whilst the whole City besides was busily occupied, and much troubled in the entertaining and beholding of this great Captain and Commander of the Carthaginians. Anniball being entered the City, incontinently required to have audience in their Council-House. Whereupon, the Nobles and principall Citizens of Capua requested him that he would not that day intend any weighty matters of importance, but himself in person solemnize with joy and mirth, as an high and festive holiday for his welcome thither. And albeit he was by nature haughty, and ready to fall into fits of anger, yet because he would not seem at his first coming to deny them any thing, he employed a good part of that day in feasting and viewing the City. Entertained and lodged he was and his whole train with the Annis, Celeres, Strenus, and Pacuvius, the most noble and honourable personages, and the wealthiest of all others. Thither unto him, Pacuvius Calpurnius (concerning whom I spake before, the principall man of that then into him, which reduced the City to the obedience and devotion of Anniball) brought bend and faction, which reduced the City to the obedience and devotion of Anniball brought his own son a young Gentleman, and said withall, that the youth kept continually with Decius, and that he was faine to pluck him away from his company and train, whose part he took, and stuck most firmly to him, in maintaining the old society and amity of the Romans, against the new League with the Carthaginians; and neither the bending and inclination of the whole City to the contrary side, nor yet the reverent majesty of a father, had yet driven him from his obdurate resolution. And for that time the father laboured with Anniball rather by way of prayer and intreaty, than by exclaiming and clearing his son, that he would not be discontented nor displeased with the young man. So he was overcome with the importunate request and plentifull teares of the father, and gave commandment, that heretogther with his father should be bidden to supper, at which feast he purposed to have the company of no other guests of all Capua, but only of his hostels that have him entertainment, and one Jubellius Taurica, land throne. Anibal having possessed himself of Capua, and solicited the Neapolitans on e again, and founded their minds-propounding before their eyes fear and hope, and all in vain led his forces into the Countrey of Nola, with this mind, not at first to go roughly with them to work, and by way of open hostility, because he was not out of all hope, that they would willingly come off and yield themselves: but in case they wavered, and answered not his hope and expectation in some good time, he would surely proceed against them in all extremity, and perthum to whatsoever they could endure or fear. The Senate, and especially the principal of them, continued still and pure in their alliance with the people of Rome; but the Commons (as their mind is desirous of alteration and to see a new world) enlined wholly to the side of Anibal, casting many doubts, and fears, that their lands and possessions should be wasted and spoiled withundry calamities and indignities that follow upon feare: neither wanted there heads and ring-leaders of a rebellion. Wherupon the Senate (for fear lest if they should seem to thwart and rolsome them) had not been able to wit-stand the violence of the multitude once up and driven to an head) closely dissimbled their intent and purpose, and so by temporizing, prevented a present mischief. For they made semblance that they liked well, and were resolved of revoking unto Anibal s. But upon what conditions and capitulations they should enter into new league and unity they knew not certainly so having taken another time they depicted in haste certain Embassadors unto the Roman Prator Murelus Claudius who remained with the Army at Capua, ad: cringing him in how great jeopardy the state of Nola stood, to wit That Anibal was al ready Lord of their lands and the Cithragians would soon be masters of the City unless they were rescued and relieved: that their Senat were driven to this shift. forto yield unto the Commons, and grant to rove whensoever they would have them; and by this means flaid them that they rebelled not over hastily. Marcellus after he had commended the Nolans, willed them with the same dissimulation to protit at time and hold off untill his coming: and in the mean while to conceal and keep secret to themselves, the dealings and treaties with him, and in no case to be known.

with the tidings of that unfortunate field, turned back again to Capitulum. And after they had spent certain daies there, as well fearing the Campains as suspected of them again, (for they deviled on both sides how to entrap one another, and how to avoid each others trains) and having received also certain intelligence, that in Capua there was treating about a revolt, and that Annibal was there received: they in one night let upon the Townsmen of Capitulum, and killed them, and got that part of the City which is on this side Fulturnus a river that runneth through it, and divideth it into two parts) and kept it still. Their number was well encreased by the coming of a cohort of four hundred and sixty Perusins, who likewise were driven to Capitulum, by the latter report and news, which a few daies before had turned the Prenetins thither. And surely there was sufficient almost of armed souldiers to man and defend the walls of that part, being off so small a circuit as they were, considering the town was flanked on the one side with the river. And again, for the proportion of corn (where of they had small store) they were men but too many. Annibal being now not far from them, sent before him the Getulians, under the conduct of a Captain named Isleca, with direction, that first if he could come to a parley, he should perswade with the Inhabitants within; and by fair words induce them to open their gates, and receive a garrison: but in case they continued still in their obstinacy, then to assail them by force, and give the attempt to enter into the City one way or other. When they were come under the walls, the barbarous Captain Isleca, supposing (because he heard no noise, and saw no stirring) that they had quit and abandoned the town and were fled, began to assail the gates, break open the locks, & burst the bars. But all at once on a sudden the gates were set open, and two cohorts well appointed and provided for that purpose within, falied forth with an exceeding great noise and tumult, overthrew a number of the enemies and beat them down. Thus when the first had the repulse and were set back, Annibal was sent with a greater power to second them, but was not able to make his party good with these squadrons that falied forth and charged upon him. At last Annibal himself encamped even before the wall, and with all his power and forces put together, made preparation to give assault to this little town & small garrison. And while he pressed hard upon them with flesh and hot assaults, in setting it round about, the enemies from off their walls, curtains, and turrets, let fire their shot so jointly upon the assailants, that he lost some of his best & most forward men. Once they issued forth of themselves upon a frascy, and minded to bid them battle, but by a counse of Elephants, fit between them and home, they had like to have been flurled forth and kept out, and so they made haste in great fear to recover the gates, and put themselves within the town again: having left, considering so small a number, a great fort: and more had died for it, but that the night parted the fray, and made an end of the skirmish. The morrow after, the assailants were all of them flurled to give assault and hot charge, but not before there was a mural Coronet of gold shewed, and promised unto him that first could scale the walls. And the General himself in their teeth and reproved them for being so long about the assaulting of a small and weak fort: to speak of, feared who upon a plain: whereas before they had won the strong town of Saguntum. He put them in mind both all and some, of C. Min. Turpiliensis, and Trebia. Then began they to set mantlets and pavises to, and to undermine. Many andundry enterprises were attempted, and nothing left undone, that either meer force could be performed, or by art and cunning devised. The Roman officers against their engines and labricks raised mounts, and platforms: yea and with countermines and cross trenches met with the mines of the enemies: so as both above ground, and underneath, they impeached all their attempts: so long, until Annibal for very shame was faine to give over his design for the present. And when he had fortified his standing Camp and placed there a mean guard for the defence of it, because he would not seem to have relinquished altogether the enterprise, he withdrew himself into Capua, there to winter. There he lodged his souldiers within house for the better part of winter: those souldiers, I say, who many a time and often had endured long, and held out against all travels and hardships that can possibly happen to the body of man: and never had been used to any good keeping, nor acquainted with delights and pleasures of the world. But even these men, whom no calamity, no misery could tame and overcome, were spoiled and undone with too much wealth and excessive dainties: and so much the rather as they more greedily fell thereto: and having not tasted thereof before, gave themselves wholly that way, and were deeply plunged and drowned therein. For sleeping on soft beds, wine and delicate fare, wenching and bathing, stews and hot-houses, idleness and taking ease, which by use and custom grew pleasant and delightful unto them every day more than other: had in much sort weakened their bodies, and made their hearts so effeminate, that from that time forward the reputation and name only of their victories past defended them more than any present strength and vigor they had: infomuch, as expert and skillfull warriors judged their Captain Annibal in more fault, and farther overleer in this action, than in not leading his Army straight forward to Rome after the battell before Canna. For, that fray might have been thought to have decried only the entire and final victory for a time, but this error and oversight seemed to disable him for achieving the victory for ever. So little retained he of his former old discipline that I assure you he went out of Capua again as if he had led some other Army and none of his own. For, not only they returned from thence moist of them intrangled and tazed in the love of harlots, but so soon as they came again to lie abroad on the bare earth under tents and pavilions covered with beasts hides, to march long journeys, and to taste of other military toil and labour: their bodies so tired, their hearts so faint, as if they had been

A saw souldiers, new come into the field: in such wise, as all the time of their summer abode in Camp many of them without licence and passport, would slip out of the way, and depart from their colours: and these flatter-backs had no other place of haunt to lurk in but Capua. Now when the winter season began to be more mild, and draw towards the Spring, Annibal brought forth his souldiers out of his wintering harbours and returned to Capitulum: where, albeit the assault ceased, yet the siege had continued to streight, that the townsmen and the garrison within the Fort, were driven to extreme necessity and want of victuals. Now the Captain over the Roman Camp was T. Sempronius [Gracchus] by reason that the Dictator was gone to Rome to take new Ambassadors. And as for M. Vellus, who was desirous for his part to relieve and succour the beleaged, by the intreaty of the Citizens of Nola and Acerria, who greatly feared the Campains, in case the garrison were once departed from them. And Gracchus, lying and keeping near unto Capitulum, stirred not one foot, by reason of the express commandment of the Dictator. That he should attempt nothing in his absence: albeit there came daily from Capitulum into the Camp such news, as would have moved and provoked the most patient man that was. For it was constantly reported, and for certain known, that some of them within the town, no longer able to endure the famine, threw themselves down headlong, and brake their necks: others stood unarmed upon the walls, offering their bare and naked bodies as a Butt and mark to the shot of arrows, and others dare, Gracchus grieved much to hear these piteous tidings, yet durst he not for his life, skirmish and fight without the warrant of the Dictator: & he saw full well that if he would convey corn and victuals unto them openly, fight he must: there was no remedy. Having therefore no hope at all to send any, but if it should be spied, he devised to fix many tuns and pipes with corn, that he had gotten together out of the country all about, and withall, to dispatch a messenger to the chief Magistrate of Capitulum, advising him that he should in the night take up all those vessels that came down the river. The night next following every man watched at the river side, according to the hope they conceived by the foresaid Roman messenger, and one eyed those tuns, lying down the mid of the stream: and the corn was equally divided among them all. Thus did they the morrow after, and the third day also. For, ever by night these vessels were let down into the water, and the same night they might easily come unto them: by reason whereof the sentinels and guards of the enemies were nothing ware of that which was done. But afterwards, the current growing more swift and rough, by occasion of continual rain that fell, the said tuns were some of them driven off the channel to the bank side, even where the enemies waited: and were emptied away, and flitting among the willows and others that grew along close unto the banks: whereof Annibal was adverted. And so from thence forward they tended the watch more lightly: that nothing sent down the river Fulturnus could escape them, and pass to the City. Afterwards, there was poured into the water great store of nuts from the Camp of the Romans: which floated down the channel unto Capitulum, and with grated skimmers of wicker were taken up. But at the last, they within the town were driven to this poor shift and extremity, for to take their thongs and bridle reins, to plank of the leather from their shields & bucklers, and make them soft in softening water, and prove how they could eat them. Nay, they spared not so much as mice, and rats, nor any other like vermin. Nor there was not a weed nor a root that they could come by upon the banks and terraces under the walls, but they gathered and digged up. And when the enemies had turned up with a plough all the green sward of the counter-leap without the walls, they within cast turpentine upon the mould. Whereupon Annibal made a shout at it, and cried aloud: What shall we here about Capitulum so long, until these rapes be come up and grown. And whereas before that time, he would never vouchsafe to hear of any composition and agreement now at last he was contented to take reason, and be conferred withall about the ransom of as many as were freemen within the Town. And it was covenanted between him and them that they should pay for their redemption seven ounces of gold a peece. So upon this ill promise made, and security given, they yielded themselves: and were kept bound in prison until they had made full payment of the gold aforesaid. After which, they were sent back under safe conduct to Cumes. For this is more like to be true, than the report which goeth. That there were sent out of them certain harlots, whom he fell upon them and slew them in the way. Most of them were Prenetins. And whereas, there were of them in all five hundred and seventy in garrison the one half well near, were either by sword or hunger consumed: All the rest, together with their Prator Manlius (one who a little time had been a Scribe or Notary) returned safe unto Preneste. In memorial and testimony of this his Statue was erected in the market place of Preneste, armed in his uralle, clad in a long robe, with his head covered: and three other images, with a title or inscription engraven in a plate of Brass, with this tenor: That Manlius had made a vow for those souldiers who lay in garrison with him at Capitulum. And the same title also was engraven under three other images, let up in the Temple of Fortuna. The Town of Capitulum was restored again to the Campains, with a strong garrison of 700 souldiers deducted out of the army of Annibal: for fear lest when he was departed once from thence, the Romans should assail them.

The Senat of Rome by vertue of a decree, granted unto those souldiers of Preneste double wages, with five years vacation & rest from warfare. And when to gratifie them further for their valiant service, they made offer unto them of the Burgessie and freedom of Rome, they chose rather to remain still at home, and would not change their own Country. But what befell unto the Perusins, mander in stead of himself, the Generals of the Roman armies, who had set foot in Spain, were such, as he might hardly make head against them with equal puissance. And therefore if they had any regard of Spain, he advised them to send one to succeed him with a strong power: for he should have his hands full, and enough to do in the Province, fall out things as unseasonably as they could. These letters, albeit at the first fight they greatly troubled the Senat, yet because the Italian affairs seemed of more moment and greater importance, they wrought no alteration in their intended course, either for Asdrubal himself, or his forces. Howbeit Hamilcar was sent with a complete and competent army, and a greater Armado, both for the holding of Spain in their allegiance, and also for their defence by Sea and Land. Who having passed over with all his power, as well for Land-service as the Sea, fortified his camp, drawn his ships ashore, laid them up in drie Land, and emptied them strongly all about: himself in person with his elect and most choice men of arms, made what halt possibly he could, through nations partly enemies, partly doubtful and untruly, and staid not either in one place or other (but evermore standing upon his guard) until he was come to Asdrubal. After he had declared unto him the order decreed by the Senat, and what he had in commission, and taken himself direction likewise from him, in what manner the war in Spain was to be managed, he returned back again to his own camp. In which voyage to and fro, he travelled lately by no one thing more than by speedy expedition. For he was ever gone from a place, before the people could agree together, and make head against him. Now Asdrubal before that he dilloved and set his army on foot out of those parts, levied sums of money of all the Cities and States under his jurisdiction: for well he knew, that Asdrubal had paid lively before him, for his passage through certain countries: and as well he witt befides, that the Gauls he was fain to wage, for amongst them no money, no men. And if he undertook and entered upon that great expedition, poor and bare of silver, he had never reached so far as the Alps. Thus having in great hast raised and collected his monies he came down to the river Iberus.

When the Romans heard of the proceedings and designs of the Carthaginians, and likewise of the journey of Asdrubal: both the Generals (laying all other matters apart) prepared to join their whole forces together, to oppose themselves, and to withstand such intended attempts: supposing, and considering, that if Asdrubal (who by himself alone was an enemy to Italy hardly supportable) were once ended, upon these careful cogitations being grieved and perplexed, they assembled all their power near to Ilernis: and after they had passed over the river, and long consulted whether they should encamp themselves and abide the coming of the enemies to bid them battail; or by invading and assailing the allies and subjects of the Carthaginians, to lay the enemy and hinder his intended journey: they resolved at length and made preparation to assault Ibera (so named of the river) near by the richest and most wealthy City at that time, of all others in those parts. Whereof when Asdrubal was advertised, he set to help his friends, advanced himself likewise to set upon another City lately yecded to the Romans, and reduced unto their subjection. And so the Romans after they had begun to lay siege to Ibera, gave over that enterprise, and made head against Asdrubal himself. And for some few dayes they lay incamped five miles asunder one from the other, not without some light skirmishes: but never came to pitch a fair field. At length upon one and the same day (as if they had been agreed afore) they happened on both sides to set out the signal of battail, and to come forth with all their power into the plain ground. The Romans stood arranged in three battalions: one part of the Infantry was placed before the standards in the vanguard, another Regiment belloved behind in the reargard: the men of arms flanked the sides like wings. On the other part, Asdrubal streghthned his main battel with Spaniards: in the right point he marshalled the Carthaginians, in the left the Africans. As for the auxiliary and mercenary Hostemen, whom he waged and hired: such as were Numidians, he ordained about the Carthaginians footmen to guard them: the rest that were Africans, he distributed and disposed about the skirts and edges of the battalions. Neither were all the Numidians placed in the right flank, but such as after the guise and manner of Vaulters, led two or three Horsey spee: and were often times in the mids of the hottest conflict, to leap among as they were from their wearied horie to another fresh one. So nimble are they themselves, and so triable and well taught to their hands are their Horses. Thus stood they arranged on both sides in order of battail. The Captains of either part for hopes in manner nothing unequal: for neither in number or quality of souldiers, was there any great oddes between them: Mary, for courage and heart, there was great difference and inequality in the souldiers themselves. For the Romans (notwithstanding they fought far from home) were so periwaded by their leaders, that they fought for Italy and the City of Rome: and therefore as if the whole hope of their life return into their country were to be tried and decided in this one battail, they resolved either to win the day or to dye for it. On the other side, the souldiers were not so resolute, for most of them being Spaniards, would have chosen rather to be conquered and overcome in Spain, than with conquest and victory to be drawn into Italy. And therefore at the first shock, when fiercely the darts and javelins were aned and let flye, their main battail retreated: and so soon as the Romans with great violence redoubled the charge, they turned their backs and fled. Howbeit in both flanks the fight was hot enough. The Carthaginians of the one side, the Africans on the other, charged the Romans very hard, and fought for against them, as if they had them invironed round about with their battalions. But when as the whole power of the Romans were once rallied and gathered red together in the mids, they were strong enough to remove and let back the wings of the enemies. So they maintained fight in two divers places at once. But born in the one and the other, the Romans (after they had discomited the main battail in the mids) were no doubt, much better, as well in number, and also in strength and vigour of men. Many a tall flow was there slain. And had not the Spaniards at the first when the battail was leaved, and fled again by heaps, very few of the whole battail had escaped and remained alive. The Hostemen fought little or not at all. For the Moors and Numidians, so soon as they perceived the battail to flye into the loss of ground, preferred all on a suddain fled as fast as they could, and left the sides and flanks of the said battail naked, driving before them the Elephants without. And even Asdrubal himself, who maintained the skirmish to the very last, escaped with some few men of the thickest multitude and execution. The Romans took their camp and filled it. This battail was of such import and consequence, that it caused all the Spaniards, who were before but wavering to turn wholly to the Roman side, and left Asdrubal no hope at all, to pass with his forces into Italy, nor to come as to make head with safety in Spain. The news hereof being bruited abroad and sent to Rome, by the letters of the two Sopio, great joy there was, not to much for the victory, as because Asdrubal was tied by the foot, and staid for coming into Italy.

Amids these exploits in Spain, * Petelia (a City of the Brutii having endured the siege and many assault for certain moneths) was finally won by Hamilcar, one of Asdrubal Captains. But that victory cost the Carthaginians much blood, and many a sore wound. No force nor violence overcome the besieged Petelians more, than very famine. For having consumed and carenap all food of corn, all flesh of four footed beasts whatsoever: they were driven at length to feed and live upon thumashers lether, weeds, and roots, tender stalks of trees, and the crops of flinders and brambles: and they gave not over so long as they were able to stand on their legs upon the walls, and bear their annoy.

Amidst after the winning of Petelia, conducted his army against * Conversina, which being not so valiantly defended, was within few dayes surrounded up into his hands. Next about the same time, a power of the Brutians also, laid siege unto Gravina, a City built and inhabited by the Greeks, and in times past, mighty in men and munition: but now at this time so distressed with manifold and grievous calamities, that of all ages one with another, they were not able to make twenty thousand men. And therefore no marvel, if the enemies were soon masters of the City, being so destitute as it was of Citizens to defend it. Only the Cade they kept still, into which there were looke that escaped in that tumult when the City, was taken, out of the mids of the massacre. The Locrians likewise revolted unto the Brutii and the Carthaginians, by reason that the common multitude were fraudulently betrayed by the chief and principal Citizens. The Rhagines only of all that country, continued both true unto the Romans, and also at their own liberty to the very last. The same disposition to revolt, was to be seen even in Sicily, in so much as the very house of Hiero was not clear and free in all parts from rebellion. For Gelo his eldest son, having in contempt both the old age of his father, and also (after the overthrow at Canna) the society and friendship of the Romans, turned unto the Carthaginians. And he had, no doubt, made a general alteration in Sicily, but that his death came between and cut him off: which hapned so jump, even when he was warming the multitude, and soliciting his friends to rebellion, that his very father himself was drawn into deep despiration that he took his life away. These were the occurrences that fell out that year with variable event, in Italy, Affrick, Sicily, and Spain.

In the end of the same year, Q. Fabius Maximus moved the Senat, and made request, that the Temple of Venus Erycina, which he had vowed being Dictator, might now be dedicated. And the Senat made a decree. That Titus Sempronius, Consul elect, should so soon as he was entered into his office, propose unto the people, that they would create two Duumvirs for the dedication of Temples. And in honour of Amulius Lepidus, who had been Consul twice, and Augustus, his three sons, Lucius, Marcus, and Quintus, exhibited certain funeral games for three dayes space: and a shew in the Common place likewise for three dayes together, of two and twenty pair of sword-fencers, to fight at sharp to the death. The Consul Ennius, C. Lelarius, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, now Consul elect, who in his Edict had been General of the Hostemen, set out the Roman games, which were renewed and continued still for three dayes. Likewise, the Playes of the Commons, were thrice exhibited by M. Aemilius Cotta, and M. Claudius Marcellus. Now after three yeares expired of the Punct of war, T. Sempronius the Consul, began his government upon the * Ides of March. As for the Patrons, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who had afore-time been Consul and Centor, obtained by lot the jurisdiction of the Citizens: and M. Valerius Corvinus, of the strangers and aliens. To Appius Claudius Pulcher was allotted the government of Sicily: and to Q. Mutius Scaevola of Sardinia. M. Marcellus was by the people allowed to have the authority of a Vice Consul, in regard that he above all the Roman Captains, after the defeat of Canna, managed his affairs and warred prosperously in Italy.

Now the very first day that the Senat was assembled in the Capitol, they decreed upon the first motion, that within the compass of that year, there should be levied a double tax or tribute: and that one single tribute should be forthwith gathered, for present pay to all the souldiers, having those that served at Canna. Then concerning the armies this order was set down: Imprimis, that T. Sempronius the Consul, should appoint the two legions of Citizens a certain day day to meet at Cales. Item, that six legions should be conducted to the camp of Claudius above Suessula. Item, that the legions which there were (and those consilied for the most part of the residue of the Cannian army) Ap. Claudius Pulcher the Pretor, should put over Sea into Sicily; and as for those that were in Sicily, they should be transported to Rome. Item, unto that army which was appointed to meet by a day at Cales, M. Claudius Marcellus was sent; and he was commanded to conduct the legions of the Citizens to the camp of Claudius. Last of all, to receive the charge of the old army, and to lead it into Sicily, T. Metellus Croto Lieutenant, was sent by Ap. Claudius. Men looked at first, and yet they said nothing, that the Consul should call an assembly for the creating of a Collegue unto him. But after that they saw that M. Marcellus was sent out of the way (as it were of purpose) whom above all others they were desirous to be the Consul for that year, in regard of his notable good service whiles he was Pretor, there arose much muttering in the Senat-house. Which the Consul perceiving: "My L.L. quoth he, it was for the good of the Common-wealth, that both M. Claudius should go into Campania to exchange the armies: and also that the Election of Consuls, should not be proclaimed, until that he were returned again "from thence, with dispatch of that business which he had in charge: that ye might have a Consul, such a one as the present condition of the State required, and your selves most desired. So there was no more speech of the election, until Marcellus was come back again. In this mean time were two Duumvirs created, Q. Fabius Maximus for the dedication of one Chappell Vestis Erycina, and T. Othacilius Crassus, of another to the Goddess Mentis. Both stand upon the Capitol hill divided under no more than with one only conduct of water passing between. And as concerning the three hundred Campanian Horsemen, who had served out their full time of warfare faithfully, and were come to Rome, a motion was propounded to the people, that they should be enfranchised Citizens of Rome: and in like manner, that they should be reputed as free Citizens of Cumae. From the day afore, that the Capuans revolted from the people of Rome and rebelled. The chiefest cause of proposing this act, was this, because themselves denied flatly that they knew, to whom they did appear, seeing they had abandoned their old native country: and yet were not enrolled and incorporated into that state, unto which they had retired. After this Marcellus was come again from the army, the solemn day of election of a Consul in place of L. Postumius, was published. And with exceeding great content of all men, Marcellus was chosen: and forthwith was to be begin his Magistracy. At whose first entrance, it hapned to thunder: and the Augurs being called to give their opinion of it, pronounced, that they thought he was not rightfully created. And the Senators gave it out commonly and bruited abroad, that the Gods were not well pleased therewith, because (forsooth) two Consuls were elected of the commonalty (a thing never seen before.) Whereupon Marcellus resigned up his place, and in his room was substituted Fabius Max. the third time.

That year the Sea burned. At Sinuessæ a cow brought forth a horse foal. And at Lanuvium in the Temple of Iuno Hepta, certain statues or images dropped with blood: and about that Temple it rained stones. For which shew, there was solemnised, according to the customeable manner, a Novendial sacrifice. The other prodigious signs likewise were expit with great care and heedful regard. The Consuls then, parted their armies between them. Fabius took charge of those forces which had been commanded by M. Junius the Dictator. Sempronius had the conduct of all the voluntary souldiers, and besides of 25000 of Auxiliaries lent from the confederates. M. Valerius the Pretor had the legions appointed for him, that were returned out of Sicily. M. Claudius the Vice-consul, was sent unto that army, which lay in garrison at Noli, above Suessula, and the Pretors took their journey into Sicily and Sardinia. The Consuls, whensoever they would assemble the Senat, proclaimed that the Senators, and all others that had lawful authority to speak their mind and deliver their opinion in the Councel-House, should meet at the gate Capena. The Pretors, those that were Judges in the Court, and to whom the civil jurisdiction appertained, erected their Tribunal seats and places of Affizes at the publick Fish-pond, and thither they commanded all writs to be returned, and appearance there to be made. And for that year all pleas and judgements of causes passed there.

In this mean time news came to Carthage from whence Mago the brother of Annibal was minded to transport and let over into Italy 2000 footmen, and 1500 horsemen, 20 Elephants, and 1000 talents of silver, together with a guard and supply of 60 galleys. That in Spain things went untowardly: and that all the Cities of Spain (in a manner) were revolted unto the Romans. Some there were of opinion, to withdraw Mago with that fleet and power of his, from the enterprise of Italy into Spain. Considering there was good hope shewed of a suddain recovery again Sardinia, for that there was but a small power of Romans there: and Cornelius the old Lord Deputy, well acquainted with the State of the Province, was now upon his departure from thence, and a new expected in his turn. Over and besides, that the Sardinians were weary already of the Roman government, which they had so long endured, as who the year that past was, had tyrannised over them chiefly, and exercised their authority with oppression, covetously imposing upon them hard exactions and tributes, and levying of them a most unjust taxation and contribution of com: and finally they wanted nothing but an head, upon whom they might relieve themselves. To this effect there was an Embassage sent secretly from the Lords and Princes of the Island. And the principal actor and procurer thereof, was Hieracius, a man in those days of greatest authority and power among them. Upon these tidings aforelaid, hapning so just at one time, they were both

A disquieted and also refreshed. So they sent Mago with his fleet, and other forces into Spain: and they chose for the expedition into Sardinia, Afranius (surnamed Calvus), for the L. General, furnished and appointed with as great a power almost, as Mago had.

At Rome likewise, the Consuls having dispatched the affairs of the City, addressed themselves to the war. T. Sempronius appointed Sinuessæ to be the Rendez-vous, where the souldiers should meet at a certain day. And Q. Fabius, by an order and direction from the Senat, made an Edict, That all men should before the first day of July next ensuing, gather all their corn out of the countries, and convey the same into the principal walled Towns: proclaiming that whosoever did not accordingly, their fields he would lay waste: sell their servants in port sale at the spear, and let their farms and villages a fire. Not so much as the Pretors themselves (created for civil jurisdiction and to decide law matters) were freed and exempted from the conduct of war. As for Valerius the Pretor, he was appointed to go into Apulia, for to receive the army of Terentius: and when the legions were returned out of Sicily, to employ them especially for the guard and defence of that country: and that the army of Terentius should be sent with some one of the Licutenants. And M. Valerius had as sail allowed him, to keep and defend all the Sea coasts between Brundisium and Tarentum. The like number of ships was assigned to Q. Fulvius the City Pretor, for to guard the River side, near adjoining to the City of Rome. C. Terentius the Proconsul had in charge to take up by commission souldiers in the Picene country, and to guard those quarters. And T. Othacilius Crassus, after that he had dedicated the Temple of Mentis in the Capitol, was sent into Sicily, as Lord Admiral of the Armado there.

Upon this war between two of the mightiest Cities, and most puissant states of the World, there was not a King and Prince, nor a Nation under Heaven, but was moved. Among whom Philip King of the Macedonians, had an eye thereto, and was more intertive in that he was creerer unto Italy, and only divided from thence by the Julian Sea. He at the first, when the bruit came to his ears, That Annibal was passed beyond the Alps: as he joyed much, that there was war kindled between the Romans and the Carthaginians, to as long as it was uncertain, whether nation was the stronger, he wavered in mind and was in suspense, whether of the twain he should wish to have the victory. But after that he heard once, that in three several battails one after another, Annibal and the Carthaginians had gotten the better hand, he inclined to the fortunate side; and sent Embassadors unto Annibal: who falling off, and desirous to avoid the Havens of Brundisium and Tarentum, which were guarded and kept by the Romans fleet, arrived and landed at the Temple of Iuno Lucina: and so through Apulia, travelling toward Capua, chanced to light upon the midst of the Romans corps de guard, and were brought before M. Valerius Leuvinus the Lord Deputy, being then encamped before Nuceria. Where Xenophanes, the principal of the Embassadors, bashed not to say, That he was sent from King Philip, to treat and conclude a league and amity with the people of Rome, and had commission and direction to the Consuls, to the Senat likewise and people of Rome, to that effect. Valerius taking great contentment to hear of this new society and friendship with so noble a King, especially upon the rebellion of so many old allies, courteously intreated and friendly entertained this false hearted enemy, in stead of a truly friend: and appointed diverse to accompany him for ward, to guide him carefully in the ways, and to shew him what places, what passages and streights were held and kept, either by the Romans, or the enemies. Xenophanes with these instructions passed through the midst of the Roman guards into Campania, and to the next way arrived at the camp of Annibal, and made a league and amity with him, under these conditions and capitulations. Imprimis, That King Philip should with a right puissant Armado (for that he was supposed able to let out 200 sail) pass over into Italy, wait and spoil all the Sea coasts, and to his power maintain war by Sea and Land. Item, That when the war was finished, all Italy, together with the very City of Rome should be possessed by the Carthaginians and Annibal, and unto him all the pillage and booty likewise should belong. Item, When Italy was thus subdued, that they should sail into Greece, and wage war with what Princes there they pleased, and that all the Cities of the main, and the islands which lay to Macedony, should fall unto Philip, and be annexed to his Kingdom. In these terms, and upon these Articles, in manner, was the league concluded and confirmed between the General Annibal, and the Embassadors of the Macedonians: and with them were sent back unto the King for the better ratifying of the said covenants, certain Legats, to wit, Grigo, Bosar, and Mago, who arrived together at the same Temple aforelaid, of Iuno Lucina, where they did closely a ship at anchor, expecting their return. From whence being departed, they were not so soon launched out into the deep, and had taken the open Sea, but they were deceried by the Roman fleet that guarded the coasts of Calabria. Q. Fulvius Flaccus made out certain Corycians, to pursue and fetch in that ship. Whereupon, the Macedonians began to flie, but seeing themselves overmarched in twinnels of sail, and not able to make way with them, they yielded themselves unto the Romans, and were presented unto the Admiral: Who demanded what they were, from whence they came, and whither they were bound. Xenophanes who had already spied so well by making of a lye, began to cog again, and say, That he was sent from Philip unto the Romans: that he came unto M. Valerius, because to him only he was able to pais in safety, but could not possibly get beyond Campania, being so strongly kept with garisons of the enemies. But afterwards, upon the sight of the Carthaginian habit and apparel, they began to suspect the Embassadors of Annibal: and they being questioned withal, their speech and language bewrayed them. Then was their retinue taken apart, and threatened to confels. Letters also were found upon them, sent from Anibal unto Philipp, concerning the peace between the King of the Macedonians and Anibal. Upon these matters thus detected and certainly known, it was thought good to convey the Embassadors and their Company with all speed prisoners to Rome, unto the Senat there, or unto the Consuls whosoever they were. To this purpose were chosen five Pinissles that were most swift, under the conduct of L. Voltur Arates, who had his direction and charge to part the Embassadors in several ships, and keep them sure wander: and to take good heed, that they neither talked nor conferred together.

About the same time it happened at Rome, that An. Cornelius Mammula, upon his departure out of the Province Sardinia, made report in what state the Island stood; namely, that they all inclined to rebellion and war: that Marius who succeeded after him, presently upon his first coming, by reason of the ill air and unwholesome water, was fallen into a sickness, not to quick and dangerous, as chronick and tedious, and would not be able long to endure the service of war: that the army there, as it was insufficient to guard and keep in good order a quiet and peaceable Province, for could not hold out with the war that was like to ensue. Whereupon the L.L. of the Senat gave order, that Q. Fulvius Flaccus, should levy and enrol 3000 foot, and 200 horse, and provide that this legion should pass over with all speed into Sardinia: and let thence with whom it pleased him to conduct and manage the war until Marius were recovered of his sickness. For this intent was T. Manlius Torquatus sent Governor; one, who had been twice Consul and Censor, and in his Consulship subdued the Sardinians.

Near about the same time, there was an Armado sent out from Carthage unto Sardinia, under the leading of Asdrubal (named Calvus, and being far rotted and braten with tempests, was called upon the Barbar Barbar: where (so far out of order was not only the ship-rackling, but also the way keels and bodies of the ships to shaker) they drew upon the ships to shore, and whiles they layed there about calling and naming them again, they spent much time.

In Italy whiles the war began to slacken and waxe cold by reason that after the battail of Cume, the strength of the one part was much abated, and their force decayed, and the courage of the other, well allayed and much cheemish: the Campians upon their own heads began to contrive, how to reduce the State of Cume under their obedience, first enticing them to revolt from the Romans: and seeing that none would not speed and take effect, they devised by a fraudulent promise to compels and entrap them. The Campians use yearly to sacrifice a sick steed and sacrifice in a certain place called Hama: and they gave notice unto the Cumans, that the whole Senat of Capua would resort thither: requesting the Senat of Cume likewise to meet them there, for to confer and consult together in common, how both Cities, the one and the other, might have the same friends and the same enemies, and no other: giving them withal to understand, that they minded there to have a good guard about them of armed men, for fear of some foul play and dangerous attempt from the Romans. The Cumans, albeit they suspected some treachery, denied nothing, supposing thereby to colour and cover their own crafty intended aignment. Now all this while, T. Sempronius the Roman Consul, having surveyed and purged his army at Sinuesa, at which place he had made proclamation, that his forces should meet together: passed over the River Vulturnus, and encamped near unto Linternum: where because the Soldiers in the standing camp had nothing else to do, he exercised them to run often therace and skirmish in array, to the end that the raw Soldiers (for such were the volunteers for the most part) might by use and practise learn how to follow their colours in good order, and in the time of battail know their own ranks and ensignes. In these kinds of training, the special care that the General had, and the only thing that he aimed at, was their concord and good agreement. And for this purpose, he charged the Lieutenants, and the Colonels and Captains, that they should not call in any mans teeth one or other, their fortune and condition aforesaid, thereby to breed any discord and heartbating among the companies: and that the old experienced Soldiers should suffer themselves to be beat equal in estate to the new learners: and those that were born free unto the volunteers, who had been slaves: reputing them all of birth good enough, and of gentle blood descended, unto whom the people of Rome had vouchsafed to commit their armor and ensignes: saying, that the same fortune which had driven them to do, forced them likewise to maintain the same, and make the best of it, now it was done. The Captains were not more careful in giving the good lessons and instructions, but the soldiers were as diligent to observe the same: and within a while their hearts and affections grew to be linked and united together, that they forgot generally, in what degree and of what condition each soldier entered into service. Whiles Gracchus was busied hereabout, the Embassadors of Cume certified him, what kind of Embassy came unto them from the Campians, a few dayes before, and what answer they had returned: advertising him that their festival day was to be holden three dayes after: that not only the whole Senat would be present, but also the camp and army of the Campians. Gracchus having commanded the Cumans to convey all that they had out of the fields and territories about, into their City, and themselves to keep within their walls: himself the day before the solemnity aforesaid of the Campians, removed his power to Cume, and there encamped. Now Hama is three miles off from thence. The Campians by this time were assembled there in great number, according to appointment: and not far from the place, Marius Alfius the chief head Magistrat of Capua, was incamped closely with fourteen thousand soldiers. He, what with preparation of the sacrifice, and contriving withal, the deceitful train of treachery, was more busy and careful thereabout, than either in fortifying his camp, or in any other military action. Thus for three dayes continued this festival sacrifice at Hama. And ever in the night season it was performed: so, as before midnight all was done and finished, Gracchus supposing that a good time for his ambush to be employed, having set certain warders before the gates, that no man might go forth to give intelligence, caused the soldiers betwixt the six and tenth hour of the day, (from noon until four of the clock) to refresh themselves and take their sleep: that in the beginning of the dark night, they might assemble together at the watch-word or signal given them. And about the first watch he commanded to display their Ensigns and advance forward: and thus with a still march, he arrived at Hama by midnight, surprised the hold of the Campians, and entered all the gates at once, being negligently guarded, by reason of their overwatching. Some he killed lying along fast asleep: others, as they returned unarmed from the sacrifice. In this night-tumult there were slain more than two thousand, with Marius Alfius himself their leader: and 43 Ensigns taken and carried away. Gracchus with the loss of fewer than one hundred of his soldiers, having won the camp, retired speedily to Cume, for fear of Anibal, who lay in fort encamped upon Tifata over Capua. And (as he was a provident man and of great foresight) nothing was he deceived in his opinion. For so soon as this defeat was reported at Capua, Anibal supposing that he should at Hama find the army of the Romans (consisting for the most part of raw soldiers, and those, bondfellowes) jocund and lusty above measure, and insolent upon their fresh victory, busied in rifling their dead enemies thus conquered, driving away booties, and charged with pillage: removed his forces in halt, and marched apace beneath Capua: and encountered with some of the Campians that were fled, whom he cauled between two guards to be conducted late to Capua, and such as were hurt and wounded, to be set in waggons and carried thither. Himself found at Hama the camp empty and void of enemies, and nothing there but the tokens of a fresh massacre, and the dead bodies of his friends and allies lying here and there scattered. Somewhere were that advised him presently to advance forward to Cume, and to assault the Town. And albeit Anibal was willing enough thereto, and passing desirous (seeing he could not come by Naples) to have Cume at least, a maritime port-Town, as well as the other: yet because his soldiers had brought nothing with them but their weapons, as being led forth to march in such haste, he retired back again to his fort and camp upon Tifata. From whence, at the important prayers of the Campians, the day following he furnished himself with all the Ordinance and Ensigns meet for the assault of a City, and returned toward Cume: and having waited the territory thereof, he encamped himself a mile from the Town. Then Gracchus, more for shame, that he might not seem to leave his associates in such necessity, (who craved protection and recommended themselves to him, and to the people of Rome) than for any confidence and trust that he reposed in the strength of his army, layed in Cume. Neither Fabius the other Consul, who was encamped at Cales, durst let his army over the River Vulturnus: as having been busied first at Rome in renewing the Auspices and bird-flights: and after that, a troubled also about the fearful prodigious signs which were reported one after another. And when he sought expiation thereby of his officers, the Sooth-sayers made answer and said, That they could not perceive that the Gods were appeased and pacified for all that he did. Thus whiles Fabius upon these occasions was kept back, Sempronius was besieged, yes, and by this time assaulted, with his works and engines of battery. One mighty great Tower of wood there was erected against the Town. Against which, the Roman Consul raised another from the very wall somewhat higher than it: for that heuled the wall (which of itself was of good height) in stead of a ground-work, and planted thereon strong posts and piles of timber to bear up the forehead frame. From thence, at first the soldiers within, defended the Town and Walls with stones, with long poles and perches and other instruments to lance against the assailants. But at length seeing the other turret coming forward even close to the Town wall, they slung thereon at once much firework, and burning matter: at which fires the multitude of armed men for fear leapt headlong down the turret: and withal, they of the Town issued out at two gates at once, discomfited the guards of the enemies, and drove them into their camp: so as that day Anibal was more like one besieged himself, than laying siege unto others. There were of Carthaginians slain about fourteen hundred: forty wanting one were taken prisoners alive, such as about the walls and their Corps de guard stood careless and negligent, fearing nothing less than a fall out of the Town, and were suddenly at unawares taken and inspired. Gracchus founded the retreat, and cauled his men to retire within the Walls, before the enemies after their sudden triumph could be rallied together. The morrow after, Anibal (supposing that the Consul in his rust for this happy hand, would come into the field to fight a set battail) arranged himself in array between his Camp and Cume. But after that, he saw no stirring at all from the usual guard and defence of the City, and nothing put to the rash hazard of doubtful hope, he retired to Tifata, without any good at all done.

At the very same time that the siege was raised before Cume, Titus Sempronius (surnamed Longus, fought fortunately in Lucania before Grummenum, with Hanno the Carthaginian: slew more than two thousand of his enemies, lost himself two hundred and eighty men, and went away with 41 ensigns. Hanno thus driven out of the confines of Lucania, retired himself back into the country of the Brutii: And M. Fulvius the Pretor, recovered by force from the Hippias.

upon the greatest Camp, whereof Ardubal was the General. Thither also repaired the two Captain and two Armies of the Carthaginians, when they saw that the whole trial of the matter was there to be determined, and so they issued out of their tents and fought. Therefore thousand enemies were that day in field and about 16000 Romans: and yet the victory went to clear with the Romans, that they slew more of their enemies than they were in number themselves, took prisoners more than three thousand men, and not many under a thousand horie, and withal won 60 military ensigns wanting one, and killed five Elephants in the battel: and to conclude, were Lords that day of three Camps. After that the siege was raised from Himurgis, the Carthaginian armies were led to the assault of the town Incubili, having their companies made up and supplied again out of the Province, (as being a nation of all others most desirous and eager of war, so there be hope of pillage or good recompence) and at that time especially full of young and inftrymen. Where there was a second field fought with like fortune of both sides as before. There were slain above thirteen thousand enemies and more than 3000 taken prisoners, besides two and forty military ensigns, and nine Elephants. Then in a manner, all the Cities of Spain revoluted to the Romans. And far greater exploits were that summer performed in Spain, than in Italy.

The four and twentieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the four and twentieth Book.

Herome. King of the Syracusians (whose grandfather Hiero had been a friend unto the people of Rome) sent unto the Carthaginians, and for his cruelty and pride, was by his own people martyred. Titus Sempromus Gracchus the Pro-Consul, had a fortunate battel near Beneventum, against the Carthaginians, and Hanno their General, through the help especially of the bravest, whom for their good service, he commanded to be made free. Claudius Marcellus the Consul laid siege unto Syracusa in Sicily, which wholly in manner was taken away and turned to the Carthaginians. Wars were proclaimed against Philip, King of the Macedonians, who in a night-scurish was surpris'd, discomfited, and put to flight: and with his army well near disarmed, escaped into Macedonia, to escape that war. Valerius the Praetor was sent. This book containeth also the acts achieved in Spain by Cn. S. Cipios against the Carthaginians, Syphax King of the Numidians, having entered into army with the Romans, fought against Malanilla King of the Massilians: who stood for the Carthaginians, and being overcome, pass'd over into Spain with a most mighty army unto Scipio, lying over against Gades, where the narrow strait is between Africa and Spain. He and his soldiers were received into friendship, whose aid the Romans sent for, and this was the first time that mercenary soldiers were waged and served in the Roman wars.

The four and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Hanno was not so soon returned out of Campaine, into the country of the Bruttii, but by their help and guidance he solicited to rebellion the Greek Cities which continued the more waiting, y^e intelligence and alliance with the Roman. Because they saw that the Bruttii, whom they both hated and feared sided with the Carthaginians. And first he assaid and went in hand with Rhegium, where he spent certain daies to little or no purpose. In this mean time the Inhabitants of Locri were busie in carrying away with great haste the corn, wood and fewe, and all things else, necessary for the use of man, out of the country into the City; because they would have nothing to the enemy to prey upon. And daily more and more of them went out of the gates by night: so as at last there was no more left in the City, than those that were compelled to repair the breaches of the walls and the gates, and to bring into the turrets and bulwarks store of darts and other forth. Against this multitude and confused mixture of all ages, sexes and degrees ranging over the fields, who of most were altogether unarmed, Amilcar the Carthaginian sent out his Cavalry giving them direction and charging them to hurt no person. These horsemen opposed their troops between them and home, only to exclude them out of the City.
When they were scattered one from another in flight, The General himself in person encamped on a high ground from whence he might view the country and the City. And gave commandment to a cohort of the Bruttii to approach the walls to call forth the principal Citizens of Locri to parley, and by making promise of Amilcar his friendship, to perswade and exhort them to yield up the town. At the first they gave no credit at all unto the Bruttii, whatsoever they said: But afterwards, when they discovered Hanno and the Carthaginians upon the hills, and heard by some

A few of their own Citizens that were fled back & escaped, how all the rest of the multitude were slain within danger of the enemies, they made answer, that they would confer and consult thereupon with the body of the people. So immediately they were assembled together. The most light headed persons were desirous of a change and new alliance: they also, whose kinsfolk and friends were by the enemy intercepted and kept out of the City, had their minds engaged and bound sure enough, as if they had put in hostages: and some few who were well affected inwardly in heart & liked of constancy and true loyalty, yet durst not be known thereof, and shew themselves to stand to it: so as they all agreed in outward appearance, to surrender themselves to the Carthaginians.
And after they had cloely conveyed into the haven, and embarked L. Attilius the Captain of the Barrillon, and all the Roman souldiers that served under him to the end, that they might be transferred to Rhegium, they received Amilcar and the Carthaginians into the City, with this condition, that presently there should be concluded a league upon equal and indifferent covenants and capitulations between them. But the promise in this behalf (when they had once yielded themselves) was nothing well performed: whilst Amilcar charged the Locrians, with fraudulent dissembling and letting go the Romans: and they again alleged for their excuse, that they fled away, and made an escape. The horsemen also followed hard in chase by land, if haply either the tide might cause the ships to stay in the current within the straight, or drive them a land. But those whom they pursued they could not overtake: many other ships they espied crossing the streights from Messina to Rhegium. Roman souldiers they were sent from Claudius the Praetor, to lie in C. garrison there and to keep the town. Whereupon they presently departed from Rhegium.

As for the Citizens of Locri, they had peace granted them by express order and direction from Amilcar upon these conditions: Imprimis, That they might live free under their own laws: Item, That both the City and the haven should remain still in the hands of the Locrians. The substance of the covenant rested and was established upon these terms, That the Carthaginians and Locri should aid and assist one another mutually, both in peace and war. So the Carthaginians retired from the streights notwithstanding the muttering and murmuring of the Bruttii, because they had left Rhegium and Locri untouched, which two Cities they made full account to have sacked and rifled. And therefore they of themselves having levied and put in arms a power of fifteen thousand of their own youth, marched forward to assault Crotone a Grecian City likewise, and feated upon the sea. Adjoining themselves, much to better their estate, if they could be possessed of a port and sea-town, fenced with strong walls and Bulwarks. This only troubled and perplexed their minds, that they durst not, but sent unto the Carthaginians for aid: fearing lest they might seem to have ventred into action and war, without regard of the common good of their country, if they called them not: and doubting besides, that if the General of the Carthaginians should prove again, rather an arbitrator of peace, than a coadjutor in war, they should fight in desperate againist the liberty of Crotone, as they had done before against the City of Locri. Whereupon they thought best to send Embassadors unto Amilcar for his warrant, and to be secured from him, that if Crotone were recovered by the Bruttians, it should be subject unto them. Amilcar made answer, that this matter required consultation of men present with them in place, and therefore he put them over to Hanno, from whom they received no certain answer to trust unto. For willing they were not, that a noble and rich City as it was, should be spoiled: and besides they were in good hope, that in case the Bruttians should assaile it, and the Carthaginians all the while not seeing either to allow or help them in their enterprise, the Citizens would the more willingly revolt unto them. The Inhabitants within Crotone were not of one mind, and affected alike. For there was one malady that had infected all the Cities of Italy, namely, the dissention between the Commons and the Nobles. The Senators inclined to the Romans, the Commons on the other side took part with the Carthaginians. This division within the City, the Bruttii were by a fugitive runaway advertised of in these terms: namely, that Arifonmachus the ring-leader and head of the Commons, minded to betray the City: that it was a wide, vaste, and desolate town taking a great circuit of ground: and all the walls being decayed and in sundry places broken down, the Senators and the Commons kept their several guards and watches in sundry quarters far asunder.
And look (quoth he) where the Commons ward; there ye may enter at your pleasure. Upon this intelligence and direction given by the fugitive, the Bruttii environed the City round about: and being let in by the Commons at the first assault, were masters of all places, saving the Cattle. The Nobles held that piece foreseeing what might happen, and therefore provided themselves of a sure refuge. Thither fled Arifonmachus also, pretending that he meant to deliver the City to the Carthaginians, and not to the Bruttii. Now this City Crotone had a wall (before Pyrhus coming into Italy) twelve miles in compass; but after it was laid waste by that war, (since the one half of the town was inhabited. The river that was wont to run through the midst of the town passed now G along the walls without those streets where the houses stood thick and well peopled, far from the places inhabited.

Similes without the town there stood a noble Temple of Lacinia Juno, more renowned than the City it self, as being honoured with great religion and devotion of all the Cities and nations thereabout. A sacred grove there was in that place compassed with a thick wood, of tall trees, having in the midst within it divers pleasant and fruitful pastures, wherein were fed beeds consecrated unto the goddesses, of all sorts, without any keeper and pastor. And albeit the cattell went forth in the morning by herds and flocks of their own kind, severed by themselves, yet at night they used to return back again to their own pens and stalls, without harm received either by the wait-laying of wild and ravenous beasts, or by deceitful fraud of men. Great increase therefore and much commodity accrued by those cattle, inasmuch as thereof was made a massive Column or pillar of beaten gold, and consecrated in that place, so as the Temple was famous as well for riches as holiness and devotion. And many times it falleth out, that to such notable places there are attributed some strange miracles. For the report goeth, that there standeth an altar in the very porch of the Temple, the ashes lying whereupon no wind was ever known to blow away.

But to return to Crotus. The Cattle thereof on the one side standeth upon the sea, on the other side it bendeth and looketh toward the land. Defended in times past it was only by the natural situation of the ground, but afterwards fortified also with a wall; on that part whereas Darius the Tyrant of Sicily, having gained the back rocks and cliffs behind, by craft and guile sometimes won it. This Cattle at that time supposed to be strong and safe enough, the Nobles seized and kept, notwithstanding the Bruttii and their own Commons besieged them. At length the Bruttii leaving the Cattle impregnable, by all the forces and assaults that they could make of themselves, were driven of necessity to crave aid of Hanno. Who having assailed to draw and urge the Crotonians to yield, upon these conditions: To suffer a Colony of the Bruttii thither to be brought, and there planted; and that thereby a City lying so waste and desolate, might be replenished and peopled again in ancient time: could not move and persuade any one of them all, but Arifomachus. For all besides, protested and said, they would die before they would be intermingled with the Bruttii; to change their own rites and manner of life, their customs, their laws; and within a while their language also for others that were strange and foreign. Arifomachus alone, seeing that he could not prevail neither by persuasions to induce them to yield, nor find any means to betray the Cattle like as he had done the town before, fled away to Hanno. Shortly after, certain Embassadors from Lucer, by the licence and permission of Hanno, entered the Cattle, and persuaded them to be content for to be translated to Lucer, rather than to abide and stand out the extremity: saying, that they had sent Embassadors already to that intent unto Annibal, and had got a grant at his hands, that they might so do. So they abandoned Crotus, and the Crotonians were brought down to the sea side and embarked, and the whole multitude departed to Lucer.

In Arpi, the very winter season was not quiet between the Romans and Annibal. Sempronius the Consul wintered at Lucer, and Annibal not far from him in Arpi: and as they could spy opportunity, or take their vantage, of the one side or the other, there passed some light skirmishes between them. But the Romans had always the better, and every day more than other, became more wary and feared from all trains and deceitful snares of the enemy.

In Sicily the Romans found a great change, and all out of order, by reason that King Hiero was dead, and the Crown translated to his Nephew, or sons son, Hieronymus: being yet a child, not like to use his own liberty with moderation, and much less to sway the Kingdom and Scepter with discretion. His guardians and friends gladly entertained the protection and government of such a nature, and were ready enough to plunge him headlong into all vice and wickedness. Which King Hiero, foreseeing, was willing (by report) in his latter daies, to have left Syracusa free and at liberty to the end that no noble kingdom, acquired and established by good means, should not under the Lordly dominion of a child to the great obloquy and shame of the world, be ruined, and come to nought. But his daughters with tooth and nail crossed this his disengagement, made full reckoning, that the child should only bear the name of a King, but the government of the whole State should wholly rest in them and their husbands, Andromedus and Zailus: who were the principal guardians, left to oversee the young Prince. And an easie matter it was not, for as aged men now fiftie or sixty years old, and ten, to hardly laid at day and night, by the fair speeches, and feminine flatteries of his daughters, to keep his mind free, and to apply and convert it to intricate private regards and the public consideration of the State. And therefore he left fifteen years to oversee and govern the child, whom he besought upon his death-bed, even when he was going out of this world, to maintain entire and unspotted, the faithful allegiance to the Romans, which he had kept and observed inviolate for the space of fifty years: and to suffer their helping hand willingly, to direct the young Prince above all, to tread in his steps, and to show that discipline wherein he had been nurtured and taught. After he had given this charge, and yielded up his breath, the guardians came abroad, brought forth the Kings last will and testament and shewed the young Prince in the open assembly of the people, and well near fifteen years of age he was. Where some few, such as were bestowed here of purpose within the press of the assembly for to shout and shew testimony of their joy and good liking, approved with open voice, and allowed the Kings will: whereas all the rest fared as Orphans in a City bereaved of their King and (as it were) become fatherless, and feared all things that might ensue. The King was interred and his funerals solemnized, with the love and kind affection of his people and subjects, more than with any studious care and diligence of his own friends that were nearest to him. After this, Andromedus removed from about the Prince all other guardians but himself, giving out oftentimes that Hieronymus was past a child, and able to govern of himself as King. Thus by deposing the Protectorship, which was common to him and many others, he took upon him and misruled the power and authority of them all. Hard it was even for a right good King and well governed, that should succeed after Hiero, to find favour and win grace among the Syracusanians: so heartily they affected and loved King Hiero. But Hieronymus, as if he had been willing and desirous, that by his vicious and wicked life, they should have a great mislike of his grandfather, and wish again for him: at the very first sight, when he shewed himself abroad in open

A place, declared unto the world, what difference and great odds there was. For they who for many years together had never seen Hiero, nor his son Gelo, either in habit of apparel, or in any other ornaments and port, differing from all other Citizens, now beheld him in his purple robes, with his regal Crown and Diadem, attended with his guard and train of armed penioners: yea, and otherwise, after the manner of Denis the Tyrant, riding forth of his Court and Palace, in a Chariot drawn with four white steeds. This proud pomp and stately array was accompanied and suited with flemish qualities and conditions. He contemned and despised all men: he scorned most proudly to give audience to humble suppliants; and sent them away with reproachful terms and taunts: And not only strangers, but also his very guardians hardly might have access unto him: and to conclude, his lulls and delights whereunto he gave himself, were new and strange: his cruelty that he exercised outrageous and inhumane. So dread and terrible was he to all, that some of his Tutors, either by making themselves away, or by voluntary exile were driven to prevent and avoid the danger of cruel torments. Of whom three only, who alone had more familiar recourse into the Court, to wit, Andromedus and Zailus, the sons in law of King Hiero, that had married his daughters, and one Thraso, had little or no ear given unto them in other matters: but whilst two of them drew toward the Carthaginians, and Thraso to the Roman alliance: with their arguing, debating and dispute, they otherwise turned the mind of the young King to hearken and give audience to their opinions. Now it hapned that there was a conspiracy intended against the life and person of the Tyrant, and the same detected by one Calo, the companion and playfellow of Hieronymus, and of the same age: one who ever from his childhood had been familiarly acquainted with him, and inward to all his secrets. This revealer of the conspiracy, could appease and nominate all the conspirators, only Theodorus, by whom himself was made privy to the treason, and solicited to be a complice therein. The pity was apprehended incontinently, and delivered unto Andromedus to be tortured; Who at the first without delay, confessed himself to be guilty, but concealed all the rest that were accessories. At the last, when he had been torn, mangled, and dismembered, with most dolorous torments, and intolerable for any man to endure: pretending and making semblance that he could abide no longer pains: disclosed not for all this the guilty persons indeed, but accused the innocent, and said falsely, that Thraso was the first deviser of the whole plot: and unless they had born themselves, and relied upon to mighty an head, to set them on work, they would never have attempted to dangerous an enterprise. He appeached also some other of the Tyrant his guard and household servants and daily waiters: even such as came into his mind during the time of his dolours and paines, and whom amidst his groans he imagined to be such, as whose lives might be best spared, and deaths least lamented. The naming of Thraso especially made the Tyrant to believe, that the detection founded to be a very truth indeed: whereupon the man was immediately led to execution and put to death: and the other innocents, as clear as himself, tasted of the same cup and suffered with him for company. As for the conspirators themselves, albeit one of their fellows was a long while put to bitter and extreme torture, there was not one of them that either hid his head or made an escape: so assured confidence had they in the resolute constancy and faithful promise of Theodorus: and such power and strength had Theodorus himself to keep close the secrets committed unto him. Now when Thraso was once dispatched out of the way, who only was the means to hold them in and to bind them to their alliance and allegiance to the Romans: then forthwith they began openly to incline to rebellion, and sent as Embassadors for the same purpose, two noble young Gentlemen, Hippocrates and Epicides unto Annibal: From whom also they were sent back again in Embassy. These were both born at Carthage, but descended in blood from the Syracusanians by their grandfather, that was from thence banished: and were themselves by the mothers side meet Carthaginians. By entreaty of these two Embassadors, a League was concluded between Annibal and the Tyrant of Syracusa. And Annibal was content that they should abide still as Leigers in the Tyrants Court.

F When Appian Claudius the Prator and Lord Deputy of the Province of Sicily heard these news, he addressed straightwaies Embassadors unto Hieronymus: who laying, that they were come to renew the alliance which they had with his grandfather, had scornful audience given them to deliver their message, and were dismissed and sent away by Hieronymus with a harsh, demanding of them by way of a scoff: "How they had sped at the battle of Canus. For I can hardly believe" (quoth he) "that all is true which the Embassadors report of that field: and I would gladly know the certain truth & thereupon deliberate and take counsel, which side I were best to take. The Roman Embassadors said, they would repair again unto him when he could begin once to give audience with gravity and in good earnest to their embassy: and so after they had warned & admonished, rather than praised and entreated him, not to change, but to stand to the first covenant and promises, they departed. Then Hieronymus sent his Legates to Carthage, for to confirm the League with the Carthaginians, according to the alliance and amity made with Annibal. In which it was capitulated and covenanted, that when they had expelled the Romans out of Sicily (which would shortly come to pass, in case they felt either ships and a power of men) the river Himer, which (as it were) divided the Island in the midst, should confine and limit both the Syracusan kingdom and the dominion of the Carthaginians. After this, being puffed up with the fair flattering speeches of such as were about him, who suggested unto him, to remember and call to mind that not only King Hiero was his grandfather, but also King Pirrhus by the mothers side: he sent Embassadors unto the Carthaginians, to give them from him to understand, That he de-med it right and meet, that all Scyth wholly should lie unto his dominion: and that the Empire of Italy only belonged properly to the Carthaginian people to acquire and conquer. This levity and vain-glorious humour they neither wondered at, as a strange thing in a giddy-brained young man; nor yet greatly blamed and found fault with, so long as they might enthrall him wholly and alienate him altogether from the friendship of the Romans. But all things in him turned to his overthrow and utter confusion. For while Hippocrates and Epidaurus were sent along with two thousand foot-soldiers, to go to found and solicit the Cities rebellion, that were held by the garisons of the Romans: and himself in person entered the country of the Leontines, with all the rest of the forces, which amounted to fifteen thousand foot and horse together: certain conspirators, who chanced at to be his own foot-soldiers, and bare arms under him, possessed themselves of a vake house standing over a narrow lane through which the King was wont to go down into the market place of the City: there when other stood armed and well appointed, and waiting when the King should pass by, one of the conspirators (whose name was Indigemes) had given him in charge, because he was one of the squires of the Kings body, when the King approached near unto the door of the said house, to find some occasion or other, in that straight passage, to slay the troop and train that followed behind. And to he effected indeed, and put in execution, as it was agreed and contrived. For Indigemes lifted up his foot, making as though he would looke and slack a straight knot of his sho-lace, which hindring his going, whereby he staid the company that followed after, so long, that the King passing by alone without his guard of armed men about him, was assailed mean while, and received sundry stabs and wounds, before they could come to relieve and save him. Hereupon arose an outcry and tumult, and divers of the guard lie at Indigemes, who by this time was ready to oppose himself and to ward all venues: howbeit he was hurt only in two places, and so escaped. The guard seeing the King there lying dead, fled away as they could. The murderers, some of them betook themselves into the market-place unto the multitude, that rejoiced for the recovery of their freedom: others repaired to Syracusa, to intercept and prevent the designments of Antrochurus, and other favourites and followers of the late King.

While things stood in these uncertain and doubtful terms, Appius Claudius foreseeing was like to ensue, and that very shortly, addressed his letters unto the Senat of Rome, certifying them that Scyth declined already, and was at hand to side with the people of Carthage and with Antibal. Himself in the mean time bent all his forces toward the frontiers of the Province and confines of that Kingdom, to withstand and hinder all the proceedings and enterprises of the Syracusans.

In the end of that year Q. Fabius, by order from the Senate, fortified Paucoli, a town of merchandise, and which in time of war was begun to be much resorted unto and frequented, and he placed a garrison. From whence as he was in his journey toward Rome against the great Election or Magistrates he proclaimed the solemn assembly of the people for that purpose to be the next Common day that followed upon his arrival thither: and so it fell out, that he went along the City, and immediately upon his journey, and came down into Alors field before he eured the City. Upon which day, when it hapned that the Century of the younger sort was drawn out by lot, and had the prerogative, and by their voices nominated I. Octavius and M. Emilius Regillus for Consul, then Q. Fabius after silence made, rose up, and delivered this or such like speech. "If either we had peace in Italy, or at least with those enemies, with whom I deal, neither negligent, or unadvisedly, the matter were not much, nor importing great hazard and danger: I would think, that whoever disturbed and rested your favours and free affections, which ye bring hither with you into this solemn place of assembly, to bestow honours and dignities upon whom ye please had but small and no regard of your liberty and freedom. But since that in this war and with this enemy, never any General of ours faulted in the managing of his affairs, but it costs dear, and we had some great foil and overthrow: it behoveth you, that with what mind and careful regard ye enter the field to combat in your armour, in the same ye should come hither into this Alors field in your gowns, and so proceed by your suffrages to elect your Consuls: and that every one of you should thus say to himself, I am to nominate a Consul to match with General Antibal. No longer since, than this very year, when as before Capnia J. bellus Torona, the bravest horseman and Cavalier of all the Campans defied the Romans, and challenged them to fight man to man, Asellus Claudius, the noblest Knight of all the Romans, and best man at arms, was chosen to encounter him. In times past, against a Gaul that offered combat upon the bridge over Anio, our ancestors sent out Manlius, a courageous, resolute, and puiant Champion. Neither can I deny, but upon such another occasion not many years after, the like trust was reposed in M. Valerius, who took arms likewise against another Gaul that challenged single fight. And even as we are desirous, & with to have our foot and horsemen both, more valorous and hardy than our enemies, or if that will not be, at leastwise equal unto them, and able to countermatch them: even so let us be careful to find out a General of our own comparable every way to the chief commander of our enemies. And when we have chosen the best warrior and Captain in the whole City, then presently without any longer delay, being elected and created for one whole year, he shall be sent to match with an old captain, that hath ever continued in the field, one who is not enclosed within compacts of time, nor restrained & gagged within the straight bounds of law, but that he may order & manage every thing, according as the occasions and present occurrences of war do require: Whereas, by that time

The Oration of Q. Fabius to the people of Rome.

"that we can make all ready and dispose every thing in order, and set in hand to begin our affairs, the year is come about and clean gone. Now forasmuch as enough hath been said, what manner of Consul ye ought to create: it remaineth to speak somewhat of them, whom the prerogative Century to highly favour, and is to much affected unto. As for M. Emilius Regillus, he is the Flamin of Quirinus, whom neither we may take from his ministry of Sacrifice, nor yet retain and keep him still, but we shall neglect either the service of the gods, or the due care and regard of the wars. Octavius hath married my utters daughter, and hath a sister by her. But your favours and good turns shewed both to me, and also to my ancestors, are not of so small account and reckoning, but that I ought to prefer the Common-weal before all private regards and alliances whatsoever. Every mariner, yea, and any passenger is able to steer and rule a Ship in a calm water: but when a buttering tempest is up, and the vessel tossed in a troubled surging sea, and carried away with violent force of the winds, then there had need be a man indeed, and a skillful Pilot to sit at the stern, and to guide the helm. We fail not now in a still and quiet sea: but we have been drenched, and in a manner drowned, with some storms already: and therefore we ought to have exceeding great care and be well advised storehand, whom we have to be the steers-man. In a matter of less consequence and importance, we have made trial, O. T. Octavius, of your knowledge and service: and you have not given us yet so good proof of your virtue and prowess therein, that we should put in trust with the managing of greater affairs, A Navy whereof you were Admiral, we rigged and trimmed to your hands this year for three causes: first, to annoy and spoil the sea-coast of Affrick: secondly to defend and keep up our behoof the ports and havens of Italy: last of all, and above all, to encompass and slay all supplies and new succours together with money munition, and victual, for being transported unto Antibal from Carthage. If Octavius have performed, I say not all these things, but in any one quit himself well, to the good and benefit of the State, Elect him Consul hardily and good leave have you. But if it appear, that while you had the rule of the Armada, all things (that a man would have) passed out of the country unto Antibal, with as great safety and security as if the seas had been open and void of enemies: If, I say, the sea-coast of Italy hath all this year been more in danger, and subject to sustain harm, than that of Affrick: what reason can you allege, wherefore the people of Rome should choose you above all others, to oppose as Captain, to confront their enemy Antibal. If you were Consul in place already, we would judge it requisite and good to nominate and create a Dictator, according to the example of our forefathers: neither could you take fault or be offended, that there should be found in the City of Rome a better warrior and more sufficient than your self. And surely it concerneth no man more than you O. Octavius, to see that there be not imposed a burden upon your shoulders under which you should fail and fall down right. Wherefore I advise and exhort you, as much as possibly I can, in electing of Consuls this day, to carry that mind and wit that careful providence, as ye would, in case ye were standing armed in battel array; and to choose out of hand two General Captains, under whose conduct and government ye should presently fight a field: and make choice of such Consuls, unto whom our children were to take the oath of allegiance: at whose commandment, they should come and assemble together, and under whose charge and protection they might willingly serve as foot-soldiers. The pool Therapsinus, the plain before Cinara, are heavy examples for us to remember: but yet they serve for good precedents unto us, to teach us how to avoid the like mischief another time. So the prerogative Century of the younger and puny sort, was called again to a new scrutiny, and to give their voices again. Whereat when I. Octavius began to cry out aloud and say very stoutly, that Fabius his desire was to continue Consul still, and therewith grew to be clamorous and troublesome to the assembly: the Consul commanded the Lictors to go unto him, and to lay hold upon him. And forthwith as yet he had not entered into the City, but came down straightwaies into the Alors field presently from his journey, he put them in mind, that the knitches of the rods together with the axes within them should be born before him. And in the mean time the prerogative Century began afresh to give their voices: and by it were nominated Consuls Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Marcellus the third time: and all the Centuries besides without any jarring and variance elected the very same. One of the former Prators likewise was chosen again, namely Q. Fulvius Flaccus, And other new created, that is to say, T. Octavius Crassus the second time. Q. Fabius the Consul his son who at that time was Edile of the chair and P. Cornelius Lentulus. After the Election of the Prators was ended and finished, there passed an Act and decree of the Senate that Q. Fulvius should extraordinarily have the charge of the City, and be Prator there: and that he above all other, when the Consuls were gone forth to the wars should be President and Governor of the City of Rome. There fell great rain and much snow that year, whereby the Tiber overflowed the fields, overthrow many houses, and overwhelmed much cattle and people, so as they utterly perished.

Thus in the fifth year of the second Punic war, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Claudius Marcellus the third time, when they entered their Consulship, let the City on thinking and musing of them more than usually had been known. For in many years there had not been the like couple of Consuls. And old men would talk and say, that even so were Max. Rullus and P. Decius declared Consuls against the Gauls war: and after them likewise, Papirius and Corvinus against the Samnites and Brutii: against the people also of Lucania and Tarentum.

cellus was created Consul in his absence, while he was with the Army abroad, and Fabius being himself present and president of the Election, was ordained to continue (still) in his Consulship. The occasion of the time, the necessity and occurrence of the wars, and the peril and hazard of the whole state were in him as no man looked nearly into the example and precedent to find fault with, all nor had the Consul in any jealousy of ambition and desire of rule: but rather every man commended his noble and haughty mind, who seeing that the Common-wealth stood in need of an excellent Captain, and knowing himself without all question to be the man, made less reckoning and account of the envy and ill will of men, that thereby haply might accrue, than of the good and profit of the Common-wealth. The same day that the Consuls began their office, they assembled the Senators in the Capitoll: and the first thing they did, was a decree, that the Consuls should either cast lots, or agree together between themselves, whether of them two should assemble the people for the election of Censors before he left forward to the army. After this, all they had their authority prolonged and continued still, who were employed abroad with the forces; and their commissions were renewed and sealed again, for to abide in the government of their Provinces: to wit, T. Gracchus at Luceria, where he abode with the army of the Voluntaries; (Legionis in Luceria in the Picene country: M. Pomponius in the Province of Gaul (on this side the Alps.) It was enacted also, that of the Prætors of the former year, Q. Mutius as Vice-Prætor should govern Sardinia; that M. Valerius at Brundisium should, contrary the river, look to the sea-coasts, and have an eye to all the attempts and enterprises of Philip King of the Macedonians, P. Corn. Scipio the new Prætor, was appointed to rule the Province of Sicily; and T. Otacilius to be admiral of the same Navy, which the year before he had the charge of against the Carthaginians.

Many prodigious and strange signs were reported that year, and so much the more as they were believed to be true of the temple and superstitions for of people. Namely that within the chapel of Salus in Lavinium the Raven, builded their nests. In Apulia a green palm tree was on a light fire. At Mantua a pool maintained by the overflowing of the river Mincius, appeared red with blood. At Carthage it rained chalk, and at Rome in the beasts market it rained blood. In a village, called Silvius arising under the ground, broke out and yielded such abundance of water, that it overflowed, tumbled up and down and carried away (as it had been the stream of a river) divers vessels as pipes, tuns, barrels and things that were in the place. The open and publick hall within the Capitol, the Temple of Vulcan in Mars field, a nut-tree in the Sabins country, the high street, the wall, and a gate at Gabii, were all blasted with lightning and fire from heaven. And by this time other miraculous and monstrous signs were commonly blown abroad, to wit, that the spear of Mars in Prænest of its own accord, stirred and moved forward: that an ox was heard to speak in Scitia: that the Infant within the mothers womb, in the Marcus country was heard to cry to triumph, at Spole a woman turned to be a man, at Hadria there appeared an Altar in the sky, and apparitions or shews of men discovered about the same, arrived in white. At Rome also within the City was seen, now the old time, a swarm of Bees in the very marketplace: a thing wondered at because it was rare and seldom known. Some there were also, that touched how they desired arms and Legions on the hill Jugurthum. Whereupon the City rose up in arms and when they were come into the Jugurthum, they said plainly, that there were none there appeared but the ordinary inhabitants of the hill, These prodigious signs by direction from the Asplices, i. e. the South-flyers were expiate and the gods pacified with greater sacrifices: and a solemn procession and supplication was proclaimed unto all the gods that were shrined at Rome and had their chapel there.

After all complements performed, that belonged to the pacification of the gods, the Consuls propoed unto the Senat concerning State-matters and especially about the managing of the wars. Namely, what for es should be prepared, what numbers of souldiers levied, and where they should be bestowed severally. And agreed it was That there should be eighteen Legions employed in the wars, Whereof the Consuls were to take unto them two apiece: the Provinces likewise N. Gaul, Sicily and Sardinia should be guarded each of them with other twin. Q. Fabius the Lord Deputy of Apulia, was to have two Legions under his hand to command the Province: and T. Gracchus other two of voluntary to keep the country about Luceria; and C. Terentius the Prætor, Consul to have the charge of one in the Picene country: and M. Valerius another, for the Navy about Brundisium: and last of all, twin were left behind for the guard and defence of the City of Rome. For to make out this full number of Legions (if of necessity were to be levied new, And the Consuls were appointed with all convenient speed to enroll them: and likewise to provide an Armada that year of 150 Gallies, together with those ships which ride in the river along the coasts of Calabria for the defence of that Country. When the muster was done and the new ships bladd and shot into sea, Q. Fabius assembled the Centuries for the election of Censors: wherein were created M. Attilius Regulus and P. Furius Philus.

The rumour still increased that Scipio was out, and up in arms. Whereupon T. Otacilius was commanded to go thither with his fleet. And because there wanted sailors and mariners: the Consuls, by verue of a decree of the Senat published an Edict, That as many as in the time of L. Æmilius, and C. Flaminius Censors, either themselves or their fathers were enlisted in the Subsidy book from 50000 Aff, unto 100000 in good: or who afterwards grew to that worth should find one mariner, and six months pay. Item, That whosoever were rated above 100000 unto 300000 should should be charged with three mariners, and one years pay. Item, That whosoever were valued in the Censors book between 300000 and 1000000 should allow five mariners. Item, That those above that proportion should let out seven, And every Senat should provide eight mariners, and furnish them with a whole years pay. According to this Edict, the mariners were let out well armed and appointed by their Masters, and having with them beforehand meat dressed and foddren to serve them thirty daies, they were embarked. This is the first time that ever the Roman Navy was furnished with sailors and mariners, at the proper charges of private Citizens.

This extraordinary preparation more than usually, terrified the Campans most of all other, for fear lest the Romans would begin war that year, with laying siege to Capua. Therefore they dispatched Embassadors unto Annibal, requesting him to come nearer unto Capua with his forces. For why? at Rome there were new armies levied, sent to assist that City: and the Romans were not discontented more with the revolt of any than of them. And forasmuch as this message was delivered in such haste and fear, Annibal thinking it good to make speed, left the Romans prevented him, dislodged and removed from Arpi, and encamped upon Tifusa over Capua in the fort, where he kept of old. Then, leaving the Numidians and Spaniards behind him both to guard the Camp, and also to defend Capua, he went down with the rest of his army to the Lake Avernus, pretending in shew there to sacrifice, but in very deed to lodge and toll it Pæth and the garrison there for to rebell. Mævius was no sooner advertized that Annibal was departed from Arpi, and in his return to Campania; but he immediately and day, and never staid, until he was come again, and repaired to his army. And withall, he gave order and direction unto T. Gracchus, to remove with his power from Luceria, and to draw near to Beneventum: likewise unto Q. Fabius the Prætor, (who was the Consul his son) to supply the room of G. Cellus at Luceria. At the same time the two Prætors took their journey and went into Sicily, P. Cornelius to the army there on land, and Othacilius to keep the sea-coast, and to be admiral of the Navy: and the rest spread them every one into their several Provinces. They also who had their authority and government continued ruled the same countries that they did before.

Whiles Annibal abode at the Lake Avernus, there came unto him from Tarentum, five noble young Gentlemen (Roman associates) which had been taken prisoners (some at the pool Thrasymene, others at Cannæ, whom he had sent home in the same manner of courtesy, as he had shewed ever to all the Allies of the Romans. These Gentlemen, in remembrance of his favours and benefits, made report unto him, That they had periwaded and induced a great part of the youth of Tarentum, to entertain rather the amity and alliance of Annibal, than of the people of Rome: and for this intent they were sent Embassadors from them, to request in their name, that he might please him to come nearer with his forces to Tarentum. For they say, if they might but once see from out of Tarentum his standard and ensigns, and him self near encamped, the City would without delay be surrendered up into his hands. For the younger people had the commons at their beck and commandment, and the commons ruled the whole state of Tarentum at their pleasure. Annibal after he had commended and thanked them, and withall laden them with many fair and great promises, willed them to return home, to hasten and set forward, and effect these intended designments, saying, that he would be there in good and convenient time. With these hopes the Tarentins took their leave, and departed. Annibal himself was wonderfully desirous to be Master of Tarentum. He saw it was a noble City and a wealthy: situated also by the sea-side, and a very commodious Port, looking and lying toward Macedonia: and well he wist that King Philip (if he should pass over into Italy, seeing the Romans were possessed of Brundisium) would arrive at this haven. When he had performed the sacrifice for which he thither came, and (whiles he made his abode there) foraged all the Territory of Came, even as far as the Cape and gave a camp, do to the fort and garrison there. There were six thousand of them within the town: and the place not only by natural situation strong, but also fortified by industry of man. Annibal having staid there three daies, and assailed the fort and the garrison on every side, finding he could not prevail nor effect any thing, went forward from thence, and proceeded to the walling of the Territory of Naples, upon anger, rather than any hope of gaining the City. The Commons of Nola, who long time were discontented with the Romans, and at deadly feud with their own Senators: upon his coming into the territory and confines to near unto them, began to rise in a commotion. Whereupon there came Embassadors unto Annibal, requiring him to advance to Nola, upon assured promise, that the town should be delivered into his hands. But Mæcelius, who was sent unto by the Nobles prevented this their plot and designment: and in one day he reached to Stessula from Cales, notwithstanding he made some stay to ferry over the river Volturnus. And to the next night he sent into Nola 600 footmen, and 300 horse, for to aid and defend the Senat. And like as the Consul bettered himself with all speed and diligence, to make Nola sure to him beforehand, so Annibal contrariwise temporized, being not so ready now to credit the Nolans: as having twice before given them like attempt, and to no purpose in the end, and therefore he trifled out the time, and made small haste.

At the same time also, Q. Fabius the Consul came against Castellum which was kept by the garrison of the Carthaginians, to see if he could surprize it. And to Beneventum at one time (as if they had been so agreed) came on the one side, Hannibal from the Bruttii, with a great power of foot and horse; and on another side, Gracchus from Luceria: who entered the town full. From whence so soon soon as he heard that Hanno lay encamped within three miles of the City, by the river Calentia, and there waited the Country, he himself issued, and pitched his tents within a mile of the enemy: where he assembled all his souldiers together, purposing to make a speech unto them. He had with him the Legions that consisted most of voluntaries, who already two years before, had been more willing to deserve their freedom in silent manner, than to challenge and demand it with open mouth. Howbeit, he perceived when he departed out of the winter harbors, that they began to murmur and gremble in the army when they marched: and to complain in this wise. What shall we never serve in the quality and condition of freemen? Whereupon he had written unto the Senate, and shewed unto them not so much what they desired, as what they desired to have: certifying them, that unto that day they had done him good and valiant service: and wanted nothing but only their freedom, but they might go for true and lawfull souldiers. Whereupon the Lords of the Senat had put it unto his discretion for to do by them what he thought was expedient for the Common-weal. Thereupon, before that he should join battell with the enemy, he pronounced these words before them all, and said: "That now the time was come, of obtaining and acquiring that liberty, which so long they hoped after. For the next morrow they were to assault their enemies with banner displayed, and to fight in a plain and open ground, where without fear of any ambush the triall might be made with more force and true valour: Whosoever therefore can bring me the head of an enemy him my pleasure & will is to make free immediately: and who for leish greed and reciteth, him will I chastise as a bondslave ought to be punished. Now every man hath his fate, and condition lying in his own hands: and of your freedom I am not only myself will assure you, but for further warrant ye have the allowance of Marcellus, the Col, and generally of all the LL of the Council: whose advice I sought, and who committed unto my hand, the ordering of your liberty. And withall he read the Councils letters, and the decree of the Senat in that behalf. Whereat they let up a mighty cry in token of their assent and approbation, and called for battell: and earnestly urged to give the signal out of hand. Then Gracchus having pronounced the next day for battell, dismissed the assembly. The souldiers were joyous especially such as were to have their freedom in reward of one daies service, and bestowed them of that day in making their armor and weapons ready. The morrow after so soon as the trumpet began to sound: they were the first of all other that presented themselves before the Generals pavilion, well appointed and ready to fight: and by the sun rising Gracchus led forth his men into the field in order of battell. The enemies for their parts were nothing behind, but forward to encounter them. They were in number seventeen thousand of footmen most of them Brutti and Lucans: of horsemen, twelve hundred: among whom there were very few Italians, the rest were in manner all Numidians and Moors. The fight was sharp, and continued long, and for four houres was not seen which side had the better. No one thing else troubled the Romans more, than that their enemies heads, which were the prizes to redeem the souldiers liberty. For as any had killed their enemies lustily, they were fain full with much ado to cut off their heads: within the trouble some press and tumult, and so to lose time: and after that by reason that their right hands were employed and occupied with holding the same heads, it fell out that the best souldiers gave over fighting, and the feeble daffards and earthen cowed: only were to maintain the conflict. Which when the Marshalls of the field and Colonels reported unto Gracchus, and namely that there was not a souldier of the enemies standing that was wounded and hurt any more: but that they lay along were hacked and hewed as it were by butchers: and that his own souldiers instead of swords, had their enemies heads in their hands: he commanded in all haste, that upon a signal given, they should fling away their heads from them, and charge afresh upon the enemies. For their valor and prowess (such he) was well enough seen already, and evidently testified, and so long as they were so hardy men, and bare themselves so manfully they should not need to doubt of their liberty. Then the conflict began to be renewed and withall the horsemen charged the enemies where the Numidians received with equall valour: in so much as the fight of the Cavalry was as bravely performed, as the other of the Infantry: whereupon once again the victory seemed doubtful, in which part it would incline: while in both hosts the Generals reproached and debated the adverse part. Gracchus said that the Brutti and Lucans were too often vanquished and subdued by the Roman ancestors: and Hanno again girded at the Romans, calling them bondslaves, and souldiers let loose out of prison and houses of correction. At the last, Gracchus declared aloud, and said, They were not to hope at all for their liberty, unless that day their enemies were discomfited and put to flight. This one word of his at length set their blood in such an heat, that they raised a fresh shout, & as if they had been cast again in a new mould, they charged upon the enemies so violently, that they could no longer be resisted and withstood. First, they that fought in the vanguard of the Carthaginians were put out of order: then they about their standards and ensigns: and last of all, the whole battell was driven back and gave ground. Whereupon they fairly turned their backs, and fled to fall one upon another into their Camp, in such fear and fright, that not so much as at the very gates, nor upon the rampier, they staid once, and turned again to make head: so as the Romans following them hard at the heels into their camp as it were in one train pell-mell made a new skirmish even within the rampier of their enemies. Where the fight was not so cumbersome, by reason of the tightness of the room wherein they were pent, but the massacre and execution was as cruel and bloody. The prisoners also that were among the enemies, in this confused conflict and tumult, joyined themselves and stuck close together: and having caught up some weapons,

A helped forward the victory: and either charging upon the backs of the Carthaginians flew them, or else hindered them in their flight and running away. So of that great army, there were not all out two thousand (and the most part of them horsemen) that escaped with the General himself: all the rest were either slain or taken prisoners: and of military enigns were carried away forty five twain. Of the Victors, there died fift upon two thousand. All the spoils, but only the prisoners, was granted to the souldiers. The cattell also was reserved, as many as within thirty daies the right owners could justly make claim unto for their own. When they were returned laden with booties and pillage into the Camp there were almost 4000 of the voluntary souldiers, who had fought but faintly, and brake not into the Camp with the rest: who for fear of punishment seized a little hill not far from the Camp, and kept it for their hold. But the morrow after, being let from thence by the Colonels, they repaired again to the camp at what time as Gracchus had summoned his souldiers to an assembly. Where, after that the Pro-Consul first had rewarded his old souldiers with military gifts, according to each one his prowess and good service in that battell: then as concerning the voluntaries, he said thus much, That he had rather they were all commended by him good and bad one with another: than that one of them that day should taste of any punishment: and therefore he pronounced them all free in the name of God to the benefit, happiness, and felicity, both of Common-weal and also of themselves. At which word, they lifted up their voices aloud with exceeding cheerfulness and alacrity: and one while they clapped and embraced one another in their arms, with gratulation and great joy: another while again, they held their hands toward heaven, wishing and praying at the gods hands, all good blessing for the people of Rome, and for Gracchus especially. Then (quoth Gracchus) Before that I had made you all alike, and to have equal part in the right and priviledge of freedom, I would not let upon any of you, either the mark of a stout and hardy souldier, or the note of a faint-hearted and feebly coward. But now that I have discharged my self of the trust committed unto me by the Common-weal to the end, that all difference between prowess & cowardice, should not be forgotten altogether and perish: I will take express order that the names of them, whose conscience accused them of faint fighting, and avoiding the hazard of battell, and therefore were withheld themselves apart, be brought unto me. And when they are cited and called forth every one by his name, I will compell them to take a corporall oath (quoth he) that unless it be upon tickles, so long as they shall continue in soldiery, they neither ear nor drink but it standing upon their feet. And this punishment (I am sure) you will willingly take in good part: when ye shall consider better of it, and see that you could not have had an easier note of disgrace and shame, for your false hearts and slender service. Then he gave the signal to truss up bag and baggage, and founded the remove, and to dislodge: and thus the souldiers carrying and driving before them their booties, all the way disposing themselves so merrily and festive days, and not from fighting a bloody battell. All the people of Beneventum came forth in great numbers to meet them at the gates, welcomed the souldiers, bad them joy, embraced them and invited them to their homes, to give them entertainment and lodging. The boords were spread in every mans court-yard, and furnished with store of viands: they willed them to come and make merry with them, and requested Gracchus to give his souldiers leave to feast and make good cheer. And Gracchus was content, but upon this condition, that they should all eat their meals abroad in the open street. Then all things were brought forth, and set upon the tables at every mans door. The voluntaries took their repast and refection either with their caps on their heads, or else covered their rown with white wooll, some sitting, some standing: waiting and serving one another at the table, and eat their meat and fed with them together. This was such a worthy sight and solemnity that Gracchus after he was returned to Rome, caused the representation and remembrance of the celebration of this day, to be drawn and portrayed in colours and the picture to remain in the Temple of the goddess Liberty, which his father caused to build in the mount Aventine, of certain fines and forfeits and Falterswards there dedicated it.

While these matters thus passed at Beneventum, Annibal having spoiled and harried the territory about Naples, removed toward Nola, and there encamped before the town. Whom when the Consul understood to be coming, he sent for Pomponius the Pro-Prætor, together with that army which lay encamped above Suessula and provided to meet with the enemy, minding presently to bid him battell. He sent out Claudius Nero with the strength of his horsemen in the dead time of the night at a back gate, that was farthest from the enemy, giving him in charge to cast about closely, and fetch a compass, and fair and softly to follow the enemy, as he marched: and when he perceived the battell was begun, then to come forward, and set upon him behind on his back. But whether it were that Nero mislead of the way, or having not time enough, could not put this policy in execution, I know not. In his absence the armies joyined battell, wherein (no doubt) the Romans had the better hand. Howbeit, for default that the horsemen were not there in due time, the order of the direction failed, and took no effect. And notwithstanding that the enemies gave ground and retreated, yet Marcellus durst not follow hot upon them, but founded the retreat to his own men, being in a good way of victory. Yet were there by report above 2000 of the enemies slain that day, but of Romans under 400. And about the sun set, Nero who all the day and night past had tired horse and man, and done no good, and now returned, without so much as a sight of the enemy, was sharply rebuked of the Col. in so much, that he gave him this and Hannibal. Then he sent out the Numidians and Moors, to fetch booties and prizes from out of the Salentine country and all the woods and chafes next unto Apulia from whence they drive of other cattell small fere; but of hories especially they brought away great numbers, of which there were four thousand divided amongst the horsemen to be handled, broken, and made gentle.

The Romans seeing there was like to be war in Sicily, & the same not lightly to be regarded; that the death of the Tyrant there, rather gave the Syracusians good Captains than wrought any change in their minds, or alteration in the cause; assigned unto Al. Marcellus, one of the Consuls, that he should go to govern. Presently upon the murder of Hieronymus, first the soldiers in the Leontine country, began to mutine and make an uprore, and boldly spake and said, That the Kings death should be espied, and his obsequies solemnized with sacrificing the blood of conspirators. But afterwards, when they heard often iterated the sweet name of liberty and freedom restored unto them; and that there was good hope that the soldiers should have a larger deal amongst them out of the Kings Treasures, and be under the command of Captains of better quality, and having besides all this a bedroil rehearsed unto them of the Tyrant his cruelty and foul facts, and of mortellity and outlandishness their affections were so altered that they suffered the body of their King to lie above ground unburied, whom a little before, they so greatly desired and wished for. Now as concerning the conspirators, whiles the rest of them remained behind to assure and protect themselves of the army, Theodorus and Sofus took the Kings horses and rode post, as hard as certainty could be aching (not to surprize upon a sudden all his followers and favourites (who knew nothing of that which was done) and fall upon them at unawares; but they were prevented not only by the time (which above all other things in such cases is most swift) but also by a counter one of the Kings servants. Whereupon Andromedorus had seized beforehand of that part of the City which he called the Island, together with the Cattle and all other places that he could conceiv with him were thought of any good importance; and then he fortified with good guards, Theodorus and Sofus being entered within the City at Hieropolis after first setting in the twy-light and during part of the evening; and shewing the Kings royal robes all embrewed with blood, and the crown and attire bewail of his head, he passed through Theia, and called aloud unto the people, to fight not on for their liberty and to arm themselves, and willed them to repair into Theia. The people some of them ran out into the streets, others stood in their entries and porches, and looked out at the windows from within their houses, and asked what the matter might be; they place themselves with torch and candle-light, and was filled with sundry garbolls and hurlyburlys. As many as were in arms gathered together in the open places of the City; those that were unarmed, took down off the Temple of Jup. Olympian the spoils of the Gauls and the Illyrians, which the people of Syracuse had given as a present to K. Hiero, and which he set aloft for a memorial praying unto J. Jove, that he would vouchsafe them this gracious favour, as to bestow those sacred weapons & harness upon them that meant to arm themselves therewith, for the defence of their country, and the maintenance of the Churches and shrines of the gods; & for the recovery of their liberty. This multitude also joyined with the corps de guards, that in the principal quarters of the City were bestowed in places convenient. But Andromedorus amongst other places that he fortified made fire also with strong guards of armed men the publicke garners of the City within the Island. There was a place enclosed round about with four-square stone, and built strongly like a fortress; this was possessed by the youth that had been appointed for to guard and defend that quarter; and they let messengers into Syracusa to signify that the garners and the corn were kept by them to the behoof of the Senat. And on the morrow at the break of day, the whole people assembled as unarmed assembled together in Arcadia within the Palace, And there before the altar of Concordia which in that place stood erected, one of the principal and chief Citizens, named Phormion, made an Oration unto them all, with frankness of speech enough, tending unto liberty and yet seasoned with modesty & moderation in this wise: Men, quoth he; that have experienced contentment and other indigencies, fall to abhor the same, and their former miseries; and from as known evils. But as for civil disorder, what calamities & miseries it bringeth with it, the Citizens of Syracuse have heard their fathers tell, and not seen and tasted themselves. That ye have been ready to take up arms and weapons in hand, I commend you for it; but I would commend you more than, if ye used them not, unless ye be driven thereto by extreme necessity. For the present I hold it good, and my counsel is, that Embassadors be sent unto Andromedorus, to intimate unto him, yea, and to require and charge him, to submit himself unto the Senat and people, and by them to be ordered: to let open the gates of the Island, to put away from about himself guard, and deliver up the cattle and garrison. But in case he intend under the pretence of being guardian or protector to the kingdom of another, thereby to usurp it to his own use; I would be given to understand, by mine advice that we will seek to recover our liberty out of the hands of Andromedorus more fiercely and forcibly than from Hieronymus. And so presently upon this assembly embassadors were sent. Then the Senat went together and sat in Council; for, during the reign of Hiero, there was for an ordinary publicke Council of State: to after his death unto that day, the Senators were neither called together, nor their advice taken or sought in any manner. When the Embassadors were come unto Andromedorus and had delivered their message, he was himself (verily) for his own part moved with the generall consent of the Citizens; but especially when he considered, that among other quarters of the City possessed by the ad-

A verie side, that one part also of the Island, which was the strongest, was betrayed (as it were) and held out against him. But when the Embassadors called still upon him to come forth, his wife Democritus, daughter of King Hiero, puffed up still with the proud mind and naughty stomach of a Prince, and full of the vain humour and spirit of a woman put him oftentimes in mind of a saying, that Dionis the Tyrant had evermore in his mouth, namely, "That a man should not ride on hories, that Dionis the Tyrant had evermore in his mouth, namely, but beled fair and softly a foot-back to be deposed from his royall dignity and estate of tyranny, but beled fair and softly a foot-pace, and go to that as a bear to the stake. An eafie matter quoth she; for it is for one to yield and "sorge the possession of high place and honour, and a thing that may be done in the cutting of an "hand, whensoever one will: but to compels and attain thereto is a right hard matter, and of all B "other most difficult. You were best therefore to borrow some respite of time of the Embassadors, "for to take farther deliberation of this main point, and in the mean while, to use the advantage
"thereof, to send for the Souldiers out of the Leontine country: unto whom, no doubt, if you "would promise a reward out of the Princes treasure, you shall be Lord of all. This perillous unhappy counsel of a woman Andromedorus neither despised nor rejected: together not yet presently accepted and embraced: supposing it a better and fairer course, if he meant to aspire unto high dignity and great puissance, for the present to temporize and give place unto the necessity of the time. And therefore he willed them to carry back unto the Senat this answer from him. That he submitted himself, and would be ordered & set down by the Senat and the people. The morrow after, so soon as it was day-light, he caused the gates of the Island to be set open, & shewed himself C in the market-place of Arcadia, where he attended up unto the altar of Concordia from which the day before, Phormion had made a speech: unto the people. He began his Oration with an excuse of his late coming and long stay behind, and craved pardon of the people: alledging, "That he had kept
"the gates shut, not because he meant to separate his own affairs from the State, and not to take of Andromedorus
"such part as the City took; but when it was once drawn he feared what would be the end
"and issue of murders and massacres, and whether men would lay their hands, when there was
"assurance of liberty effected (as being contented with the death only of the Tyrant) for whether,
"as many as either in blood and kindred or in affinity and alliance, or in other offices or service,
"were toward the King, and his Court, should be counted culpable in the fault of another & so like"wise have their throats cut. For after that, quoth he, I understood once, that they who had de-D "livered and set free their country were minded and willing to save & preserve it, thus enfranchi-
"sed; and that there was consulting on all hands indifferently for the good of the State, I made no "longer doubt of the matter but to yield both mine own person and also all that ever was under "my hand (as committed unto me upon trust and fidelity) unto my native country: now that he,
"who put all into my hand, is through his own folly & outrage overthrown and brought to con"fusion. Then turning to the murderers of the tyrant, and by name calling unto Theodorus and Sofus,
"A noble and memorable piece of service ye have already done, quoth he; but trust me truly,
"your glory in this behalf is begun only, and not thoroughly finished and performed: nay, a great "danger is yet behind, unless ye see to the general concord and unity of all parts, that the com"mon liberty of the City, turn not into pride and insolency beyond all measure.

E After this speech ended, he laid down the keys of the gates, and of the Kings treasure, at their feet. And so for that day, when the people were dismissed from the assembly, with joy and mirth they went in procession and supplication with their wives and children, round about all the Churches & Chappels of their gods. The day following the solemn election was held for the creation of Prætors. And first, before all others, Andromedorus was chosen, and the rest for the most part, the very murderers of the Tyrant. They elected also two that were absent to wit, Sopater and Drometes. Who being advertized of all matters that passed at Syracuse, delivered up the Kings treasure which lay in the Leontine country, and was now brought unto Syracuse, into the hands of the Treasurers: who for the same purpose were created. Likewise that which was in the Island, and in Arcadia was committed over unto their custody. That part also of the wall, which divided the Island from the rest of the City, and was supposed too strong a bar between wits by common consent cast down and rased. And as their minds were thus affected and inclined to procure and maintain liberty, so all other matters forced futable and followed after accordingly.

Hippocrates and Epidetes, when tidings came of the Tyrants death (which Hippocrates would faine have had concealed and therefore slew the messenger that brought news thereof) being forsaken of the souldiers, returned to Syracuse: supposing for the present, that to be the safest course they could take. Where, because they would grow into no suspicion nor to be noted to seek for some opportunity and occasion of change and alteration in the State, first they presented themselves before the Prætors and Governors of the City, and so by their mediation, they had access to the Senat. They gave out, "That they had been sent from Annibal unto Hieronymus G "as unto a friend and confederate, and had yielded obedience unto him, as they were willed by "their own Generall and Commander. Now their desire was, to return again unto Annibal. But "forasmuch as they might not travell in safety, for the Roman forces, that ranged all over "Sicily, they craved a convoy and sufficient guard to conduct them, as far as to Locri in Sicily: "assuring them, that by this small courtesy and desert of theirs, they should reap great thanks of "Annibal, and come into high favour with him. The suit was soon obtained. For desirous they "were, that those Cavaliers that used to lead the King, and were expert and skillfull besides in war, "and therewith needy and audacious should be sent away: but they made not so good speed to put this their desire in execution as they should have done. For in the mean season, the young and lusty martial men, and such as ever had conversed with the soldiers, went up and down one while to them, another while to the fugitive strangers that were revolted. For who for the most part were sailors and sea men that came from the Romans; yea, and lorted themselves with the belief and most abject persons of the Commoners, spreading tales, and whispering into their ears sundry suspicious matters of crime against the Senators and great men of the Nobility, laying that they plotted and practised cloiely under hand nothing else, but that Syracuse, under a colour of reconciliation and accord should be reduced to the obedience of the Romans; and then, the slide and faction, and some few with them that are of council, to renew the association, might be Lords, and tyrannize over the rest. By this means there flocked multitudes, every day more than, either to Syracuse: whose ears were tickled, and itched still to hear his furnishes, and were capable enough to give credit thereto. And they gave not only Hippocrates and Epicides, but Andronodorus also good hope of an alteration, and a new world. For he being at length overcome with the importunate suggestions of his wife, who ever put into his head, That now was the only time to usurp and take upon him the rule of the State, while all things were troubled, and in a confusion, upon their new and unknown liberty: while the soldiers were presented in their way, to be dealt withal, and daily maintained and led out of the Kings Exchequer; and while those captains sent from Amibul, by reason of their acquaintance with the soldiers, were present to let forward and further his designments: first therefore acquainted Themistius, who had married Gelo his daughter with his complot: and after a few daies (full unadvisedly) imparted his mind also, into one Aspion Actor of Tragedies, whom he used afor time to make privy unto his other secrets. This Aspion was well born, and defended of a worshipful house, a man in good place and of honest reputation: and his profession (for among the Greeks it is reputed no matter of shame to play either in Tragedies or Comedies) was no blot either to his birth, or disgrace to his calling: and therefore as one who made more reckoning of his duty to his country, than of private friendship, bewrayed & disclosed all the treason unto the Prætors. Who finding by good proofs and certain evidences that this was no forged and counterfeit information, after consultation had with the Ancients of the Council, they by warrant and direction, set a guard of armed men about the door of the Senat House, and to loom as Themistius and Andronodorus were entered in place, slew them outright. And when there began some uprore upon this fact, which in shew seemed very horrible and hainous, especially to all the rest that knew not the cause: at length they appeased the tumult, and caused silence, and brought the informer into the Council House, that had detected the intended treason: who declared all things orderly in particular: namely, that this conspiracy was devised and sprung first from the marriage of Harmonia the daughter of Gelo, who was wedded unto Themistius: that divers auxiliary soldiers of Africans and Spaniards were appointed and provided to massacre the Prætors, and other principal Citizens: that their goods were promised unto the murderers to be ransacked and rifled: that besides, there was a band of mercenary soldiers (such as were wont to be at beck, and ready to execute the commandment of Andronodorus) set in a readines to seize the Island again, and keep it to his use. And when he had laid every thing abroad in order, with all circumstances, what the practices were, and by whom they were to be performed and executed, and shewed before their eyes most plainly the whole conspiracy: & namely, what persons and what forces should have been employed. Then the whole body of the Senat were likewise verily perswaded that they had deceived in such an end, and whereas jolly murdered as Themistius. But without the Council House door the confused multitude, composed of all sorts of people who were doubtfull of the matter, and knew not what to make thereof, cried out. And albeit they menaced and threatened before the entry and porch of the Senat, yet at the sight of the dead bodies of the Conspirators, lying before their face, they were affrighted and soon hushed to as with great silence they followed the whole body of the Commons to the public place of Assembly. Unto whom, Sopaters by order from the Senat, and his fellow Prætors, was commanded to make an Oration.

He began formally to inveigh against Andronodorus and Themistius, (as they that accuse men at the bar) and ripped up their former life past, charging them with all the wicked deeds and impious facts, committed since the death of Hiero: "For what (quoth he) did Hieronymus, nay, what could he do of himself, so long as he was but a child and stripling, and scarcely come all the while he lived to have any hair on his face? His officers and guardians, were they that ruled all, and managed the kingdom at their pleasures, but so, as the blame and heavy load lay upon him. Who if they had perished either before Hieronymus, or at least while together with him, they had been but well enough served. But they, who long ago had deserved to die, and for whom the gallows had already groined, ceased not still after the death of the tyrant, to devise and plot new mischiefs, one in the neck of another. At the first, openly in the sight of the world, Andronodorus by shutting the gates of the Island, entered by way of inheritance upon the kingdom, and sought to seize in his own right, and immediately their apparant, upon those things that he held under the Prince, only during his monage. Afterwards, being betrayed by them that were in the Island, & besieged round about by the whole City (which was possessed fully of the Acradina) seeing that in vain he had attempted to be King by a secret and open force: he sought means now to aspire thereto secretly, and by cunning sleights. Neither could he be so much as reclaimed, and won by any favours and honours done unto him: who being himself a traitor to the free-

A. dom of the state, was notwithstanding advanced to be Prætor, among other redemers of the liberty of their country. But no marvel it was (quoth he) that these men were of this haughty spirit, and longed to be Kings; for they had to their wives two princely dames, the daughters, one of King Hiero, and the other of his son Gelo.

At these words, the people from all parts of the assembly began to cry out with one voice, that neither of them both were worthy to live, nor any one besides of the Kings stock and lineage ought to remain upon the face of the earth. See the nature and disposition of the multitude: either they serve basely, or rule proudly. Liberty that is the mean between, they have neither the skill to despise with reason, or the grace to entertain in measure. Now, there wanted not (ye may be sure as at all times else) ready instruments and firebrands, to help forward and kindle more anger, such as seeing the Commons discontented already, and bloodily minded of themselves, put them forward to murder and massacre. As it appeared then: For immediately as the Prætors put up a bill, that all the Kings stock should be rooted out, and the whole line utterly extinguished: before in manner that it was all read out and published, it passed clear, and was granted. And presently there were sent out certain persons from the Prætors that murdered Democrita and Harmonia the daughters of King Hiero, and Gelo, the two wives of Andronodorus and Themistius. Now there was another daughter of Hiero, named Heraclea, wife to Sopippus, who having been sent as Ambassador from Hieronymus to King Ptolomæus, whose life in voluntary exile, and lived not with his wife. She having an inkling given her aforhand and knowing that the murderers were coming down toward her, took her two daughters, virgins: and together, with their hair loose hanging down their shoulders, and in other most poor array and ruiul habit able to have moved pity and compassion, they were led into a privat Oratory or Chappell unto their house-gods, to save themselves. The mother seeing the murderers fell to entreating them most piously, and recommended unto them the late remembrance of her father Hiero, and her brother Gelo: "Beseeching them not to suffer her (an innocent and guiltless person) to fire the worse, and be punished upon hatred that was born unto her nephew Hieronymus. As for me (quoth she) I reaped no good by his Reign and Kingdom, unless it were the banishment and absence of my husband: and as by the life of Hieronymus my fortune was not so good as my sisters: to alter he was murdered and dead; any cause is not to bad, nor like unto hers. Moreover, and besides in case Andronodorus had effected his designments, my sister should have been a Queen, and reigned together with her husband: but as for me, I must have been a subject and servant with the rest. Again, if there were any messengers sent unto Sopippus to report the death of Hieronymus, and the restitution of Syracuse to liberty: who can make doubt, but that forthwith he would be embarked and take the seas, and return again into his country? But how much are men put besides their hope, and deceived of their expectation? And who would ever have thought to have seen in a free state his wife and children in danger to lose their lives? For wherein do we hinder the common liberty, or the course of laws? What danger can come to any person from us, one devoted lone woman, and in manner a widow, and two young maidens livings as Orphans fatherless? And if it be said again that there was indeed no fear of hurt to be imagined from us: but only the Kings blood and kindred was odious in the eyes of the people: Then, quoth she, let us be sent away far from Syracuse and Sicily, and confined over to Alexandria, the wife to her husband, the daughters to their own father. But when they would neither be dear to her words nor endure their hearts to pity and compassion: then because she would not spend longer time in vain (for now the law some of them drawing their swords forth) she gave out all entreating for her self, and besought them instantly to be good yet, to the young ladies, and spare their lives, unto whom being of that age, even the very enemies in their heat of anger forbore other violence, and that seeing they were to be revenged of tyrants they would not play the tyrants themselves, and commit that wickedness, which they seemed to hate in others. Amidst these words the murderers (sent from the Prætors) pulled her forth of the inward and most secret place of the chappell, and cut her throat: and when they had so done, they assailed and fell upon the maidens, besprent with the blood of their mother: who for sorrow of heart and fear together being pail themselves and out of their wits, and as it were in a furious fit of frenzy against them, and got out of the Chappell: minding, if they could have escaped forth, and recovered the street, to set the whole City on an uprore. And so flitted for themselves, poor wench by running to and fro within the house, (which was not large and spacious) that for a good while they escaped among the thickest of so many armed men, and oftentimes avoided their reaches, and caught no hurt: yea, and when they had caught hold of them, notwithstanding they were to struggle with so many hands, and those so strong, yet they wound away from them all: until at length after they had received many a wound, and filled every place with blood, they fainted and Gund down, and yielded up their innocent spirits. This murder, no doubt, was of it self pitifull; but much more lamentable, by occasion of a present accident. For straight after came a messenger with express commendment, to spare the women, and not to kill them: for that upon a sudden the hearts of the people relented, and enclined to mercy. But when they heard there was so quick dispatch made of execution, that neither they had time to bethink themselves and repent, nor space to cool upon their heart, they fell pity and compassion into an extrem fit of anger and cholere. The multitude thereupon began to mutter and murmur, and called to have an election of Prætors, in the room of Andronodorus and Themistius (for they were both of them Prætors:) which new new election was not like to fall out in the end to the good liking and contentment of the other Prætors in place. So a day was set down, and proclaimed for this election. At which time it happened that beyond all mens expectation, one from the farthest part of the assembly nominated Epicides: and then another from thence named Hippocrates. After which the same voices came thick and threefold till so as it seemed the multitude would wholly go that way. The people there assembled were a confused sort intermingled, as well with a number of souldiers, as of a company of Citizens and Commoners; yea, and many of them were strangers fugitive, thrust among, such as rather than their life desired a general change and alteration. The Prætors at first dissembled all, and would seem to take no knowledge thereof: but thought it best to put off the matter to a farther day: yet overcame at last with the common accord and consent of the people: and I fearing with all a mutiny and sedition pronounced and declared the men aforementioned for Prætors. Neither would they at first hand so soon as they were created, let that abroach which was in their mind and desire to effect: notwithstanding they were displeased and discontented much, both for that there had been Embassadors dispatched unto Appius Claudius, about a truce for ten daies: and also when it was obtained, that there were others addressed to treat for the renewing of the ancient league with the Romans.

At the same time (Ap. Claudius) the Roman General lay at Murgantia with an Armada of 100 galleys, waiting there to hear what was the event of the troubles which arose upon the murder of the tyrants: and how far forth men would proceed upon this their new and unwonted liberty. And much about those daies, when as the Syracusan Embassadors were sent from Appius unto Marcellus now coming into Sicily. Marcellus himself after he heard the conditions of peace, thought they would grow to some good agreement and conclusion in the end: and therefore sent other Embassadors to Syracuse, personally to debate and confer in the presence of the Prætors, concerning the renewing of the League aforesaid. But by that time, they found not the City in the same quiet time and peaceable state. For Hippocrates and Epicides, alter news came that the Carthaginian Navy was arrived and rid at anchor under the bay of Pachinus, confidently, and without all fear, seized in the cars one while of the mercenary souldiers, another while of the fugitive traitors, many take injuries against their brethren in Office, and namely, that they went fugitive to betray Syracuse to the Romans. But Appius began to keep his Armada at anchor in the very mouth of the river, sitting to know what heart and hope they of the contrary faction had, to effect that which they intended. Much credit was given (as it should seem) unto those slander and lewd suggestions: inasmuch as at the first, the multitude ran to the waters side in a great hurry and tumultuous manner to hinder their landing, if haply they attempted it. In this troublesome confusion of all things, it was thought good, that the people should meet together to deliberate what was best to be done. In which assembly, whiles some drew one way, others haied and pulled another way and were at the point to mutine and grow to a sedition, Apollonides, one of the principall and chief Citizens, made a speech to very good purpose for preservation of the public peace, and thus he said: "Never was there any City nearer, either to hope of assured safety, or to fear of utter destruction than this of ours at this present. For if all would go one way together, and with one accord either encline to the Romans, or bend to the Carthaginians, there were M not a City under the cope of heaven, whose state were more happy and fortunate than ours. But in as much we are distracted, and the Common-wealth divers waies, there would not be more bitter and cruel war between the Syracusians and the Romans, than among the Syracusians themselves: when within one and the same walls, there should be banding one against another, and each side have their foes, their armor, and their Captains of their own. And therefore we ought of all hands to endeavor what we can, that all may be of one mind and draw in the same line. As for the main point now in question, Whether society and alliance be the better and more commodious, the Romans or the Carthaginians, is a matter of far less moment and importance than to be consulted and studied long upon. Howbeit, in choosing our friends and allies, we are to be directed by the authority and act of Hiero, rather than of Eueronymus: and to prefer that amity which we have tried for fifty years in much felicity, above a friendship for the present unknown, and sometime heretofore found unfaithfull. It maketh somewhat also, to resolve upon this course, that in case we should deny peace and alliance to the Carthaginians, we need not presently go to war with them: but with the Romans we must out of hand make account either of peace, or else of hot wars. This speech of his the less that it favoured of faction, partiality and affection, the more authority and sway it carried with it. And besides the deliberation of the Prætors and choice Senators, the advice also of the martial men were taken. And therefore the Captains of all their own ensigns and companies, yea, and the great Commanders of the auxiliary forces of their allies were willing to sit in Council together with them. When the matter had been often debated, and much contention and hot words passed between, at the last, because there appeared no colourable reason or cause to make war with the Romans, they agreed that a peace should be concluded, and that together with their Embassadors, there should be others also from them to ratifie and confirm the thing.

There passed not many daies between, when out of the Leontins country there arrived certain Orators, to crave help and succour for the guard and defence of their marches. This Embassage seemed to come very fitly and in good time, for to exonerate and rid the City of the unruly and disordered multitude, & likewise to send out of the way their Captains and ringleaders.

A So Hippocrates the Prætor was commanded to lead thither the fugitive strangers. Many also of the mercenary souldiers, that were waged to help them in their wars, accompanied them: so as in all, the number amounted to four thousand. This expedition and journey contented greatly as well the leaders and setters of it out, as also the parties themselves that were sent forth. For these of the one side had a good occasion and opportunity now offered them, to contrive a change in State (the only thing that so long they had desired) and those of the other, were right glad, that the sink (as it were) of the City was now well floured and voided away. But this was like the palliative cure of a sore, and a lightning for the present of a sick body: whereby it might soon after by relapse fall back as it were, into a recidive, and worse disease and more dangerous than the other. For Hippocrates began at first to make rodes by stealth into the confines bordering upon the Roman Province, and thence to waite & spoil afterwards when Appius had sent a power of men to defend the frontiers of his confederates, he charged with his whole power upon that guard that was opposed against him, and slew many of them. Whereof when Marcellus was advertised, he dispatched Embassadors incontinently to Syracuse, to charge them with the breach of peace: and to give them to understand, that there would never be wanting some occasion or other of quarrell and war, unless Hippocrates and Epicides were removed, and sent far enough out of the way, not only from Syracuse, but also quite out of Sicily. Epicides for he kept if he remained present in the City he might be charged and brought in question, for the taile and respects of his brother absent, or be wanting for his part, in the raising of new war: went himself also in person into the Leontins country: and seeing them there forward enough of themselves, and provoked already against the Romans, began also to alienate and turn their hearts from Syracuse. For in these terms he suggested and informed against the Syracusians, namely, "how they had capitulated with the Romans, that all the Cities and Nations which were under the Kings, should be subject unto them and within their jurisdiction: so as now they cannot be content (quoth he) with their liberty, unless they rule also like Lords and Kings. I would advise and counsel you therefore, to send word unto them and give them to understand, that the Leontins likewise deem it good reason, that they should themselves be free: in regard thereto that the tyrant was killed within the ground of their City or because the first alarm for liberty began there. For they leaving and abandoning the Captains there that followed the King ran at once from thence to Syracuse. And therefore they are (saith he) to raise that aforesaid article out of the instrument of the covenants, or not to accept at all of peace with that condition. Soon were the multitude persuaded hereunto. And therefore when the Embassadors of the Syracusians came to the Leontins both to make complaint for killing of the Roman Corpus deus, and also to command peremptorily, that Hippocrates and Epicides should depart either to Leontis, or to what other place they would rather chuse, so they went their waies and voided clean out of Sicily: they returned unto them this stout answer again: "that neither the Syracusians had any commission and warrant from them, to make peace with the Romans in their name, neither would they be tied and obliged to any consideration made by others than their own selves. This answer the Syracusians made report of to the Romans, and said plainly, "That the Leontins were not under their jurisdiction, to be ordered and censured by them: and therefore, any thing comprised in the league with them notwithstanding, if the Romans might war against them without breach of any covenant: and in that war they would not for their parts fail them, but do their best upon condition that when they were once subdued, they might be reduced again under their obedience, according to the covenant comprehended in the League. Whereupon Marcellus with his whole power went forth against the Leontins, and sent for Appius also, to assist them on the other side: and so hot were his souldiers in this service, and bare themselves so resolute for anger that the guard was slain, during the time that there was treaty of peace between that at the very first assault they won the City. Hippocrates and Epicides, after they saw the walls failed, and the gates of the City broken open, betook themselves for their safety, with some few into the Castle, from whence by night they made a secret escape, and fled to Herbessus.

As the Syracusians marched from home with a power of eight thousand armed men, and were come forward as far as to the river Isula, they met with a messenger who told them that the City of Leontins was forced. They reported other news besides, as well lies as truths, one with another, namely, that towmen and souldiers indifferently without respect were put to the sword: that he thought verily there was not left one alive of fourteen years of age and upwards: that the City was put to the sack, and all the rich mens goods were given away. At this so fearful and horrible news, the army staid and went not forward. And when they all were greatly troubled, their Leaders Sofis and Diomeces, consulted what to do. This loud lie arose not upon nothing, but was occasioned by mistaking of a matter. For there were scourged and beheaded of fugitive traitors to the number of two thousand. But of Leontins and other souldiers, there was not one hurt after the City was lost. And every man had all his own goods restored unto him again: saving that only which in the first hurlyburly of a City newly won hapned to military and perished. Howbeit upon this bare report, they neither could be induced to go forward to the Leontins, complaining and grieving that their fellow souldiers were so betrayed and murdered nor yet to abide there still for to expect and hear more certain tidings. The Prætors perceiving their minds disposed to revolt, and yet hoping that this mutinous fit of theirs would not continue long, in case the Captains and heads of their fury and folly were once rid out of the way led the army to Megara and went them.

themselves in person with a few horiemen toward Herbfus, hoping to gain the City by treason, & whilst they all there were affrighted, But seeing that enterprise would not prevail, they minded to use forible means. The morrow after they didloged and raised their Camp from Megara, purposing with all their forces to assail Herbfus. Hippocrates and Epicides supposing this to be the only way (or them, though at the first fight not the safest, considering all hopes besides were cut off) namely, to put themselves into the hands of the Iouliards, who were for the most part acquainted with them, and besides, upon the bruit of the execution and massacre of their fellow Iouliards, thoroughly chafed, went out to meet the army. The foremost ensigns in the forefront, hapned to consist of those six hundred Cretenians, who in the wars of Hieronymus had served under him, and received a favour and benefit at Annil at his hands. For being taken prisoners at Thralfymenus, among other auxiliaries that came to aid the Romans, they were set at large and sent away without ransom. Whom when Hippocrates and Epicides knew by their colours, habit, and fashion of their armour, they held out branches of olives and other vails and tokens of suppliants, beseeching them humbly to receive them, and being once received, to vouchsafe to protect them, and not to deliver them into the hands of the Syracusians: by whom they should soon be yielded unto the people of Rome, for to be murdered and cut in pieces. At this they all cried aloud with one voice, and willed them to be of good cheer, for they should fare no worse than their own selves. Upon this communication the ensigns laid, and the army stood still and marched not forward: but the general Captains wot not as yet what the cause might be of this stay. After the rumour was spread that Hippocrates and Epicides were come, and that all the host throughout by a general applause seemed to like well of their coming: the Prætors incontinently set spurs to horse, and rode forward apace to the forefront of the vanguard, demanding of the Cretenians, what manner and fashion this was of theirs? and how they durst be so bold: as to parl and talk with enemies? and without licence of their Prætors to entertain them within their companies? And herewith they gave commandment, that Hippocrates should be apprehended and boundure with chains. At which word the Cretenians set up such a cry, and the rest answered it again with the like, that it was well seen, in case they had proceeded forward as they began, they should have incurred themselves no small danger. And thus in great perplexity and fear of their own lives, they commanded to turn ensigns, and retire unto Megara, from whence they came; and dispatched messengers piently to Syracuse, to signify in what terms they stood. Hippocrates seeing the Iouliards piven to be suspicious, and ready to believe every thing, devised a cunning shift besides, in this manner. After he had sent out certain of the Cretenians to beset the waies between them and Syracuse, he pretended that they had intercepted some letters from thence, which he read unto the Iouliards, and were indeed famed and indited by himself. The tenor of the letters ran in this form: "The Prætors of Syracuse to M. Marcellus their friend, greeting. After theie salutations and commendations premised, as the manner is it followed written thus: you have done well and orderly in sparing none at all of the Leontins. But all other mercenary Iouliards besides are in the same Predicament: neither will Syracuse be ever in quiet, so long as any forraign aid be either in the City, or in your army. And therefore our advice and counsell is, that you would endeavour to get them into your hands, who with our Prætors are encamped before Megara, and by execution of them to deliver and let Syracuse free in the end.

The contents of theie letters were not to be soon read, but with such an outcry and alarm they ran to their weapons on all hands, that the Prætors amidst this garboil were faine to ride away as fast as they could gallop toward Syracuse. But although they were fled, the mutiny nevertheless continued and was not appeased: for the Iouliards fell upon the Syracusians that were in the camp amongst them: and they had all drank of the same cup, and not one escaped, but that Epicides and Hippocrates came between, and opposed themselves against the multitude in their furious rage not upon any pitifull compassion that was in them, or regard of common humanity, but because they would not cut themselves from all hope of return: and besides, they were not only desirous to have the Iouliards themselves affectionate unto them and faithful, and without inditing of hostages: but also purposed, by this so great deceit, first to gain and win unto them the kinsfolk and friends of those Iouliards, and afterwards to oblige and bind them fast by so good a pawn and egg, remaining still among them. And having good experience, with how small a puff and gale of wind the common people turneth every way, they suborned a Iouliard, one of them who was besieged within the City of Leontinus, to carry news to Syracuse, suting with those false tidings that were reported at the river Myti: yea, and to aver the same confidently upon his own knowledge, and tell things that were doubtful, as if they were most certain, and by himself seen and known: thereby to stir up men to anger and indignation. This fellow was not only credent of the common multitude, but also being brought into the Council-House, he greatly moved the Senat: insomuch as some of them, more light of beliefe than others, gave it out openly and loud, "That it was happy, that the avarice and cruelty of the Romans was thus discovered among the Leontins. And God bleis us from them here. For if they felt foot once within Syracuse, they would commit the like outrages, yea, and worse too a great deal, and more horrible: as they should find there greater matter to work upon, and to satisfie their covetous and greedy appetite to the full. Whereupon they agreed in generally, to shut the gates, and to stand upon their guard, and defend the City. But they all feared not alike, nor hated the same persons. For the martiall men, in a manner every one, and a great part of the common people abhorred the name of the Romans:

A Romans: the Prætors, and some few of the principal Citizens, albeit they were in the huff, and possessed with the false report aforesaid, yet they had more regard to providor to a mischief that was more imminent and near, and ready presently to fall upon their heads. And now by this time Hippocrates and Epicides were come before Hexaplos. Within the City the kinsfolk and friends of those Citizens which were in the army, drew together in conventicles, conferred among themselves to let the gates open, and agreed to have the common country of them all, to be defended against the violence of the Romans. Now, when one only wicket of Hexaplos was opened, and they ready to enter in thereto, the Prætors came upon them in the manner. And first they commanded by word of mouth, and threatened them; after that, by vertue of their place and authority they seemed to fright and terrifie them: and last of all, seeing nothing could prevail, forgetting their own dignity and majesty of their calling, they fell to pray and entreat them not to betray their country to thioie, who aforesome were the instruments and supports of the Tyrant, and now the corruptors of the army. But to deaf ear gave all the multitude in this their rage and furious fit unto the Prætors, that they within, as well as without, let their hands to, by all forcible means, to burst down the gates, and so when they were all broken open, the army was led in safe, and received within the Hexaplos. The Prætors fled for refuge with the youth and strength of the Citizens unto Acradina. The mercenaries, the fugitives, and all the Iouliards that were left in Syracuse (of them who served the King) joyined to the army and augmented their forces. And to Acradina also, was upon the first assault won. All the Prætors, but thioie that escaped by flight, and saved themselves in the midst of this hurly, were slain: and the night coming upon them, laid the massacre. The day following, all bondlives were called to receive the cap, and made free: the prisons were let open, and the prisoners let go at large. And this confused rabble and multitude of all sorts carried Hippocrates and Epicides Prætors, and thus Syracuse, having for a short time liberty shining favourably upon it, tell again into her old servitude.

When news hereof came to the Romans, incontinently they didloged and removed the camp from Leontinus, and marched directly towards Syracuse. It hapned the same time that the Embassadors sent from Appius by the way of the haven, were embarked in a galleye of five banks of oars: but another galley of four banks which was sent before, was not so soon on red into the mouth of the harbour, but it was taken: and the Embassadors hardly, and with much ado escaped in the other. And now the world there was grown to this pass, that no laws of peace, no, nor to much as the very laws of arms were observed, but broken clean: at what time as the Roman army lay in camp a mile and an half from the City at Olympus, the Temple of Jupiter. For when it was thought meet to send Embassadors from thence, Hippocrates and Epicides with their followers encountered them without the gate, and charged them upon their perill not to enter the City. The Roman Orator alledged, and said, "That he came not to proclaim war against the Syracusians, but to bring aid and help, as well unto thioie, who having escaped out of the midst of the slaughter fled unto the Roman Camp, as also unto them, who being kept under with fear, endured bondage and thraldom more miserable than banishment, yea, and death it self. Neither will the Romans (saith he) put up that shameful and cruell murder of their Allies without due revenge. And therefore, if those persons who were fled for succour unto them, may return home safely into their country: if the authors of that massacre above said, be delivered into their hands: and if the Syracusians may enjoy again their liberty, together with their laws, there shall not need any hostility or war. But in case these conditions be not performed they would persecute with fire and sword, all such as shall hinder and stand against the same, whosoever.

To this Epicides framed his words in this wise: "If (saith he) ye had any message and commission to pass with my brother and me, we would return you an answer accordingly. In the mean while ye were best be gone for this time, and return again as for the City and state of Syracuse: shall be under their governance, unto whom ye were sent. As when war, if the Romans think it good to deal that way, they shall find and know by experience, try when they won it, that it is one thing to assail Syracuse, and another to let upon Leontinus. And so leaving the Embassadors, he made the gates fast against them.

From this time forward the Romans laid siege unto Syracuse, and began to beleaguer it both by sea and land at once. On the land side at Hexaplos, by water at Acradina, upon the walls whereof the sea beareth. And like as they won the City of the Leontins, by terrifying them at the first assault, and therefore distrusted not, but that they should force and enter this also, one side or other, being so large and vast as it was, not compact, but built so scattering, one part far asunder from another, they approached with all their fabricks, engines, and ordinance of battery against the walls. Which enterprise of theirs, so resolutely begun and so hotly and forcibly followed, had sped well and taken effect: if one man at that time had not been in Syracuse, Archimedes was he a singular Astronomer. A rare man for contemplation and beholding the sky with the Planets, and other stars therein fixed: but a more wonderfull engineer for devising and framing of artillery, ordnance, fabricks, and instruments of war, whereby he would with very little ado, and at ease, check and frustrate all the inventions which the enemies with so great difficulty had prepared for to give the assault. This cunning artificer and admirable workman had planted engines of all sorts upon the curtain of the wall, which stood on certain hills, and those not of even height: and having for the most part high places that yielded hard access, and some other low again, whereunto men might come on even & plain ground, he fitted and furnished every place accordingly. Now Mar-

cellus from out his galleies of five ranks of oars assaulted the wall of Acra, which (as is above said) is washed and disched upon the sea. And from the other galleies, the archers, slingers, yea, and the light armed darters (called Velites) whose javelins are of that fashion, that they be unhandsome to be launched back again by those that have not the cast and skill of it) to assail the defendants, that they hardly suffered any one to stand upon the walls without hurt and danger. These I lay kept their galleies at distant from the wall, because archers and darters had need of some space and compass to lance, and led drive their shot. But unto the galleies of five course of oars, there were adjoynded other two of either side: for which purpose the oars within were taken away, that they might close larboard to starboard and so be coupled one unto the other. And thus being rowed as one entire gallei, by the help of the utmost oars without, they carried upon them platforms of timber, framed with floors and lofts of planks, and other engines and instruments within them to batter and shake the walls. Against this artillery from the galleies, Archimedes bestowed and disposed upon the walls counter-engines of sundry sizes, some greater, some smaller. Against those galleies that were furthest off he weighed and discharged stones of exceeding main weight and those that were nearer he annoyed with lighter bullets, but those he shot farther upon them. And last of all, to the end that his own Citizens might, without taking harm, make a counter-battery against the enemies, and so annoy them, he cauled certain batavians or loop-holes almost a cubit deep to be pierced through the walls, and to stand thick from the foot thereof, to the parapet: and all to flank the enemy, through which overtures, they within shot closely against the enemies some arrows out of bows, some quarrels out of scorpions and brakes of mean and indifferent bigne. And against those galleies which approached more close and near under the walls, because they would be within the shot and that they within might carry and level over them, he devised a crane or swive to be planted aloft upon the walls, having at the one end, which hung over the sea, a drag or grappling hook of iron like an hand fastned thereto with a strong chain: which took hold upon the prow of a gallei, and when the heavy counterpoise of lead at the other end weighed it down to the ground, and therewith drew with it the prow up on high, whilst it hung thus aloft in the air, the gallei stood in a manner endlong upon the poop. And then the swive being let go again all at once suddenly with a sway, dashed the gallei tumbling as it were down from the top of the wall, with such a twinge and violence against the water (to the exceeding fear of the mariners) that if it had fallen directly down right upon the keel, yet needs it must have received good store of water into it. Thus all their provision of assault by the sea-side, was deluded and made void: and then they turned their whole forces from thence, to give assault by land. But even that part of the wall likewise, was as well furnished with all manner of engines and ordnance, provided at the great charge of Hero, and by his careful forecast for many years together: but devised and framed by the artificial cunning and skill only of Archimedes. Besides the natural situation of the ground was a great help: for that the rock, upon which the foundations of the wall stand, is for the most part so steep and bending forward, that not only the shot leveled out of an engine, but also whatsoever was but rolled & tumbled down, with the very own weight and poise, came with a great force & violence upon the enemy. Which foreaid caule made the assailants to have difficult climbing up, and as unstedfast footing and keeping of their hold. Whereupon they went to counsel. And considering well, that all their attempts and enterprises were thus deluded and mocked by the enemy: it was thought good to give over assault, and only by long and continual siege, to cut them off from all victuals both by land and sea. In the mean while Marcellus with one third part (well near) of the army, went forth in expedition, to recover again those Cities, which taking occasion upon these troubles, were revolted to the Carthaginians. And he gained Pelorus and Herbessus, which yielded on their own accord. As for Megara, which he won by assault, he raised it down to the ground, and lacked it, to the fearful example of the rest and especially of the Syracusians.

And much about that time, Himilco also, who had a long time rid in the Bay of the Cape Pachynus with his Armado, disembarked and set land at Heraclea (which they call Mina) 2000 foot-men, 3000 horsemen, and twelve Elephants. He had not all this power of men when he lay with his fleet under Pachynus. For after that Hippocrates had taken and held the possession of Syracuse, he went to Carthage, where being sent unto both by Embassadors from Hippocrates, and also by letters from Annibal (who moved him and remonstrated: That now the time was come to recover Sicily again with much honour and glory: and being himself there present in person no bad solicitor by word of mouth to further and follow the cause) he easily persuaded the Carthaginians and prevailed that as great a power both of horse and foot as might possibly be raised, should pass over into Sicily. Being arrived at Heraclea, within few daies after, Agri-genum was delivered up into his hands. And all other Cities, which had banded and taken part with the Carthaginians, were put in so good hope to drive the Romans out of Sicily: that even they who were besieged within Syracuse, to take heart unto them: and were so in their mind, that supposing part of their forces sufficient enough to descend their City, they parted between them the charge and managing of the whole war in this manner: That Epicides should remain behind for the guard and defence of the City, and Hippocrates joynt with Himilco, and war joyntly against the Romans. He with 10000 foot, and 500 horse, let out by night: and passed between the Corni de guard, where none at all watched, and encamped about the Acra. As they were fortifying their Camp, Marcellus came upon them as he retired back from Agri-genum, possessed now by the adverse part: whether he had made great haste, but in vain, in hope to prevent his enemies, and get thither afore: but little thought he (and nothing less) than in his return from thence, at that time and in that place, to meet with an army of Syracusians that should make head against him. Howbeit, for fear of Himilco and the Carthaginians, whom he knew to be abroad, and with whom he was not able to make his part good with that power which he had about him, he marched as circumspectly as he could, having his eye on every side, and led his army in good order of battell against all occurrences whatsoever might happen by the way. And so as good hap was, that careful foresight and diligence, which he was provided with against the Carthaginians, served him in very good stead against the Sicilians. Finding them therefore busie in pitching their tents, without order, and scattered aunder, and most of them unarmed, he environed soon all the Infantry that they had, and put them to the sword. But the Cavalry after a slight skirmish begun, fled with their leader Hippocrates to Acra. Marcellus after he had by his slight repressed and kept in the Sicilians, who were at hand to fall away and revolt unto the Romans, returned to Syracuse: and after some few daies, Himilco joynt with Hippocrates and encompassed about eight miles from thence, upon the river Anan.

Likewise about the same time, or very near, it hapned that 55 war-ships of the Carthaginians, under the conduct of Bomilcar, Admirall of the Armado put into the great haven of Syracuse out of the deep and main sea: and also the Roman fleet of thirty Gallies, with five ranks of oars, arrived at Pachynus, and landed the first Legion there: and thus the war was turned and diverted from Italy. So wholly seemed both nations, as well Romans as Carthaginians, amused upon nothing now but Sicily. Himilco making full account to prey upon the Roman Legion which was set a land at Pachynus, as they should come to Syracuse: misled of the right way to meet with them: for he marched and led his power far within land higher in the country, but the Legion coasted along by the sea side, accompanied as it were with the fleet which flanked them: and came to Pachynus unto Appius Claudius, who with part of his force went out to meet them on the way. But the Carthaginians made no long stay about Syracuse, for Bomilcar having small trust and confidence in his ships, considering that the Romans were coming toward him with a fleet, and were twice as many in number: and withall seeing that by sojourning there, he did no other good but with his company impoverish and eat out his friends, spread and hoisted up sail, and with a merry wind passed over into Africke. Himilco also, who had dogged and followed after Marcellus in vain far as Syracuse, to spy some good opportunity and vantage to bid him battell, before he joynt with a greater power: seeing that he was hereof disappointed and the enemy lying about Syracuse safe and secure, as well in regard of their fortifications, as their forces: because he would not spend any longer time to no purpose in sitting there still, to look upon their Allies who they were besieged, he dislodged and removed from thence: attending, wherefore there were any hope and likelihood of revolt from the Romans, thither to come with his army, and then himself in person, to encourage and animate by his presence those that favoured his part. And first he recovered Murgantia, where the Roman garrison was betrayed by the inhabitants, and delivered into his hands. Into which City the Romans had conveyed great store of corn, victual, and provision of all sorts. Upon this revolt other Cities also took heart unto them, and the Roman garrisons were either thrust and driven out of the Castles and Fortresses, or else were treacherously betrayed, surprised, and destroyed.

The City Enna, seated upon an high hill, and on every side inaccessible as it was by natural situation of the ground impregnable, so had a strong garrison within the Castle, and a Captain of that garrison, one that was not so easie to be compassed and over-raught by deceitfull trains. His name was Pinaris, a witty man, and hardy withall, who repaid more trust in his own diligence to prevent, than he might not possibly be deceived, than in the truth and faith of the Sicilians. And at this time more than ever before, he stood upon his guard, and took heedfull care of himself and his charge: by occasion that he heard of so many treacheries and treasons, so many revolts of Cities, and massacres of garrisons: and therefore as well by day as night, he looked that the Castle was well provided and furnished of good watch and ward continually: so the soldiers never departed from their armour nor their appointed place. Which when the chief Citizens of Enna perceived, who already had covenanted with Himilco, and promised to betray the fort and the garrison, and saw that the Roman Captain was so wary, that he lay not open unto the opportunity of any fraudulent and guilefull course, they relolved by apert and open means to effect their their designed enterprise. They alledged therefore unto Pinaris, "That the City and Castle both ought to be in their power, because that they entered into league and amity with the Romans as freemen, and were not yielded as slaves to be kept in dures and prison. Reason would therefore, and meet it was (as they thought) that all the keys of the gates were delivered unto them. With good and trusty allies, their own faith and truth is the surest bond. And no doubt, the people and Senate of Rome would con them greater thank, and esteem more dearly of them, if so be they of themselves, not by constraint but of willing mind, would abide and continue in their found allegiance and fast friendship." Pinaris made answer again, "That he was by his General placed there Captain of the garrison: at his hands he received the keys of the gates, and the Constableness of the Castle, and the same to hold and keep neither at his own will, nor at the pleasure of the men of Enna, but at his disposition, who sealed him his Commission. Now for a Captain to abandon his fort (quoth he) is a capital crime among the Romans, by virtue of "a law, which our fathers themselves have confirmed, even by the exemplary punishment & death of their own children, who have transgressed the same. And seeing the Consul M. Porcius was so far off, may it please you, send your Embassadors unto him, of whom you may be certified, under whose power, commandment, and government I am, "Tullius say they, we will never entertain him. But if words and reasons may not prevail, we will work some other means to recover our liberty again. Then quoth Pinarius to them, It ye think much to address your messagers to the Consul, yet do me this favour, as to call a Common Council of the people for my sake, that I may know whether their demands proceed from some few, or from the whole body of the City. So it was accorded and agreed, that a general assembly should be proclaimed against the morrow. Then Pinarius after that he was departed from this party, returned into the streets, and calling his soldiers together, spake unto them in this wise: "I suppose ye have heard already (my soldiers) in what sort the Roman Garrisons have, these daies past, been betrayed and murdered by the Sicilians. That treachery hitherto ye have avoided and escaped: first & principally through the goodness of the gods: next and immediately by your own valour and prowess; & by continual watch & ward, standing in your armor both day & night. And I would to God ye might pass as well the time to come, without falling into this hard choice, either to endure and suffer such horrible mischiefs: or to execute and commit a fearful example of cruelty.

This intended treason of theirs hath been carried and conveyed closely and cautelously all this while: & seeing they cannot as yet meet with any advantage to surprize us, they would seem now openly and without dissimulation, to demand for to have all the keys of the gates under their hands. Which we should not to loose part with & render unto them, but presently Evma would turn to the Carthaginians, and more cruelly should we here be murdered and hewn in pec-ces, than the garrison was at Margantia. Much ado I had to obtain of them respite of this one night to take further counsel: that I might advertise you of the present danger, wherein both I & ye are bound. To-morrow morning by day-light, they purpose to hold a solemn assembly of the people, and to make speech unto them, to accuse me, and to stir them up against you. And to-morrow is the day that the City Evma shall overflow either with the blood of you, or of the inhabitants. And be ye well assured, that as ye shall lose all that you have, if they surprize you: so in case, you prevent them and begin the fray there shall no peril at all befall you. Look who first lifteth hand on his sword and draweth it, he shall carry away the victory clear. Therefore ye must be there preit in your armor, and attentive to expect a signal from me. I myself will be present in the assembly, and with parling and debating, temporise and draw out the time, until ye be all in readiness and everything in order. And so soon as I shall give you a sign with my gown, then let me hear you put up an outcry, then let me see you fall upon the multitude: down with them and spare not, but cut them all to the sword. See in any case there be not one other escape your hands and remain alive, from whom ye may fear any harm, either by fraud or force. And now I beseech thee O Dame Ceres, and thy daughter Proserpina, and all other gods in heaven above, or in hell beneath, who inhabit this City, these holy lakes and sacred groves, wherein ye are honoured and worshipped to vouchsafe to be propice and favourable unto us:
in case we enter into this action and enterprise, for the avoiding of treachery intended against us, and not to offer mischief unto others: and not otherwise, I would use more words unto you my friends and soldiers, for to animate and encourage you, if it were that you had to deal with men in arms: but since they are naked, unarmed, & unwarned, you shall kill and slay them at your pleasure, and satisfy yourselves with their blood. And to the end that you need not fear any harm from Himelo and the Carthaginians, loe the Consul himself lieth encamped near at hand. After this exhortation they were dismissed, to take their rest and rest. The next day, they were bellowed in sundry parts of the City, some to beset all the streets, others to stop the passages, and the waies against the townsmen, that they might not escape. But the most of them stood upon and about the Theatre, and were nothing suspected as being used heretofore to behold and see the assemblies of the people. The Roman Captain Pinarius was by the Magistrates brought forth and presented before the people: where he pleaded, That it lay not in his hands, but in the power and authority of the Consul, to dispose of that which they demanded: and heitorated for the most part the same allegations that he shewed the day before. At first they began gently to move him by little and little: afterwards more and more of them, required him to deliver up the keys; and so consequently all with one voice, charged and commanded him so to do: and when he seemed to make some stay and defer the matter, they menaced and threatened fiercely, yet, and seemed as they would no longer forbear, but proceed to extreme violence. Then the Captain made a sign with his robe, according to the former agreement: and with that the soldiers who had their eyes upon him waiting wittily for the signal and were ready for execution, set up a loud cry and ran in from about the multitude assembled over against them: others stood thick at every corner of the Theatre, where the people should go forth, and opposed themselves against them. Thus the men of Evma, shut up and penned within the Theatre were massacred and lay rubbied over upon others: not they only that were killed, but such also as fled one over another head: the found all upon the wounded, the quick upon the dead, one with another, by heaps.
Then there was running from thence sundry waies, and as if the City had been taken upon assault by the enemy there was nothing but murdering and flying away in every place. And as hot and furious were the soldiers in the execution of this unarmed multitude (whom they judged worthily and justly to be killed) as if like danger presented unto them, or choler raised in fer batel had provoked them thereto. Thus Evma was held still for the Romans by this means: were the deed mildly ill, or by circumstance needfull and necessary: Marcellus mistook not of the fact & grined the pillage of the Citizens of Evma to the soldiers: supposing that the Sicilians through-ly frightened by this fearful example would betray no more garrisons. The calamity and hard fortune of this City, (standing, as it did, in the very heart of Sicily) was in one day divulged and noised throughout the Island, from one end to the other. And otherwise, a famous and renowned town it was, either for the natural situation for exceeding strong: or because all places in it were accounted sacred and holy, in remembrance of Proserpina: who in times past left her footing & traces there at B what time as the was stolen away & ravished, by Pluto. Now it was generally thought by the Sicilians, that this curious and detestable massacre had defiled and polluted not only the habitations of men, but also the temples of the gods: whereupon even they likewise, who stood but doubtful and indifferent before, fell now away from the Romans and turned to the Carthaginians.

Then Hippocrates retired to Margantia and Himelo to Agrigentum: who were sent for by the conspirators and traitors within Evma, and approach with their forces, but to no purpose. Marcellus returned to the Leontine country: and after he had brought into the Camp corn and other victuals, and left there a meanguard, he presented himself to the siege that lay before Syracuse.
And when he had sent Appius Claudius to Rome to fetch for the Consul ship, he committed the charge in his room of the Armado there, and the old leguer unto T. Quinctius Crispinus. Himself crested and fortified his winning harbours five miles from Exapolis, at a place which men call Leontia. And these were the affairs of Sicily unto the beginning of winter.

In the same summer the war began likewise with King Philip, which had long before had been suspected. For there came Embassadors from Oricum to M. Valerius the Praetor, a friend of the fleet, for the defence of Brundisium, and the sea-coast thereabout of C. Iulius, and made report that Philip first assailed to win Apollonia, and was come up the river with one hundred and twenty light galleies, or trioles with two ranks of oares against the stream: and afterwards, seeing he could not effect his purpose, so speedily as he hoped, privily by night he approached with his army to Oricum: and that the City, situate upon a plain, neither strongly fenced with walls, nor well manned with soldiers, nor yet furnished with corn and munition, was at the first assailed, fired and won. And as they recounted these new news, they brought him to ground all the causes and to make head against this undoubted enemy of the Romans, either by Land or for as Sea, and to chase him away from them: who for no other reason were by him assailed, but because they were near neighbors to Italy. M. Valerius leaving the guard of that place to T. Valerius his Lieutenant General with a fleet of ships well rigged furnished & appointed: and having embarked these soldiers (which the galleies for war would not receive) in the merchants ships of burden arrived at Oricum on the second day after: and finding that City kept with a small and slight garrison, which Philip when he departed from thence had left there, he overtook it without much resistance, thither repaired to him embassadors from Apollonia, who brought word that they were besieged, because they refused to revolt from the Romans: and were not able to hold out any longer against E the forcible attempts of the Macedonians, unless a garrison of Romans were sent unto them. He promised to effect whatsoever they desired, and so shipped a thousand select and choice soldiers in galleies, and sent them to the mouth of the river under the conduct of a Captain of A. Navius Crispinus, an indolent man, and an expert soldier. He having landed his men, and sent the galleies back to Oricum (from whence he came) to the rest of the Armado, on landed his soldiers higher in the country, far from the river side, by a way that was not better known by the Kings forces: and in the night-season, unawares to all the enemies sent to the City. The day following they refused, only the Captain took a survey of the youth and able men of Apollonia of their armor and the munitions and forces of the City. When he had seen and perused all therupon he was well appaid and encouraged to fight, and withall he had learned by the scouts and spies, how ret, helpless, and negligent the enemies were without. So at midnight he went forth of the City without F any noise, and entered the Camp of the enemies so carefully guarded as it was and lying so open:
that by credible report, there were above one thousand men got within the trench and rampier, before that any one was ware thereof: and if they had held their hands, and not fallen to killing, they might have passed on still even as far as to the Kings Pavilion. But by reason that they slew the wardens next the gates, the enemies were raised: whereupon they were all so frightened and terrified that not only there was never a soldier took weapon in hand and went about to repulse the enemy out of the Camp: but even the King him self, who had as he was, and newly awakened out of his sleep, clad in simple apparel, scarce decent for a common soldier, ran himself in wor, for a King, was fain to run toward the river side to save his ships. Thither also the other multitude fled dis-G ordered in heaps. There were not many under three thousand either slain or taken prisoners in the camp. Yet there were more by odds of the enemies taken than killed. In the rising of the camp the Apollonians met with Catapults and Balists, and other engines provided for the assault of the City, which they conveyed all to Apollonia, to serve for defence of their walls against the like occasion of needfull service. All the booty besides of the camp was granted unto the Romans.

Tidings hereof being come to Oricum, M. Valerius presently set forth the Armado as far as to the mouth of the river, that the King might not find away to escape by sea with his ships: whereupon Philip distrustful his power as well by sea as shore, and doubting he was not able to march the

the Romans, drew up some of his ships to land, set fire upon the rest, and so by land went into Ardea, with a great part of his soldiers diarmed and spoiled. The Roman fleet wintered at Ostium with M. Valerius.

* The Reu
hant.

The same year in Spain the affairs went variably on both sides. For before that the Romans passed over the river Iberus, Mago and Asdrubal defeated a mighty host of Spaniards, so as, all the farther part of Spain had fallen from the Romans, but that P. Cornelius made haste to transport his army over Iberus, and came in good time to settle the wavering and doubtful minds of the allies. At the first the Romans encamped at Castro Alium, a place memorable for the death of great Amilcar. The Cattle was well fortified, and thither afore they had conveyed corn. But because all those quarters thereabout were full of enemies, and sundry times their Cavalry had charged the Roman footmen, and gone clear away without any harm, whereby there had been slain at times upon two thousand of them, which either made small haste away, and laid behind, or straggled looily over the fields: the Romans departed from thence, nearer unto places of more security and peace, and fortified themselves in camp upon the mount of Vittoria. Thither came Cn. Scipio with all his forces, and likewise Asdrubal the son of Gisco, the third Captain of the Carthaginians, with a full army. And they all encamped beyond the water, over against the fort of the Romans above said. P. Scipio, accompanied with certain light armed soldiers, was gone out closely to discover and take view of the places thereabout: howbeit, not so covertly, but he was espied by the enemies, and (no doubt) they had put him to a shrewd foil in the open plain champion, but that he took a little halt thereby for his vantage. Where he was environed and beset round about: but by the coming of his brother Lucius, he was delivered out of that danger.

Casula, a famous and strong City in Spain, and so near linked in affinity to the Carthaginians, that Annibal from thence married his wife, ranged to the Romans. The Carthaginians came against Illurgium and began to assault it because a garrison of the Romans lay there: and likethy were to be Matters of the town. by occasion especially of a great dearth and scarcity of victuals within. But Cn. Scipio for to relieve his friends and the garrison, went out with a legion lightly appointed with carriages, and marching between the two camps of the enemies skirmished with them, slew many of them, and entered the City. The morrow after he sallied out, joyined in fight with the enemy, and sped as well: so as in both battles there were slain of them above twelve thousand in the place, more than ten thousand taken prisoners, and 6 military ensignes carried away. Thus the siege brake up at Illurgium. After this the Carthaginians began to lay siege unto Bagara (a City also confederat with the Romans). But Cn. Scipio at his coming raised that siege without any conflict. Then the Carthaginians from thence went forward against Alinda, and the Romans followed them thither straight after. There they encountered together and fought a set battle with banners displayed, for the space well-near of four hours. And as the Romans bare themselves bravely and had got the better, and were at point of the victory, the retreat was sounded, by occasion that Cn. Scipio was hurt fore in his thigh with a barbed javelin, and the soldiers about him were greatly afraid that the wound was deadly. But no doubt, if it had not been for that stay and hinderance the very camp of the Carthaginians might that day have been forced. For not only the soldiers, but the Elephants also were driven already so far as the trench, and even there upon the very bank: 39 of them were flitted with darts and pikes. In this battell likewise were killed (by report) twelve thousand men almost three thousand taken prisoners, and 57 military ensignes won. Then the Carthaginians retired back to the City Ariminum, and the Romans followed upon them, because they would give them no time to rest and breathe themselves after their fights. Where Scipio being brought into the field in a litter, gave them battle the second time, and got the victory clear: but fewer of the enemies were slain by the one half than afore, because there were not so many in number left to fight. But (as they are a nation given naturally to renew war, and to ever fighting, and cannot give over they soon repaired and made up their forces. For Asdrubal had sent his brother Mago to levy and gather new soldiers: whereupon they took their heart again to try another field. This being for the most part other soldiers (new come) fought as it were in revenge, and to uphold that side which in few daies space had to oiten taken the foil, and demeaned themselves as courageously as they be afore, and sped as unto wardly. For there were slain of them above eight thousand, not many under one thousand taken captives, with military ensignes 58. In rifling of them there was found very much spoil of the Gauls, as rings of gold, carcanets, collars, and bracelets great store. Over and besides, two great Lords and Princes of the Gauls, whose names were Municapin and Civismarus, were slain outright in that conflict. Eight Elephants taken alive, and three killed.

Now when as the affairs in Spain went thus fortunately with the Romans, they began at length for very shame to thinke of Siguntum, a town that was the cause of all these wars, and had now five years already been in the hands and possession of the enemy. Whereupon by force of arms they recovered it, drove out of the town the garrison of the Carthaginians, and restored it again to the ancient inhabitants as many as remained alive, and had escaped these broils of war. As for the Turdetans, who were the occasion of the wars between the Saguntins and the Carthaginians, they subdued them, and brought them under their subjection, sold them in port sale, and destroyed their City utterly. These were the achievements in Spain, during the time that Q. Fabius and M. Claudius were Consuls.

At Rome, when the new Tribunes of the Commons were once centred into their office, presently

A. L. Metellus one of the Tribunes afore said, arrested the Censors P. Furius and M. Atilius, peremptorily to make their appearance and answer before the people. These Censors had taken from him being Treasurer of his Tribe, deprived him of liberty to give his voice, and made him Exuritus, and all, for being a party with them at Cannae, who plotted to abandon Italy. But by the means and mediation of the other nine Tribunes, they were discharged: for they would not suffer, that the Censors should come to their answer while they were in office. And the death of one of them, namely, P. Furius, was the cause that they could not accomplish the sifting and numbring of the Citizens. And when M. Atilius surrendered up his Magistracy, Q. Fabius Max. held the solemn Assembly and Parliament of the people for the election of Consuls, wherein were created Q. Fabius Max. the Consul his son, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time both absent. For Prætors, there were elected M. Atilius, and with him, they who at that time were Ædiles of the chair to wit, P. Sempronius Tudianus, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, and M. Emilius Lepidus.

This year, as it appeareth in old Records, were the Stage-plays first let out by the Ædiles of the chair, and continued four daies. This Ædile Tudianus above named was he who at Cannae when all beides him for fear were altooped, in that wofull calamity) brake forcibly through the midst of the enemies, and escaped. When Q. Fabius the old Consul had finished the Election then the new Consuls Elect were sent for to repair unto Rome, and they entered their Magistracy. Then they assembled the Senat for to consult and take order for the war for the Provin. as well their own, as those that were under the Prætors: also concerning the armies, and the disposition of every charge and place of command. So the Provin. es and armies were divided in this wise: The war with Annibal, where soever it fell out, was committed to the managing of the Consuls, with the charge of one army, which Sempronius himself had before under his conduct: and of another, commanded by Fabius the Consul. And those were two legions, M. Emilius the Prætor, whole lot it was to have the jurisdiction over the foreigners, had committed his authority unto his Colleague Atilius the Prætor of the Citizens of Rome, that he might govern the Province about Lucania, and those two legions over which Q. Fabius, now Consul, had the command, while he was Prætor. To Sempronius the Prætor befall the Province of Ariminum. To Cn. Fulvius was allotted Suessula, with two legions likewise: so as, Fulvius should have the leading of the legions D of Citizens, and Tudianus receive his from M. Pompeianus. The government of the foreign Provin. es continued still in the former deputies. M. Claudius ruled Sicily, so far as the dominion of King Hier extended: and Leontius the Vice-Prætor had the charge of the old Province, T. Octavius was high Admiral of the Navy, without any new supply or augmentation of forces. M. Valerius was employed in Greece and Macedonia, with one legion, and the Ataxado which he had before, Q. Mutius was L. Deputy in Sardinia, having under him the old army, consisting of two legions. And C. Terentius had the administration of the affairs in Picenum, with that one legion which long time he had been Captain of. Moreover, it was decreed and agreed upon, that there should be mustered and enrolled two new legions of Citizens, and twenty thousand men besides levied of Allies and Associates. With these Captains and these forces above said they provided for the defence and maintenance of the State and Empire of Rome, against many wars at once, either in hand already, or suspected shortly. The Consuls having enrolled two legions of Citizens, and chosen a supply to make out there, before that they set out of the City, procured the pacification of the gods, for the fearful and prodigious tokens that were reported. For the wall and gates of Rome were blatted and smitten with lightning from heaven: and likewise the Temple of Jupiter at Aricia. Other vain objects and illusions also of the eyes and ears, which men imagined they saw and heard, were beleaved for truths. Namely, there appeared in the river of Tiber certain resemblances and shews of Gallies, whereas indeed there were none such. And in the Temple of Jup. Vestinus, which standeth in the Territory of Casili, there was heard, footsooth rustling of armor: and the river of Aniternus seemed to run with blood. When satisfaction was made for these strange signs, the gods pleased, and all well again, according to the direction let down by the Priests and Prelates, then the Consuls set forward in their expedition, Sempronius into Lucania, and Fabius into Apulia. Where it fell out, that Fabius the father repaired into the Camp at Suessula, as Lieutenant and assistant unto his son. And when Fabius the younger went forth to meet him, and his Sergeants or Ulbers marching afore, said not a word to Fabius the father, nor put him aside to give way, for very reverence of his person, (such majesty he carried) the old man rode forward, and passed by eleven of the said Lictors with their bundles of rods. Then the Consul commanded the Sergeant that was next himself to do his office: and with that said Ulber called upon old Fabius, to alight from his horie back: and alast he set foot aground: I did all this but to try, quoth he, my son, whether you knew well that you were a Consul or no.

G There came that night secretly to the Consul while the Camp lay there, one Cassius Attimius, an Arpinate, with his three bondslaves, promising, that if he might have a good reward for his service, he would betray Arpin into his hands. Fabius then propoised this matter unto his Council, to be debated of. Some were of opinion, that Attimius was to be whipped and put to death, fugitive, ruggare and false knave as he was: a common enemy, and a dangerous to either part, and playing with both hands, like a double-hearted hypocrite. Who first, after the overthrow at Cannae (as if he might turn with the wheel of fortune, and go from his word and faith) full promise, and change ever as the changeth) ranged himself unto Annibal: and by his example drew with him Arpi to revolt and rebell: now after that he seeth the Roman estate to lie again and hold up head (and that beyond his hope, & contrary to his desires) he would play the villain and turn-coat again, and come with a new practice of a more shamefull treason than before: as if treachery and fallhood were of the nature and quality of a judgment passed in September court: and as if he might be allowed to carry two faces under a hood, and alter every hour. Faithless friend, that he is not to be trusted, and slippery enemy not to be regarded. A good deed it were, that together with that false traitor of Ealeris, and the other of King Py-rrhus, he made a third, and were punished accordingly for exemplary justice, to reach all rogues and ruggages hereafter how they run from their Lords and Masters. On the other side, old Ealeris (the Consuls father) replied, and said, That men now a daies had forgot how to make difference of occasions, and in the very heat & midst of wars, reasoned and gave their opinion and confidence of every thing and person as in a free time of open peace: when as indeed, we are to think, consider, and deliberate of this point, that (if possibly it might be) no more of your allies revolt from the people of Rome, rather than invite and incite them thereto: and after one is started aside, and upon repentance returned again to the ancient amity, to fall a reviling and rebuking of him, and bitterly to say that he deserveth to be made an example to all others. For if it may be lawfull for one to turn from the Romans, and held unlawful to return again unto the Romans no man need doubt, but shortly the Roman Empire will be forsaken of all her confederates and allies, and we shall see within a while all the Cities of Italy linked and confedered in one league and friendship with the Carthaginians. And yet (quoth he) I am not the man that thinketh Altimus worthy to be trusted in any thing for all this, but I would take a mean course & middle way between both extremities. My opinion is therefore that for the present he should be taken neither for enemy nor friend, but commanded to ward, and to have the liberty of a prisoner, and only be kept forth-coming in some confederate and trusty City, not far from the Camp during the time of the war. And when the war is once finished and ended, then I hold it good to deliberate and consult, whether that his former revolt hath deserved more punishment than this his present return meriteth favour and grace. Every man liked well of this advice of old Fabius, and gave their assent. So he was bound with chains, and both himself and his company delivered over and put in custody and a good room full of gold, which he then had brought with him: was by commandment reserved for his use. At Cales he made his abode: where all the day time he used to walk at liberty, with his keepers following him, but in the night they kept him close prisoner. But at Arpi, where his home was, they of his own house began first to miss him, and seek for him: afterwards, when it was noised throughout the whole City that he was out of the way, and could not be found: the same hereof caused a tumult, for the loss of a principal person as he was, thus revolted to the enemy. And for fear of an alteration in the State, presently the news thereof was sent to Annibal, Who was nothing offended thereat, both because long afore he had the party himself in jealousy and suspicion, as one neither flesh nor flesh, a man of no respect, and hardly to be trusted: and also for that he found a good occasion and quarrel to seize upon the goods of so rich and substantiall a Citizen and to make sale thereof. But to the end that the world might think that he was more angry against his person, than greedy of his substance, he joyined with cruelty, a grave course also of judiciall severity, that the one might serve as a file to give lustre to the other. For having sent for his wife and children into the Camp, first he examined them straightly, for to know whether he was fled, and what store of silver and gold he had left behind him at home in his house: and when he had learned enough of them touching every particular, and as much as he desired he burnt them quick to ashes.

Fabius being departed from Succella, purposed the first thing that he did to assail Arpi. Where he lay encamped a mile from the town: and after he had well viewed by near approach, the situation of the City, and considered the wall, look where he saw it was most strong and sure, and therefore guarded most slightly and negligently, there especially he purposed to give the hottest assault. And when he had sufficiently provided and got together all ordnance and engines, requisite for the battery of Cities, he made choice of the most hardy and valiant Centurions of the whole army and let over them certain Tribunes and Marshalls, valorous and doughty good men, and appointed unto them a Regiment of six hundred souldiers (for so many he thought sufficient for the present service) with direction and commandment, that when the trumpet sounded the relief of the fourth watch, they should bring scaling ladders to that place aspired. Now there stood a gate low and narrow, answering to the street not much used and frequented, by reason that quarter of the City was not inhabited, but flood void. That gate he gave them order first to scale and climb over, and then to go forward on the wall, and from within-forth to break down the bars, and level the said gate, and when they were Masters of that quarter of the City, then to wind the horn, and give signal to the rest of the forces forth to approach and come hard to the town, saying, That he would have all things in readines, and in good order. This direction was performed accordingly with great diligence, and that which was thought and feared would have been an hindrance and let unto them in the action, was the only thing which helped them most, that they were not defied. And that was a smoking shower of rain that began after midnight, which caused the wardens and watchmen to quit their standings, forsake the Sentinels, and to slee into the houses for covert. The first noise of the horn pouring down with such a force, made that the rumbling of the souldiers could not be heard, as they were breaking down the gate; and

As it grew after to rain more softly, and to keep still at one, it founded gently and sweetly in their ears, until it brought a good many of them fast asleep. Now after they had seized the gate, the Marshalls gave order, That the Cornettiers should be belleted in that void street asoraide, dis-tantly equally aunder, and to wind their horns, for to waken and raise the Consul, Which being done, according as it was before agreed, the Col, commanded the standards and ensigns to be brought forth, and somewhat before day-light entered at the said broken gate into the City. With that, the enemies at length began to rouse themselves, for now the shower and storm was past, and the day approached. There was a garrison in the City at hand of five thousand of Annibal's his souldiers, armed and well appointed: and the Arpins of themselves were 3000 strong. Those the Carthaginians put in the forefront, as a forlorn hope, and opposed them against the enemy, for fear of some treacherous prank that they might play behind their backs. First, they began to arraie themselves to fight in the dark, blind, and narrow lanes. For the Romans had filled and taken up not only all the streets, but also the houses that were next the gate to the end, they might not be guled with shot, and wounded from aloft. Some Arpins and Romans fell at length to meet, to take knowledge and acquaintance one of another, and to begin to commune and talk together. The Romans asked what the Arpins meant to rebell: for what offence and harm given of the Romans, and for what desert and benefit received from the Carthaginians should they (being naturall Italians) maintain war for Aliens, strangers, and barbarous nations, against the Romans their old friends and ancient Allies: and so to bring it by in subjection to Africke, to do homage and fealty, yea, and to become tributary, and to pay pension unto it? The Arpins excused and cleared themselves, saying, that they (simple men and ignorant in all things) were bought and sold by their great rulers and principall Citizens, and lived in manner as captives and slaves under the command of some few persons: that might do all. Upon this beginning, more and more of them grew to paring and conference. At length the Prator of Arpinum was by his own people and Citizens brought and presented before the Consul: where after faithful promise passed between the ensigns and the battels: the Arpins immediately bent their forces on the Romans side against the Carthaginians. The Spaniards likewise (who were not many under a thousand men) after they had capitulated and agreed with the Roman Consul, nothing lost this one article, That the garrison of the Carthaginians might be set forth and pass away safe without harm:
came with their colours to the Consul. Then all the gates were set open for the Carthaginians to depart: and being sent away upon safe conduct without any harm at all or damage unto Annibal, arrived at Salapia. Thus Arpi was restored again to the Romans, without the loss and detriment of any one man but one onely old traitor and new fugitive revolt, the Spaniards were appointed to have double allowance of victuals: and they performed good, faithfull, and valiant service many times after to the Common-weal.

When one of the Consuls was in Apulia, and the other in Lucania, one hundred and twelve men of arms, Gentlemen of the Nobility of Capua, having licence granted by the Magistrates to go out of the City, pretending to make a rode into the enemies country, and to fetch in booties and prizes, came directly into the Romans Camp lying about Succella. And meeting with the E. C. E. C. de guard, declared who they were, and that they would parli with the Lord Deputy. Now Cn. Fulvius was the General and Commander of the army there: who being advertized and persuaded hereof gave order that ten onely of all that number should be brought before him unarmed.
When he heard their suit and demand, which was nothing else, but that when Capua was recovered by the Romans, they might have their goods restored unto them: he received them all into his protection. The other Prator also Sempronius Tuditanus, won by force the town Luternum:
where there were taken prisoners above seven thousand men: and a good deal of copper and silver coin gained besides. At Rome there chanced a fearful and pitifull fire, which continued two nights and one whole day. All between S. Luca and the gate Carmentalis, together with the Equimilianum and the street Jugurinus, were burned down, and made even with the ground. Likewise without the gate the fire spread far all about, and in the Temples of Fortuna and Dame Matria, and Speres consumed much, as well hallowed as prophane.

The same year, when all things prospered well and had good success in Spain, P. and Cn. both S. P. having recovered many allies, and those of ancient league that came in again to him and yielded themselves: and besides, gained some new confederates: conceived good hope, and took heart to proceed farther, even into Africke.

Sophax King of the Numidians, on a sudden fell out with the Carthaginians, and became their professed enemy. Unto him the Scipios addrest three Centurions as Embassadors, to treat with him about a league and alliance: and so promise withall, that if he went on still to trouble and molest the Carthaginians, by making war upon them, he should do an high favour to the Senate and people of Rome: that they would endeavour and bring about, that in good time and place, he should be well required for that kindness, and receive at their hands double recompence with thanks. This embassage pleased the barbarous King right well. And after he had conferred and reasoned with the Embassadors, concerning military affairs, and the knowledge of warfare:
and heard those old & experienced souldiers talk of war, he soon found his own wants, and how unkilfull himself was in many points and feats of arms, in comparison of that methodical and orderly discipline, whereof they had discoursed. The first thing then that he requested at their hands, was this: That as they were good friends and faithfull Allies, two of them would go back with their Embassie unto their Generals, and that the third might remain with him, to read unto him a lecture in the military science of warfare, Saying, that the nation of the Numidians were raw and altogether unskilful in footmen service, and only nimble and practised in fight on horseback. So (quoth he) from the first beginning of our nation have our ancestors used to war: & to have we from our childhood been enured to fight. My, an enemy I have, trusting and preioming much upon his Infantry, whom I would gladly be able to match every way in all kind of service. Footmen I am able to set out as well as another: for why? My Realm is populous and yieldeth abundance of men: but altogether ignorant we are, how to fit them with armor, how to marshall them, how to order and set them in battell array: in so much as all my people in battell go to it pell-mell, and are as a multitude huddled and thrummed together at a venture without skill without discretion and adviement. The Embassadors answered and said, That for the present they would do according to his will and pleasure: but withal, they had his faithful promise & word of a Prince that he should immediately send back their companion again, in case their Generals approved not their deed in that behalf. Q. Statorius his name was, that flaid behind with the King. So Siphax sent by the two Romans his answer to the forelaide Embassage into Spain: and besides, with them other Numidians, Embassadors of his own to receive farther assurance and security from the Roman Generals: unto whom he gave in charge, that forthwith they should solicite, perfwade, and entice all the Numidians that were auxiliary fouldiers unto the Carthaginians, and served in any Camp City, or garrison Town of theirs, for to abandon them and come to him. And Statorius for his part, having mustered a great multitude of serviceable young men, choiceth out and enroled a power of footmen, to serve in the Kings wars: and when he had forced them into bands and companies, and ordered them in battell array, as near as possibly he could, to the manner of the Romans: he trained them in their running to follow their colours:

 he taught them to keep their places in their ranks, and to double their files: and likewise he accustomed them to travel and do work, and so acquainted them with other military orders and exercises, that within short time, the King repofed as good confidence, and was as mighty in his new Infantry, as in his old Cavalry: and in a ter pitched field on even ground, was able to meet the Carthaginian with better displayed, and give him the foil in a full battell. The coming of the Kings Embassadors into Spain, was to the Romans also a matter of great consequence and importance: for upon the rumour and time that went thereof the Numidians began to fall away apace, and to come thither unto the Romans. Thus were the Romans joyned in amity and friendship with King Siphax.

When the Carthaginians had intelligence of this new alliance they addressed immediately their Embassadors to Gala, who reigned in another part of Numidia, over a nation called Masani. This Gala had a son named Masani, of seventeen years of age, but a youth of such towardsness, and so forward in verue, that even then he made good and apparant shew, that he would another day enlarge his dominion, and make a more flourishing and mighty Kingdom than his father should leave it unto him. Their Embassadors declared unto Gala, "That forasmuch as Siphax
 "had entered league, and was banded with the Romans, to the end that by their alliance and so"ciety, he might be more mighty and puissant against other Kings and nations of Affrick: it "were also better for him and much more commodious to joyn with the Carthaginians in all "convenient service before that either Siphax passed over into Spain, or the Romans into Affrick:
 "And Siphax (say they) may soon be defeated and overthrow now, while that he hath gained "naught, yet, but the bare name of the Roman League. Gala was soon perfwaded to send a power of men especially at the earnest instance of his son, who was very desirous of that war, and to have the managing thereof. He with the help of the Carthaginian legions vanquished Siphax, and gave him a great overthrow. So as at that field there were slain, by report in one day thirty thousand.
Siphax himself in person, with some few Numidian horsemen fled back to the Maurians, that inhabit the farthest coasts, hard upon the Ocean over-against Gades. But the barbarous people at the fame of his coming to relorded in great numbers to him out of all parts that in a short space he was able to arm a mighty host. And before he could with them cross over into Spain, was divided from Affrick with a narrow arm of the sea, Masani was come with his victorious Army: who in that place, of himself, without any help or aid of the Carthaginians, gave Siphax battell to his great honour and singular glory. In Spain no memorable exploit was achieved, but that the Roman Generals allured and drew to them the able and serviceable manhood of the Celtiberians, for the same hire and stipend that they bargained for with the Carthaginians:
 and sent from thence above three hundred Spaniards of the noblest parentage into Italy, to solicite their countrymen, who served under Annibal as auxiliaries, to follow them and take part with the Romans. This only, touching the affairs of Spain that year, is a thing worthy to be noted and remembered. That the Romans never waged fouldier to serve in their war before that time, when the Celtiberians began to be their mercenaries, and first received pay.

The five and twentieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the five and twentieth Book.

Publius Cornelius Scipio, surnamed afterwards Africanus, was made Edile, before he was of law-full years. Annibal was the City Tarentum (all but the Castle, into which the Roman Garrison was retired) by means of certain young Tarentine Gentlemen, who had made semblance, that they went by night a hunting. The solemn plaies in the honour of Apollo, were now first instituted, upon occasion of certain propheticall verses of Martius, wherein the overthrow at Cannæ had been foretold. Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claudius Consul, fought fortunately against Hanno, a Duke or Captain of the Carthaginians. T. Sempromius Gracchus the Pro-Consul, was by a Lucius (who bestowed that gave him entertainment) trained into the danger of an ambush, and slain by Mago. Cerentius Penna, who had served in the wars as a Centurion, having made suit unto the Senat, to have the leading of an army, and promised, if this petition were granted, to win the victory of Annibal and to vanquish him, gave the charge of eight thousand footmen, and gave battell to Annibal: but he was slain himself, and his whole army defeated and put to the sword. Cn. Fulvius the Prætor fought unfortunately against Annibal, and left his fl-id: in which fight there died sixteen thousand men. Himself, with two hundred horsemen fled and captured. Capua was besieged by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius, the Consuls. Claudius Marcellus in the third year of the hege won Syracuse, and gave himself in this service like a worthy and noble Knight.
 In that tumult and busily-burly when the City was taken, Archimedes, whilst he was busily occupied about certain Geometrical figures and forms that he had drawn in the dust, was killed. The two Sci-pios, Publius, and Cornelius, after so many and so worthy exploits performed fortunately in Spain, came to a weifull and heavy end, being themselves slain thereby, with the loss well-near of their whole Armies, in the eighth year after that they went into Spain. And the main possession of that Province had then quite lost, but for the singular manhood and industry of L. Martius, a Knight of Rome, who having rallied and gathered together the remnants of the armies so encouraged them by their valiant service two several encamped holds of the enemies were won, seven and thirty thousand of the enemies slain, and eighteen hundred taken prisoners, and a great rich booty obtained, whereupon he was called Captain Martius.

The five and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

VVhiles these affairs thus passed in Affrick and in Spain, Annibal employed the summer season in the territory of Tarentum, in hope by treason to be Master of the City of the Tarentine. In which mean while certain bale Cities of the Salentins, and towns of no importance revolted unto him. And at the same time, of those twelve States of the Bruttii, which the year before had turned, and banded with the Carthaginians, the Consentins and Thurins were rallied wholly again to the devotion of the people of Rome. And more of them had returned likewise, but for L. Pomponius Viciatinus Captain of the Allies: who after he had made certain rides into the country of the Bruttii, and sped his hand well with many booties, took upon him the countenance of a sufficient Colonel, and was no less reputed: and having gathered a power of men, suddenly in haste, without good adviement, fought with Hanno. In which conflict, a mighty multitude of his men were either slain or taken prisoners. But, as good hap was, they were but a disordered unruly rabble of rustical Clowns and bond-slaves: and the least loss of all other, was the Captain himself, who amongst the rest was taken captive: a man as then, the author of a rash and fool-hardy fight, and had been a foretime a Publican or farmer of the City revenues, and always (through his naughty practises and cunning fetches and shifts wherein he was become skilful) a dissolupt person and dangerous both to the pub-like State, and also to those private companies and societies, with whom he had commerce and dealing. Sempromius the Consul, lying in the Lucans country made many light skirmishes, but not any one worth remembrance, and won certain poor towns, and of small regard, belonging unto the Lucans.

The longer that this war continued lingering, whilst prosperous success and adverse mishap interchangeably wrought much variety and alteration as well in the inward minds of men: as in their outward state and fortune: such religious zeal and superstition (and the same for the most part in soirein ceremonies) had so seized & possessed the City, that either the men or gods thereof, were suddenly all at once become clean altered and transfigured. In so much as now the Roman rites and holy observations were contemned, not only in secret, & within doors at home in their private

private houses, but abroad also in the open streets, yea, and in the common place and Capitol: where there stood always a sort of women that neither offered sacrifice and oblations, nor said their prayers, and did their devotions according to the use and custom of their native country and City. Certain odd Priests and Chaplains, yea, and doting wizards and blind Prophets, had inveigled the minds and consciences of men: whose number was the greater by reason first of the rural people and peasants of the country, who for need and poverty, and for fear together, were driven to quit their lands which they had not tilled and husbanded, by reason of the long wars, and many invasions and rodes that laid all waste, and so retired into the City: afterwards by the ease of occupation and ready means of gain which they found by the error of others, whom they soon seduced and abused: which trade they used and practised openly, as if it had been a lawful art and mystery. At the first divers good and honest persons began secretly to grieve and be offended herewith, yea, and to mutter and utter their griefs in private: but afterwards in process of time the matter was presented before the LL. of the Council, and brake forth to open complaint in publick places. The Ædiles and Triumvirs Capital were blamed much, and sharply rebuked of the Senate, for not redressing these disorders: and when they went in hand to rid the common place of this multitude and to cast down, overturn, and sling away the preparation and provision for their sacrifices and oblations, they had like to have been misused and mischieved by the people. When this malady and mischief seemed now to be greater than might be remedied and reformed by the meane and inferior Magistrate, M. Æmilius, Prator of the City for the time being received Commission by order from the Senate, to see that the people were kept and delivered from this new religion and superstition. He not only read unto them in a publick assembly the decree of the Senate in that behalf, but also made proclamation, Imprimis, that whosoever had any books of prophecies or prayers, or treatises written of this art and science of sacrifices, should bring in all those books and writings unto him before the Calends of April next ensuing. Item, that no person should sacrifice either in publick place, or sacred Church after any new form or foreign rights and traditions. And in that year there died certain publick Priests, to wit, L. Cornelius Lentulus the Arch. Prelate, or high Priest: and C. Pappus Maso the son of Lucius, a Decemvir deputed for holy mysteries. In place of Lentulus and of Pappus were M. Cornelius Cethegus, and Cn. Servilius: Cp. substituted high Priest and Bishop. For August there was created L. Quintus Flaminius: and L. Cornelius Lentulus was chosen Decemvir over sacred ceremonies and divine service.

Now the time drew near of the solemn election of new Consuls: but because it was not thought good to call the old ways, busied as they were in the wars) T. Sempronius one of the Consuls nominated for Dictator, to hold that election aforesaid. C. Claudius Nero, who named for his General of the Cavalry Q. Fulvius Flaccus, this Dictator, the first comital day following retired for Consuls Q. Fulvius Flaccus above named, his General of horsemen, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, who in his Pratorship had the jurisdiction and government of the Province of Sicily. Then were the Prators elected Cn. Fulvius Flaccus, C. Claudius Nero, M. Junius Silvanus, and P. Cornelius Sulla. When the Election was ended the Dictator resigned up his place.

That year was Ædile Curius together with M. Cornelius Cethegus, one P. Cornelius Scipio, whose surname afterward was Africinus. When he died and made suit for the Ædileship, and the Tribunes of the Commons were against him, objecting that he was not eligible and capable of that office for that he was not of lawful age to be a competitor and to put in for it: it (quoth he) all the Quirites and Citizens of Rome will choose me Ædile, I have years enough on my back. Whereupon, in favour and furtherance of his suit, there was such running and labouring on all hands to the Tribes for their voices that the Tribunes indubitably foresaw their purpose to hinder him. And this was the largest and denotive that the Ædiles bestowed. The Roman Games were according to the wealth of that time exhibited and set out with great rate and magnificence: were continued one day longer than ordinary: and for every street throughout the City, was allowed: N. Cornutus of Capua, L. P. Tappulus, and M. Fundanus Fuscus Ædiles of the Commons, accented certain dames and wives of the City before the people, of dishonest and incontinent life: and some of them being condemned, they forced into banishment. The Games called Plebeis, were renewed for two daies: and by occasion of these games a solemn feast or dinner was kept for the honon of Jupiter.

Then Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time entered the Consulship, together with Appius Claudius: and the Prators call lots for their Provinces. It fell unto P. Cornelius Sulla his lot to have the jurisdiction both of Citizens and strangers, which before was executed by twain. To Cn. Fulvius Flaccus fell Apulia: to C. Claudius Nero was allotted Suessula: and M. Junius Silvanus his hap was to have the rule of the Tuicans. The Consuls were appointed by decree of the Senate to war with Antioch, and to have under their command two legions apiece: and that one of them should receive his legions of Q. Fulvius, the Cof. of the former year: and the other take his at the hands of Fulvius Crinidatus. As for the Prators, Fulvius Flaccus had Commission for the conduct of the legions at Lucania, which served under Æmilius Prator there: and Nero Claudius was to have the leading of those that were under the hand of C. Terentius Peticum: and that they should provide themselves of supply to make up the full number of the Companies. M. Junius had the charge of the legions of Citizens miltred the year before to serve in Tuscanay: T. Sempronius Gracchus,

* About a wine gallon.

Gracchus and P. Sempronius Tuditanus continued still in the government of their Provinces, the one of Lucania, the other of Gallia, and kept their own forces. Likewise P. Lentulus governed the old Province in Sicily: M. Marcellus was Lord Deputy of Syracuse, and so far as the Realm and Dominion of King Hiero reached, T. Octavius Admiral of the Navy. Greece was governed still by M. Valerius, Sardinia by Q. Mutius Scævola, Spain by P. and Cornelius Scipio. To the old armies before, there were other two new legions levied and enrolled by the Coff. So as in all, the whole forces for that year amounted to 23 Legions.

When the Consuls should mutter the soldiers, they were hindered by occasion of a lewd prank played by one M. Posthumus Pyrgensis, to the great trouble and disquiet of the State and publick peace. This Posthumus was by his vocation and calling a Publican, who many years together for crafty and deceitful dealing, for avarice and covetousness, had not his fellow in all the City, but it were Lupomanius Pientianus again: the same man, whom the year before, as he foraged the territories of the Lucans rashly and unadvisedly, the Carthaginians by the conduct of Hanno had taken prisoner. These two (forasmuch as it was covenanted and indented before, that the transporting of those things which were for the provision of the armies beyond sea, should be warranted by the City against all danger of tempest: and that all damage and loss of goods that way mis-carrying, should not lie upon the shoulders of the Publicans, who had undertaken by great to serve the smiles, but be made good again out of the common Chest and Treasure: these publicans (I say) not only gave false information of certain shipwracks, but also if they brought word at any time truly of some ships that were perished, they were such only as were lost by their own fraud and deceit, and not call away by chance or violence of weather. For they would straight charge certain old vessels and shaken bottoms, with some few wares of small or no worth at all, and suffer them to sink for the nonce in the deep sea, and save the mariners and sailors with small pinnales and cockboats prepared aforehand for the purpose: and when they had done, lie shamefully and say, that they had lost merchandise and commodities in those ships of sundry sorts, and of great value. These cunning parts of theirs had been the year past revealed and notified to M. Æmilius, the Prator, and the Senate by him made acquainted therewith: howbeit there was nothing done, nor any act of Senat devised for the chastisement of the offender: because there was nothing done, nor in case would offend the company and society of these publicans and farmers, in such a time especially when there was some need of them. Then the common people took the matter into their own hands, for to proceed with more severity against this lewd and fraudulent practice. At length two of the Tribunes of the Commons, Sp. and Lucius, both Carvili, arose up and shewed themselves. For seeing how odious and infamous an indignity this was, and not to be suffered they brought M. Posthumus in question, and laid an action and set a fine upon his head, of two hundred thousand Aſſes. When the day of trial was come, whether the fine aforesaid should stand and be paid, or taken off and remitted: and that the Commons were assembled in so great numbers, that the great Court yard of the Capitol would scarcely hold the multitude: the defendant spake for himself and pleaded at large. But the only hope that he seemed to have was this, in case C. Servilius Sulpicius a Tribune of the Commons a friend and near kinsman of Posthumus, would by virtue of his place come between and stop the course of law for proceeding farther, before that the tribes and wards were called forth, to go together and to give their voices. The two Tribunes above named, having brought forth the witnesses to depose, and their depositions being taken, commanded the people to void and make way: And the lottery casket or sifter was brought forth to call lots in what Tribes the Latines should give their voices. All this while the Publicans were earnest with Caſca, to dissolve the assembly by one means or other, and put off the Court for that day. The common people on the other side, called on hard and gainfraid it. And as it fell out, Caſca fast most in one of the points and corners of the assembly. He wist not what to do his mind was so perplexed for shame of the one side if he did not help his friend and kinsman, and for fear on the other side, because he saw the people so eagerly bent. The Publicans seeing final hope of help in him, with full intent to make him stir, and to trouble the Court, put forward forcibly and advanced themselves through a void way, seized upon an high place, and between the Tribunes and the people, rushed in upon them, and fell to quarrell and brawled both with the people of the one side, and also with the Tribunes on the other: infomuch as they were like to go together by the ears. Whereupon Fulvius the Consul, "See ye not (quoth he) to the Tribunes how basely ye are accounted of and made of no better reckoning among them, than private persons? See ye not a riot and mutiny toward, unless ye make haste and break up the assembly? So the Commons were dismissed, and a Senate called: Where the Consuls made relation to the Lords of the Council, and complained how the solemn Session and Court of the Commons, was by the audacious violence of the Publicans disturbed: "That Court (I say) wherein M. Furius Camillus, upon whose exile ensued the destruction of the City, suffered himself to be condemned by ungrateful Citizens: wherein the Decemvirs afore him by virtue of whose laws the City is governed, and we live at this day: and wherein my principal Citizens afterwards have been content to be set down and judged by the people. Moreover, how Posthumus Pyrgensis by force wrested from the Commons, the liberty of their voices and suffrages: subverted and made void the judicial Session of the Commons: curbed the Tribunes and had no regard of them: came as it were in warlike manner against the people of Rome and got for their vantage the higher ground, to keep the Tribunes from coming unto the Commons: "and

"and to stop the tribes for being called to scrutiny and to give their voices: and nothing else it was that kept men from committing a fray, and shedding blood, but the patience of the Magistrates themselves: in that for the present, they gave place to the furious rage and malevolent fancies of a few: and for his will and pleasure brake up the assembly, before they could go together about the matter they were met for: (which the defendant himself with force of arms was ready to stop and hinder for going forward) because they might have no occasion given them to quarrel, which was the only thing that they sought for. When this matter with all the circumstances was thoroughly scanned out, and the best men there had spoken their minds, and given their opinion according to the outrageousness and indignity of the thing: and thereupon the Senate decreed, that this violence tended to the breach of common peace, and the hazard of the State (as I most dangerously precedent to be suspected) then without more ado, the two Carvili Tribunes of the Com. laid clean all debating about the penal fine aforesaid, and indicted Postumius of a capital crime: and commanded him to be attached by a principal Serjeant, and to be led to prison, unless he put in good sureties for his appearance to answer the cause, such as would be bound for him body for body. Postumius put in bail: and made default at his day. Then the Tribunes called the Commons together, preferred a bill unto them, which they granted to pass as an act, in this form: That if M. Postumius came not forth & made appearance before the Calends of May, and being cited and called that day, answered not to his name, and no lawful excuse alleged for his absence: they judged him to be a banished man, and therefore awarded his goods to be sold in port-sale and himself to be excommunicate, and interdicted the use of water and of fire: and to lose the benefit of a Citizen for ever. This done, they began also to entitle all those, one after another, of a capital crime, who were his abettors, and the movers and stirrers of a sedition and commotion of the people, and to call for personal pledges. At the first they committed as many of them as could find no such sureties: and afterwards, those also that were sufficient to put in bail. For the avoiding of which danger, most of them departed into voluntary exile. This was the end of the Publicans fraudulent dealing: and this was the issue of their audacious enterprise, in defence and maintenance of their guile and deceit.

After this, a solemn Court was called for the creation of the Arch-Prelate, and M. Cornelius Cethegus newly elected Prelate, was the President of this election. Three competitors there were, who stood for that Prelacy, and strived earnestly one against the other: namely, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, Consul for the time being, who also had before been twice Consul, and Censor besides; also T. Manlius Torquatus, a man of great reputation, for that he had been likewise dignified with a double Consulship, and one Censorship; and last of all, P. Lucius Crassus, who as yet, was to lose the Adulthood: howbeit, this young man in that fate and contention was superior, and carried it away from those grave, ancient, and honourable persons. Before him, for the space of an hundred and twenty years, there had not been created any one, the highest Priest, (save only P. Cornelius Calpurnius) but had sit before in the Ivory Chair and born office of State. The Consul had much ado to go through with the Levy, and to enroll the full legion of soldiers, by reason that the small number of young and able men would hardly afford both to furnish out the new legions of Citizens, and also to supply and make up the old. Howbeit the Senate would not suffer them to give over their enterprise which they were about, but agreed that there should be chosen two Ternions of Triumvirs: the one sort of them to be sent out, within the compass of fifty miles every way from Rome, the other to go farther; with commission, to take good view and survey, both within that precinct and without, in all thorough-fares and market towns: in boroughs and places of frequent assemblies; of all persons of free condition that they could set eye on: and so many as they thought able men of body to bear arms, although they were not come to the lawful age for service, to press them for soldiers. Also it was decreed, that the Tribunes of the Commons, if they pleased, should put up a bill, that all under seventeen years of age, who had bound themselves by military oath, should have as good pay, as if they had been enrolled soldiers at seventeen years or upward. By virtue of this decree, the two Ternions aforesaid of the N Triumvirs being chosen, made diligent search, and visited all the country over for free-born men accordingly.

At the same time letters came from M. Marcellus out of Sicily, concerning the demands of the soldiers, who served under P. Lentulus, and they were read in the Senate House. That army consisted of the residue which remained after the field lost at Canna, and was confined into Italy (as hath been said afore) with this condition, not to return back into Italy before the Punick war should be ended. These soldiers obtained licence of Lentulus to send as Embassadors unto Marcellus (where he lay in winter harbour) the principal men of arms, such as served on horse-foot, allowed by the City, the chiefs Centurions also, and the bravest soldiers and choice flowers of the Legions. One of these in the name of the rest, having liberty granted them for to speak, made his oration in this wise, "We had come to you into Italy, O M. Marcellus, when you were Consul: immediately upon that decree made against us (which if it were not unjust and unreasonable, yet surely it was heavy and rigorous enough: but that we hoped to be sent into this Province) (so generally troubled and out of order by the death of the King, there to be employed in some dangerous and cruel war against the Sicilians and Carthaginians both at once, and so with our bloodshed and grievous wounds to make satisfaction for our trespass unto the Magistrates and rulers of Rome. Like as in our fathers daies, they which were taken prisoners by King Pyrrhus before Heraclea, made amends for their fault by their good service against the same Pyrrhus. And yet, I can not see, [my LL. of the Senat] for what ill desert of our parts, ye either have been displeased aforetime, or are offended at this present with us. For me thinks, I see both Consuls, and the whole body of the Senat of Rome, when I behold your face, O Marcellus: whom if we had had to our Consul at Canna, it would have gone better both with the Common-weal, and with our selves, then it did. For I beseech you, suffer us now, before I make moan, and complain of our hard fate and condition, to purge out selves of that crime for which we are blamed. Set aside, that neither the wrath of the Gods, nor destiny and fatal necessity (upon the Law and decree whereof dependeth the immutable order and infallible course and consequence of all things in the world) was the cause that we were defeated & overthrown at Canna, but our own selves, and our default was the occasion: let us see then, whose fault it was, the soldiers, or the Generals? For mine own part, I remember I am a soldier, and of my Captain and General I will never speak but well: of him especially, unto whom I know the Senat rendered thanks, for that he depaired not of the common-weal: and whose government ever since his flight and running away, hath been prorogued from year to year, and who hath had the conduct of armies continually. Neither will I say ought of the rest likewise, who escaped that unfortunate foil and defeat, I mean our military Tribunes and Colonels, who (as we hear say) sue for dignities, bear honourable offices in City, yea, and rule whole Provinces as LL. Presidents in foreign parts. It is so indeed my LL. do ye to easily pardon and forgive your own selves and children? and deal ye so hardly, so rigorously and cruelly, against us base objects persons, and vile wretches? And was it no shame and dishonour imputed to the Consul and other great personages of the City to flee, when there was no other hope? and were the poor soldiers sent by you into the field with this intention, to be all killed up, and none to escape? At the battail of Alia, the whole army in a manner fled away: All at the Straights of Caudium (to say nothing of other shameful foils of our armies) the host yielded up their armor to the enemy, before they joyined battel and fought one stroke. Yet, so far off it was, that those armies sustained any infamy and shameful reproach therefore, that both the City of Rome was recovered again by the means of those Regiments which fled from Alia to Veii, and also the Candine legions which returned to Rome naked, were sent again into Sannium well armed: who subdued and brought under the yoke of subjection the very same enemies, who had taken such pride and joy in that dishonour and ignominy of theirs. And now, for the army before Canna, is any man able to come forth and charge them justly, that either they fled, or for cowardly fear behaved themselves unequally, and not like soldiers? Where were slain in field above fifty thousand men: from whence the Consul fled with fifty Horsemen, and no more: and of which company thereof not one remaineth alive, but whom the enemy, weary with killing, spared and left. I remember, at what time as the prisoners taken there, were denied money to pay for their ransom, then every man commanded and praised us for saving and relieving our selves against another day, to be employed in the service of the Common-weal: for returning unto Venusia to the Consul, and for making a good shew of a compleat army. But now, in worse case are we, than in our fathers daies, captives have been that were taken prisoners. For they only had their armor and weapons changed for worse, their rank in the battel shifted, their place in the camp where they should quarter, altered: which notwithstanding, they recovered again all at once, by performing their good devoir to their country, and winning a victory in one fortunate battel. Not one of them was ever confined (as it were) to a place of exile: to be brief, they were let to fight with some enemy or other, where they might once for all, either lose their life, or end their dishonour. And we, against whom nothing can be objected at all, unless it be this, that we were the cause, and none but we, that some citizen of Rome might be said to remain alive of all those that were at the battel of Canna: we I say, are sent far enough off, not only from our native country, and Italy, but also from all enemies: where we wax old in exile, to the end, that we should have no hope, no occasion and opportunity to wipe away and cancel our disgrace, to mitigate and pacify the anger of our fellow-citizens, and finally to die with honor. But it is neither end of shame, nor reward of vertue and valour, that we desire and crave: but only that we might be permitted to make proof of our courage, and shew our prowess. Pains and perils we seek for, and to be employed in dangerous adventures, like hardy men and brave soldiers. Two years already there hath been sharp and hot war in Sicily. Some Cities the Carthaginians won by force, other some the Romans took likewise by assault. Whole Regiments of foot, many troops and corners of Horse encounter together, and assault one another. At Syracuse there are great enterprises and worthy feats of arms, both by Sea and Land. The shouts of them that fight, the clattering and ringing again of their armor and weapons, we can hear where we are, and we sit still like idle larks, and do nothing, as if we had neither hands nor weapons to fight with. T. Sempronius the Consul, with legions of bond-slaves, hath hidden battel to the enemies, and fought with them in plain field so oft, that they are well recovered for their labour with gaining their freedom first, and then the Burgeoisie of the City. Let us yet, in place and quality at leastwise, of bondslaves taken up and bought for money against these wars, fight with those enemies, as well as they have done, and by our fight trye, whether we can regain our en- livenment and liberty. Will you your self, O Marcellus, make trial of us, and of our valour, by Sea,

of one of the Embassadors on the consil soldiers unto Marcellus.

"by Land, in pitched field, and battelranged, or in giving assault and winning of walled Towns?
 "Put us to it, and spare not. The hardest adventures, the most painful and dangerous enterprises, "are they which we require most gladly: that we may have that betimes, and at one, which we "should have come unto at Cannæ: seeing that all the time we have lived since, hath been destined "to our ignominy and disgrace.

At these words they fell down prostrate at Marcellus his feet. Marcellus answered them, that he had neither power of himself, nor commission otherwise, to content them, and satisfy their request. Howbeit, write to the Senat he would: and according as the LL. should give advice and direction, so he would do and not fail. These letters (as I said before) were brought to the Consuls, and by them read in the Senat-house. And after deliberate consultation about their contents, the Senat passed this decree: That as concerning those souldiers, who had forsaken their fellows fighting before Cannæ, the Senat saw no reason, why they should be put in trust any more with the affairs of the Common-wealth: but if M. Claudius the Proconsul thought it good otherwise, he might do according to that which he judged convenient, and to stand with his own credit, and the safety of the State. Provided always, that not one of them be dispensed with, and freed from service or charge of souldiery: nor rewarded with any military gift in testimony and token of his valour: nor yet reduced home again into Italy, so long as the enemy made abode there.

After this, the Pretor for the City, by vertue of a decree from the Senat, and an act of the Commons, assembled the people together. In which Session were created five Commissioners, called Quinquavirs, for the redifying and repairing of the turrets and the walls: Likewise two other fraternities of Triumvirs, the one for taking an inventory of all sacred things, and to sign and note all offerings and oblations: the other for redifying the Temples of Fortune and dane Matuta, within the gate Carmentis, and likewise of Spes without the gate, which the year past were consumed by fire. Great and fearful tempests hapned this year. On the Alban mount it rained stones continually for two dayes. Many places were blasted and smitten with lightning from Heaven: and namely, two Chappels in the Capitol, and the Rampier about the camp and fort above Suessula in divers places thereof: and two watchmen in their Sentinels stricken stark dead. The wall and certain turrets thereon at Cumes, not only smitten but also shaken down and overthrowen with lightnings and thunder-bolts. At Reate there was seen an huge stone to flie, and drop in the air. The sun also appeared more red than it useth to be, and like to bleed. In regard of these prodigious sights, there was a solemn Procession and supplication all one day:
 and the Consuls for certain dayes together, attended only upon Divine service of the Gods: and the Novendial sacrifices were devoutly celebrated nine dayes together.

Now whereas a long time already both Annibal hoped, and the Romans also suspected that the Tarentines would revolt: there fell out between, an occurrence and outward accident, which hastened it the rather. There was one Phileas a Tarentine, who having abode long at Rome under colour of an Embassador leger, a busy headed man, and of an unquiet spirit, one that of all things could not away with rest and peace, in which so long as he lived he thought every day a year, and that now he was waxen old and aged therein found means to have access unto the honours of the Tarentines. Kept they were in the Close belonging to the Temple of Liberty, with the less attendance and careful eye, because it was expedient and good neither for themselves, nor for their City, to make an escape, and deceive the Romans. These hostages he had oftentimes sollicited and perwaded by much talk and many reasons, and at length having bribed and corrupted two sextons and wardens of the said Temple, he trained them forth in the evening out from the place where they were in safe custody: and when he had accompanied them onward on the way as a guide, and directed them how to pass secretly, he fled himself and they together. By day break the next morning they were missed, and their escape was noised throughout the City: Whereupon, men were sent out after them from all parts, to fetch them in again: who having overtaken them at Tarracina, laid hold of them, and brought them back to Rome: where in the Comitium, they were, by the consent of the people, beaten with rods, and then thrown down headlong from the cliff Tarpeia.

The cruel rigor of this punishment, caused much anger: and provoked two of the noblest and most famous Grecian Cities in Italy to indignation, not only in publick generally, but also in private particularly: according as any man was either in blood joyned, or in alliance and friendship linked to them who were thus foully and shamefully put to death. Amongst whom there were about thirteen noble Gentlemen of Tarentum, conspired together and the chief of them were Nico and Philomenes. These conspirators before they would stir and enter into any action, thought best to speak and confer with Annibal first: and so having gone forth of the City, under a pretence as if they went to the chase a hunting, by night they came unto him. But when they drew neer unto the camp, the rest hid themselves within a wood neer unto the high way: Nico and Philomenes only went forward to the watch, and there being taken (as they requested themselves) were brought before Annibal. Who when they had delivered unto him their complaint and upon what occasions they entered into that designment they were highly commended, and promised great rewards, and willed and charged by him, that to the intent they might bear their country-men in hand, how they ever went out of the City to fetch in some booties, they should drive afore them into the City, certain cattle of the Carthaginians, which were put out to pasture and feeding:

And herewith gave them his word to do it safely, and without any impeachment and resistance whensoever. Thus these yong Gentlemen were seen to bring in good store of cattell: and as they were known to make this adventure the second time and other still, men marvelled the lesse at the matter, and suspected nothing. Now upon a new parling and communication with Annibal, they covenanted with him upon his faithful promise in the letters, Imprimis, for the Tarentines themselves, to enjoy freely their Lands and goods, and live under their own laws. Item, to pay no pension nor tribute unto Annibal, nor be forced to receive a garrison against their wills. And last of all, to betray the garrison souldiers of the Romans, and all their fortresses and places of strength deliver up into the hands of the Carthaginians. When these conditions and capitulations

Were agreed upon, then Philomenes used much other to go forth and come in again in the night:
 and as he was known to be a great hunter, and much delighted in that exercise, he had his hounds following him hard at his heels, and all other furniture about him fit for huntmen: and lightly ever he took some wild beaft or other with his hounds, or eleged something from the enemy, that of purpose lay ready for his hands: and always as he brought home ought with him, he would bestow it either upon the Captain of the Roman garrison, or deal it among the warders of gates. And they all, verily believed and were perwaded, that his going out and in thus, moztly by night, was only for fear of the enemies. Now, when he had used this so accomodably that he had made it an ordinary practice, in so much, that at what time of the night so ever he had but once lured or whittled the gate was straight open for him: then Annibal thought it time, to put the Plot above said in execution. Three dayes journey he was off; Where because he would have men the lesse marvel, why he kept a standing camp so long still in one place he feigned and made himself sick. The Romans also, that lay in garrison at Tarentum gave over to suspect his long abode and lingering there. But after that he was determined and resolved to advance toward Tarentum, he picked out ten thousand foot and horsemen together, whom he supplied for nimble bodies, swift footmanship, and lightness of armor, to be most meet for expedition: and with them at the fourth watch of the night, he marched forward with his engines. And having sent out afore-hand fourscore Numidian light Horses, he commanded them, to ride about and fenc out all the wayes on every side, and to call their eye to elpie and discover all the coasts, that no country people a far off might descry and view the army on foot, but they should be seen: and withal, to bring in, as many as were gone before, and kill all them they met and encountered: to the end that the Peasants therein inhabiting, might think they were Theeves and Robbers, rather than the vanguarders and fore-riders of an army. Himself in person marching with great speed, and celerity pitched his camp almost 15 miles from Tarentum. Neither would he there, be known unto his men of his purpose, nor tell them whither they should go: only he called his souldiers together, and charged them to hold on the direct way, and not suffer any one to turn aside, nor in the march go out of his rank or file: and above all things, to be ready for to receive their charge and commandment from their Captains, and do nothing without their warrant and commission. As for himself, he would when he saw his time, let them know his mind and what the service was that he would have done. And about the same very hour and instant, news came as far as Tarentum that Some few Numidian Horsemen foraged the country, and had put the villagers in great fright all about. At which tidings, the Captain of the Roman garrison was no more moved, nor made any other hit, but only gave order, that some of the Horsemen the next morning by day light should ride forth, to keep the enemy from farther excursions. In the mean time, they that had this charge, bore themselves so carefully in providing themselves to execute that which they were commanded, that contrary-wise, they took those outdoes of the Numidians for a good argument. That Annibal with his army was not dislodged, but abode still in leaguer where he lay first. Annibal when it was once dark and dead night, began to set forward. Philomenes was there ready to be his guide, laden with his game hunted as his manner was. The rest of his conspiracy waited their time to execute their several charges, as it was agreed among them. Now it was ordered between them afore, that Philomenes coming in at the usual little wicket, with his venison that he had hunted, should bring in with him some armed men: and Annibal on another part, come to the gate called Temenis, which looked toward the East, and stood on the Land side of the City, a good way within the wall, as it were in a nook. When Annibal approached the said gate, he made a frein token that he was come (as it was devised between them before) and it flamed forth and gave a shining light. The like did Nico again. Then the fires on both sides were put out, that they made no more blaze. And Annibal in great and still silence, led his army close to the gate. Nico came suddenly at unawares upon the watchmen fast asleep, killed them in their beds, and opened that gate. Annibal entered with his Regiment of footmen and commanded the cavalry to stay behind, to the end they might have liberty of open ground to ride, whithersoever there was need, and as occasion required. Now by this time, Philomenes also was come neer to that little gate on the other side, where he used to make his egrets and ingrets to and fro. And when he had raised the watchman with his voyce to wel known and with his whistle wherewith now he was familiarly acquainted, & said withal, that he was troubled with tugging and lugging of a foul & heavy beaft: therewith the wicket was set open. Two lusty fellows there were carrying in the wild bore between them, and he himself followed with one of the huntsmen, lightly & nimbly appointed, and whilst the watchman his eye was upon the two porters that carried the beaft, wondering at the bigness of the bore, and took no heed to himself, Nico, thrust him through with his spear. Then trud in after them, about thirty men armed, who killed the rest of the watch, and brake down the great gates withal: and immediately there entered the companies with battens displayed: and so, forth from thence they were conducted and brought to the market place, without making any noise, and there joined themselves to Annib. Then Annib. divided two thousand fians into three Regiments, whom he sent into sundry parts of the City: and gave order to the Tarentins and the Africans, to get possession of the most principal and populous places of the City and when the cry and shout was once up, to kill all the Romans wheresoever, and to spare the Townsmen. But to the end that this might be orderly done, he gave direction to the young Gentlemen afore said of Tarentum, that so soon as they elyped a far off, any of their own Citizens and Country-men, they should bid them be quiet and still, to hold their peace, to be of good cheer and fear nothing. By which time, they began to set up a shout and cry, as men use to do in a City taken by assault, but what the matter should be, no man of the Town or Garrison could certainly tell. For the Tarentin inhabitants supposed verily, that the Roman founders of the garrison were risen up to sack the City: the Romans on the other side, thought that the Townsmen mutined, and they were in doubt of some traiterous practise. The Captain himself awakened and raised at the first tumult, escaped to the key, where he took a small Barge or wherry-boat, and fled to the Castle. The Trumpet also that sounded from the Theatre, made the greater terror: for it was both a Roman Trumpet, provided aforehand for the purpose by those Traitors, and a Grecian blew it, one who had no skill: and so it was doubtful, both who he was that sounded, and who they were that he gave signal unto. When day appeared, and the Romans saw the armour of the Carthaginians and Gauls then they will well in what door the wind was, and how the World went: and the Greeks seeing the Romans lying along every where slain, were soon aware that the City was taken by Annib. But after it was broad day light, and that the Romans who remained unkilld, were fled into the Castle, and the noise and hubbub began by little and little to slack and give over: then Annib. commanded the Tarentins to be called to a general assembly, and to present themselves without arms. When they were all come together, but only those who with the Romans were fled for company into the Castle, there to abide in fortune as they; Annib. spake kindly unto the Tarentins, gave them good and friendly words, rehearsed with great protestation what favors he had shewed to all their Citizens, whom he had taken prisoners either at Thrasymenus, or at Cannae and withal, after he had bitterly in eight days against the Lordy and proud rule of the Romans, he commanded every man to repair home to his own house, and let his own name upon his door: for so many houses as had not the name written upon them of the Master thereof, he would presently upon sound of Trumpet, command to be riled. Over and besides, that if any one should hap to write his own name, and let it on the door or lodging-house of a Roman (for he saw divers of their houses empty) he would take him for an enemy, and deal with him accordingly. After this speech ended, and the assembly dissolved, when the doors were marked with their titles and inscriptions afore said, whereby the houses of friends and enemies were known distinctly one from another: the signal was given by sound of Trumpet: and then there was running every where from all parts to ransack the lodgings of the Romans. And some pretty sprinkling of pillage they met withal. The next day after, he advanced against the Castle to assault it, which after he saw impregnable and not possible to be won, either by forcible assault, or by artificial devices of fabricks and engines, by reason that both the Sea came to it, wherewith the greater part thereof was compassed, in manner of a demy Iland, and also fortified besides on another part with exceeding high and steep rocks: and withal, fenced from the City with a strong wall and deep ditch: therefore, because he would neither let nor hinder himself from achieving greater affairs, whiles he was carefully busied only about defending the Tarentins, nor yet leave them without a strong guard, for fear lest the Romans from out of the Castle, might at their pleasure come upon them he determined to raise a rampier for a partition between the Castle and the City, for their defence against the said garrison. And he was not out of hope, but that when the Romans should offer to issue forth to hinder the said work, they might also be fought withal: and in case they adventured rashly to run on, and engage themselves too far, they might be cut off in their heat, & the forces of the garrison might be so diminished & abated by some great slaughter & execution, that the Tarentins of themselves should be able with ease to defend their City against them. The said work was not so soon begun, but the Romans all of a sudden, opened the Castle gate, sallied forth & charged upon the pioneers as they were labouring about their bulwark. The guard that attended for the defence of the workmen, and stood before their work, fell off and suffered themselves to be put back, to the end that the enemies upon their first success, should be more adventurous: supposing that the further they gave ground, the more of the other would follow after and chase them. Which being perceived, the Carthaginians whom Annib. had kept close for this purpose, and had in readines very well appointed, rose out of all parts, and made head again. Neither were the Romans able to abide their terrible violence, and flee they could not in multitudes by occasion that the straightness of the place would give no leave: and besides, many things lay in their way: partly the work that was begun, and partly, other provision of stuffe brought for the same, which mightily hindered and impeached them. Most of them fell headlong into the trench: and to be short, more perished in their flight, than were killed in the fight. After this the fortification were taken and again, and none durst venture to hinder it. So he cut a mighty deep ditch, & raised an high rampier within it. Also behind it, a pretty distance off, he went in hand

A to build a mure or wall to it, in the very same quarters: that they might be able even without any guard at all, or strength of men, to defend themselves against the Romans. Howbeit, he left them an indifferent band of souldiers, which might withal help out somewhat in making of the wall. Himself then departed with the rest of his army as far as the River G. Ilesus (five miles off from the City) and there encamped. From which standing camp, he came back once again to survey the work: and finding that it went better forward than he looked for, he began to conceive some good hope that the citadel also might be won by assault. For why it was not defended surely by intiation on high ground, as others are, but seated on a plain and divided from the City, by a wall only and a ditch. Now when as it began to be assailed with fabricks, and artillery devised of all sorts, there hapned a new supply to be sent from Acherontum to aid the garrison: whereby the Romans took heart unto them, in so much as in the night time of a suddain and before they were looked for, they set upon the fabricks and ordinance of the enemies planted thereupon: some they cast down and overthrew, others they fired and consumed. And there an end of Annib. his assault of the Castle from that side.

The only hope behind now, was in continual siege: and yet that hope promised no great effect, because they that held the Castle, had the Sea free at their command, all that side, whereas the said iote (standing as it were in an hollow) overlooked the mouth of the haven and the City contrary-wise, was wholly secluded from all entrance of passage and commodities coming in by Sea, and likewise were they that besieged the fortrels, to feel the want and scarcity of victuals, than those that were besieged within it. Then Annib. after he had called together the principal citizens of Tarentum, laid open unto them all, the present difficulties, saying: "That he neither saw any way to win by force the Castle so strong and fortified as it was, nor had any hope at all to gain it by hege, so long as the enemies were Lords of the Sea. But if they had ships onely, whereby they might hinder and stay the coming in of their victuals and other commodities, the enemies immediately would either quit the peece, or yield themselves. The Tarentins held well with that, and approved the device. But (say they) he that giveth such counsel, must also afford us means to effect the same. For the Carthaginian ships if they were sent for, and set out of Sicily might well do the feat: may, as for our own which lie shut up as it were within a little creek and bay, considering that the enemy keepeth the mouth and entry of the haven, how is it possible that they should get out from their harbour into the open Sea, and pass without danger? Pass (quoth he) Pass they shall, make no doubt of that. Many things, I tell you, considered in their own nature are cumbersome and difficult, but by policy and wit of man are easily welded and wrought with a sleight. Ye have a City here seated upon a plain and champaign ground, the wayes answering to every side off are even, large and broad enough, yea, and open to all quarters. I will chuse that way which crosteth the midst of the City, and passeth along to the haven and the Sea, and so will carry and transport the ships upon wains, with no great ado and trouble. And so, both the Sea shall be ours clear, which now the enemies keep, and also we shall besiege the Castle round, as well by Sea as by Land: nay, more than that, within short time we shall either enter it, being abandoned of the enemies, or else be masters both of it and them together.

These words not only put them in good hope, that the enterprize would be effected, but also set them in a wonderful good conceit and admiration of the Captain himself. Then out of hand, all the wains and carts were taken up from all places as many as could be had, and were put together, and coupled one to another. Divers cranes and other instruments were set to, for to draw up the ships to Land the way made plain and level, that the carts might go more easily, and pass away with less trouble and more expedition. After this they got together draught oxen, cart jades and other labouring beasts, yea, and men also for to draw: and thus the work was lustily begun, in so much, as within few dayes, the fleet well rigged, appointed, and dressed, was brought about the Castle, and rid at anchor even in the avenue & entry of the haven. In these terms stood Tarentum, when Annib. left it, and returned back to his wintering harbours. But authors write diversly of this revolt of Tarentum, whether it hapned the year past, or at this present. But the greater number of them, and those that lived neerer to that time, when the remembrance of these matters was fresh, affirm that it was this very year.

At Rome, the Consuls and Pretors both remained still, until the * fifth day before the Calends of May, by occasion of the Latin holy dayes, upon which day, when they had performed a solemn sacrifice, with all complements thereto belonging, on the Alban Hill, they departed every one to his severall charge and Province. After this, there crept into the minds of men a new scrupulosity of conscience upon certain propheticall verses of one Martius, a noble and famous Prophet in times past. Now, by reason that in the year before, there was diligent search and inquisition made, for such books of Fortune, according to a decree granted out of the Senat, those verses came to light, and to the hands of M. Emilius Pretor of the City, who sat upon that commission. And he immediately gave them to Sulla the new Pretor. Of two Prophecies of Martius, the one, which afterwards carried the greater authority with it, by reason of the event that hapned to right, and declared it so evidently, caused the other also, whereof the time was not yet come, to be of credit and believed. The former contained a Prediction of the overthrow at Canna, in these or such like words:

From Trojan line, O Romans once descended, Elic Cannæ River, near to Cannæ Town:
Left strangers born, who have by death intended, Force thee to fight on Diomedes his down,
But warning mine, thou wilt not rest upon,
Until with blood thou first do fill the plain:
And then to Sea from fruitful Lands, anon Thy men shall down the stream by thousand slain.
Thy flesh must bait the fish in Ocean deep,
And lure the fowles that sit from high to prey,
And feed wild beasts, on earth below that keep.
Mark well my words, Jove thus me taught to say.

And they who had been souldiers, and served in those wars, knew as perfectly Diomedes his plains, and the River * Cannæ, as they did the very defeat it self, and losse at Cannæ. Then was the other Prophecy likewise read, which was the darker of the twain: not only because those things are more uncertain, than those which are past already; but also by reason of the kind of writing, which was more obscure and intricate, in these terms:

* The Game that Aulisius,

* Apollo is called in Homer Iliad, α, Εκτοβος, i. shooting afar off.

If enemies ye would expel, if both and plague fore Sent from a far, ye would drive forth, and vexed be no more;
To Phœbus (Romans) I advise, ye vow from year to year
To set forth plays in solemn rites, with mirth and merry cheer.
From pulch'rick flock, the people must, part of the charge disburse:
The rich shall ye, for you and yours, defray with private purse.
The sovereign Pretor must procure these games to be performed,
Who sits in place, mens place to bear, and see all wrongs reform'd.
Then shall the ten Decemvirs bright, the Greekish rites observe,
In slaying beasts for sacrifice, and nothing from them swerve.
If all be done accordingly, your joy shall yet increase,
Your State shall duly grow in wealth, and fruits of blessed peace.
For God Apollo will you save, he will your foes destroy,
Who at their pleasure waste your fields, and work you much annoy.

For the explanation and expiation both, of this prophesie, they took one whole day. And the morrow after, there passed a decree from the Senate, That the Decemvirs should peruse and look into the books of Sibylla, about the exhibiting of those said games, in the honour of Apollo, and celebrating likewise of the sacrifices. And when all was perused, and relation made before the Senat: the Lords made an Act, and set down an order: First, to vow and set forth solemn games accordingly, to the honour of Apollo. Item, After the Games were done and finished, to allow the Pretor * twelve thousand Asles, toward the expensies of the divine service, and two greater beasts for sacrifice. There passed also another Act of the Senat, That the Decemvirs should celebrate divine service, and sacrifice after the observance and rites of the Grecians: and offer upon the Altar these beasts, to wit, an Ox with gilded horns, and two white fœmal Goats, with gilded horns likewise; for Dona Apollo: and a Cow with horns, in like manner gilded; for Dona Latona. The Pretor, when he was to represent the Games within the Circus Maximus, gave commandment, and made proclamation, That the people, during the time of those solemnities, should contribute money, for an offering to Apollo, every man according to his ability, and as he might well spare. This is the beginning of the Apollinare Games and Playes, exhibited for to obtain victory, and not for to escape some plague or pestilence, as most men suppose. And when they were celebrated, the people stood to behold and look on, adorned with garlands upon their heads, and the dames and matrons of the City went in procession, and made supplications. Every mans doore was set open, and they feasted and made good cheer generally through the City in the open street; and a high holiday this was, solemnized with all kind of ceremonies that could be devised.

But to return again to Annibal, who was about Tarentum: and both Consuls remaining in Samnium, but ready, as it seemed, to besiege Capua: it fell out, that the Campanians already were distressed with hunger and famine, (a calamity that usually followeth long and continual siege) and so the reason was, because the armies of the Romans had impeached and hindered their seedtime. Therefore they dispatched Embassadors to Annibal, beseeching him, that he would take order for grain to be brought into Capua, from all parts near adjoining, before that the Consuls were come abroad with their legions into their territory, and all the ways beset, and passages stopp'd by the guards and companies of the enemies. Whereupon, Annibal gave direction to Hanno, that he should remove out of the country of the Brutii, and passe over with his forces into Campania, and endeavour to, that the Campanians might be provided of sufficient store of corn. Then

Hanno dislodged anon, and departed with all his power out of the * Brutians countrey, purposing to avoid the leaguer of his enemies, and namely the Consuls, who lay in Samnium: and when he approached near to * Beneventum, he pitched his Tents three miles from the City it self, upon a high ground. After which he commanded, that the corn should be brought to him into his camp, out of all the associat and confederat Cities therabouts, into which it had been carried in the summer afore; and allowed a good guard for the safe convey thereof. After this, he sent a messenger to the Consuls, to give them notice, upon what day they should attend, and be in readiness to receive their corn; and against the time, provide out of the countrey for the carriage, cars, wains, and draught-beasts, and pack-horses of all sorts. But the Campanians, like as they carried themselves in all things else, idly and negligently, so in this they were very thick and reticulous: for they lent little above forty carres, and some few beasts for carriage besides. For which they had a check given them, and were rebuked by Hanno: because that hunger, which catcht the very dumb beast to better it self and make hard shifts, was not able to prick them forward to be more careful about their own business. So there was a farther day appointed for to fetch their corn, and to come more furnished and better provided for carriage. A third being reported to the men of Beneventum, with the circumstances and particulars, as it was, they added with all speed ten Embassadors to the Roman Consuls, encamped then about Beneventum. Upon which intelligence given of the affairs at Capua, they took order, and agreed between themselves, that one of them should conduct an army into Campania. And Æmilius, who undertook that charge, marched by night to Beneventum, and put himself within the walls of the Town. And there he was advertised by them that dwelt neer hand: That Hanno was gone out with part of his forces, for to purvey corn: that there were 2000 cars come, with a rude and disorderly multitude besides of people, without armor: that all that they did was in hurry, in haste, and great fear; and finally, that the camp was out of form and fashion, and all good military order cleane gone; by reason of a rabble & multitude of country clowns come out of those quarters, and entremingled amongst them. The Consul, I say, being enforced for certain by credible persons of the things, gave his souldiers warning to make ready against the next night ensuing, nothing but their engines and weapons, for that they were to charge upon the camp of the Carthaginians. And so they set forward at the relief of the fourth watch, leaving their packs and trusses with all their baggage behind them at Beneventum: and presenting themselves before the camp, somewhat before day, they put them into such a bodily fear, and so terrified them, that if it had been pitched upon a plain ground, no doubt, it had been won at the first assault. But the height of the place, and their rampiers and fortifications besides, which could not possibly be entered upon, without climbing upon the steep hill with much difficulty, were a defence unto it. By day light there was a lusty assault given, and a hot skirmish begun, but the Carthaginians not only defended and kept their rampier, but also (as having the vantage of the ground) they chased and thrust the enemies back, as they mounted up the hill. Howbeit, resolute hardiness overcame all hardness and difficulties whatsoever: For in diverse places at once they advanced as far as the banks and trenches; but it cost bloody blows first, and the death of many a souldier. The Consul therefore calling the Coronels and Marshals together, said, it were not amiss to give over that rash and heady attempt, and as he thought, it were the safer course, for that day to retire the army to Beneventum, and on the morrow to encamp themselves against the enemy, to the end that neither the Campanians might get forth, nor Hanno return and enter into the Town again. And that this might be the sooner effected, and with a great deal more ease, he would lend his Colleague aid with his army, and both of them jointly beat their forces that way. But these devices of the Capitain general were soon dashed. For as he was about to sound the retreat, the souldiers with a loud voice cried out, that they could not away with such faint Capitains: they scorned to be commanded in to cold and slothful service: they would none of that: and so put the Consul out of his bent. It hapned, that next unto the gate entering into the enemies camp, there served a cohort or company of the Peligni, led by Captain Plinius, who caught the banner out of the bearer his hand, and slung it over the rampier, and with that self cutting himself and his company both, wishing a plague light upon him and them too, if the enemies went away with that banner: and therewith led himself the way, and brake first through the trench, and over the paliado into their camp. Now by this time the Peligni fought within the rampier: and then Valerius Flaccus a Colonel of the third legion, from another side fell to upbraid the Romans, and lie them in the teeth with their beastly cowardice, for suffering their allies to have the honor of entering and taking the camp. Whereupon T. Pedanius (a centurion of the Regiment called Principes, and serving in the first place thereof) took likewise an ensign from him that carried it, and withal, Now shall, quoth he, this ensign, and this Centurion (meaning himself) presently be within the rampier of the enemies: let me see who dare follow, and save it from being taken by the enemy. At first, his own band and company followed him hard at heels, as he clambered to get over the rampier, and then the whole legion came after likewise. By this time, the Consul also seeing his souldiers climbing over the rampier, changed his purpose, and was of a clean other mind: and from calling and reclaiming his souldiers back, fell to exhort and encourage them, shewing in how great hazard and danger a right hardy and valiant cohort of allies were, and the whole Legion of Citizens besides. They all therefore set to, and every man did his best: and notwithstanding there was many a dart driven and javelin lanced, notwithstanding the enemies opposed posed their armor and bodies full against them yet they never stinted to assay every place, as well high as low, until they were broken through, and gotten in. Many a man was hurt (ye may be sure) but yet even they that bled until they fainted, and were not able to fight any longer, carried this mind and threw withal, to die yet within the rampier of their enemies. Thus in the turning of an hand the camp was won, as easily as if it had been pitched upon a plain and even ground, and not fortified at all with trench and rampier. From this time now, there was no more fighting, but killing on all hands in that tumult and confusion of pell mell within the camp. slain there were of enemies more than six thousand, and above seven thousand taken prisoners, together with the Campan paviors for corn, and all the provision of wains, carts, and labouring beasts. Besides another huge booty was taken, which Hasdrubal when he went a foraging all abroad, had raised out of the country of the associates of the people of Rome. Then the Consul after he had cast down all the fortifications of the camp, returned from thence to Beneventum. And there both the Consuls together (for Sp. Claudius also thither came after a few days) made sale of all the prizes and pillage, and divided the same. Vibius the Pelignian, and T. Pedanius a principal centurion of the third legion, by whose forward and singular good service, the camp of the enemies was forced, were rewarded especially above the rest. Hanno then together with some few forerogers whom by chance he had with him returned from Cominium Ceritum (whither the news came of the loss of the camp) into the Bruttians country, more like one that fled in rout, than marched in warlike order.

The Campans also having heard, as well of their own losses as of their allies, sent Embassadors unto Annibal, to certify him; "That both the Consuls were at Beneventum, that the war was within a dayes journey of Capua, and but a step from the very gates and walls of the City: and unless he made good halt to succour and rescue them, Capua would looner come under the obedience and subjection of the enemies than Arpi did. And he was not to make such a reckoning of all Tarentum (much less then of the Castle alone) as in regard thereof to leave Capua undefended, and yield it to the people of Rome, Capua I say, which he was wont to compare and make equal with the City of Rome. Annibal promised that he would take care for the good estate of the Campans: and for the present he sent two thousand Horsemen with the Embassadors, as a guard to keep the country and territory from invasion and spoil.

The Romans in this mean time, among other their affairs, neglected not the safety of the Castle of Tarentum, and the garrison there besieged. For C. Scordilius, Lieutenant, by order and authority of the Senat, was sent by P. Cornelius the Pretor into Hieronia, to purvey for corn, and to buy store: who with certain ships laden therewith, arrived in the haven of Tarentum passing even through the guards of the enemies. At whose coming, they that before whiles they had but small hope, were oftentimes by way of partly moved by the enemies to go to the contrary side, now themselves began to periurade and solicit the enemy to come unto them. And the garrison freely was strong enough, considering that the souldiers which lay at Metapontum, were drawn from thence to the defence and keeping of the Castle of Tarentum. And therefore the Metapontines so soon as they were delivered of the fear, whereby they were kept and held in as with a bit, revolted unto Annibal. Semblably did the Thurins also, who inhabited the same tract by the Sea side. They were moved and periuraded thereto, not so much by the rebellion of the Tarentines and Metapontines, with whom they were linked in kindred, and joynd neer in blood (over and besides that they were defended as well as they out of Achaia) as by anger toward the Romans for the hostages lately by them killed. Their friends therefore and kinsfolk dispatched letters and messengers unto Hanno and Mago (who were in the country of the Bruttii neer at hand) offering to deliver the City into their hands if they brought their power and presented it before their walls. Now was there one M. Atinius, Captain there over a small garrison, whom they supposed might be easily drawn forth of the Town to make some rash and inconsiderate skirmish, presuming not so much upon his own souldiers (who were but an handful) as upon the youth and force of the Thurians, whom he had of purpose enrolled into bands and companies, and furnished with armor against the like occasions of service. The Carthaginian Captains afore named, had divided all their forces between them in two parts, and were entered into the territory of Thuri: and Hanno with his Regiment of footmen, advanced with banners displayed before the City: Mago with the Horsemen, laid behind close among the Hills, over-against the Town, and there lay secretly in ambush. Atinius then, who by his epitals was enforced only of the squadrons of footmen, came forth with his forces into the field, ignorant (God wot) both of the falsehood and treason of the Townsmen, and also of the covert trains and ambushment of the enemies. The skirmish of footmen was exceeding faint and cold, whiles the Romans being but few, fought in the vanguard: and the Thurins looked rather when the skirmish should end, than made any halt to fight themselves and help: and withal, the squadrons of the Carthaginians gave ground for the nonce, to train the enemy as far as the side of the Hill, under which, on the other side the Horsemen lay in wait and were ambushed. And thither they were not so soon come, but the Horsemen made haste to shew themselves, with a great outcry, and presently put to flight the raw and disordered company and multitude of the Thurins: who were not very fast and found in heart to them on whose side they fought. The Romans albeit they were environed round, whiles the footmen lay still at them on the one side, and the Horsemen charged them a-fresh on the other side, yet they maintained fight, and held out a long while: but at last, they likewise turned their back

A back and fled to the City. There the traitors and conspirators being gathered together on heaps, so soon as they had let in at the gates (standing wide open, the companies of their own citizens: when they lay on the Romans running apace in diarray toward the City, made a tall alarm, crying aloud that the Carthaginians were at hand, and that both enemies and friends together intermingled, would enter the City, unless they made better halt to shut the gates. So they excluded the Romans out, and gave them as a prey to be hewn in peeces by their enemies. Howbeit, Atinius with some few, was received within the Town first. After this, there was some mutiny and dissension between the citizens themselves, for a little while. Some were of mind to stand upon their guard and defend the Town: others were of opinion, to yield unto fortune of the time, and deliver it up to the victors hands. But in conclusion, fortune and bad counsel together, (as for the most part it falleth out) prevailed. And so, after they had brought Atinius and his souldiers to the haven side, unto their ships for to be embarked, more upon good will that they bare to him for his mild and just government, and therefore were ready to leave him, than for any regard at all they had of the Romans, they received the Carthaginians into the City.

The Consuls then led the legions from Beneventum into the territory of Capua not only to make spoil and marre the corn, that was laid up already in trespers Towns against winter, but also to assail Capua: supposing they should make their Consilship renowned unto posterity, by the destruction of so rich and wealthy a City: and besides, do away that great dishonour and shameful blemish of the Empire of Rome, in suffering a City so neer unto them to continue now three years in rebellion, without revenge and condign punishment. But to the end that Beneventum should not be without a guard, and that against all inordinant accidents and occurrences of war, in case Annibal should come to Capua, for to rescue and aid his allies, (which they made no doubt but he would do) there might be Horsemen to withstand his violence: they commanded T. Gracchus to come out of Lucania, with the cavalry and light armed footmen: and to take order and leave some other to govern the legions and the standing camp, for the guard and defence of those parts there.

Gracchus before he dislodged out of the Lucans country, hapned to have a fearful and prodigious token, as he offered sacrifice. For after the sacrifice was performed and accomplished, two Snakes came gliding out of a blind hole, no man knew how, to the entrails of the beast, and fell to eat the Liver: and so soon as they were espied, suddenly hid out of sight and were no more seen. Now, when as the bowl-priyers had given advice to kill a new sacrifice, and so soon as the inward were opened and laid forth, to tend and look unto them more heedfully, the Snakes came again, as it is reported, the second and third time: and when they had once given as it were an assay, and tasted the Liver, they went clear away without hurt and untouched. And albeit the Soothsayers aforesaid, had given an Item, and foretold, that this prodigious sight pertained properly unto the chief Captain and General, and warned him to take heed of some close persons and secret practices: yet his fatal destiny of death that hung over his head, could by no foresight and providence be altered and avoided. Now there was one Flavius a Lucane, the principal head of that bend and side of the Lucans, which when the other faction revolted unto Annibal, took the Romans part: and having been by them chosen the Pretor, had continued in that place of Magistracy a year already: this man all on a sudden changed his mind and affection, and seeking to wind and enter into the favour of Annibal, could not be content to revolt himself, and to draw with him the Lucans to rebellion: unless he made a league also and covenant with the enemies, and sealed it with the murder and blood of his General: of him (I say) who being entertained and lodged in his house, he purposed villanously to betray. He entered therefore into secret speech and conference with Mago, Governor over the Bruttii, and having capitulated with him, under his faithful word and promise. That if he delivered the Roman General into his hands: the Lucans might live in freedom under their own Laws, in league and amity with the Carthaginians: he told him of a place into which he would bring Gracchus, with a small company and guard about him: willing Mago to put his foot and horse in arms, and in such a place aforehand where he might bestow closely and secretly a mighty number of men. When the place was well viewed and considered all about, they agreed upon a day, for putting this plot in practice. This done, Flavius cometh to the Roman General Gracchus, and enformeth him that he had begun an enterprise of great consequence: for the accomplishment and full perfecting whereof, he needed the helping hand of Gracchus himself: "Namely, he had periuraded with all the Pretors and Governors, who in that universal and general trouble of all Italy, had revolted unto Annibal, for to return again into the league and friendship of the Romans: seeing that the Roman state and their Dominion, which by the overthrow at Canus was come in a manner to the lowest ebb, and fallen into extremest despair, flowed now again, and grew every day more than other, greater and mightier: whereas contrary-wile, the puissance of Annibal decayed much, and was well-neer come to nothing: besides, the Romans were men that might be appeased and reconciled again, especially the trespasss being so long ago done and past: for never was there nation under the sun, more tractable, more exorable and ready to pardon a fault: and how often have they (to go no further for examples) forgiven the open Rebellion even of their fore-fathers and ancestors? These (quoth he) were my words unto them, and indeed, but my words. Mary they had rather hear Gracchus himself speak, and hear the same from out of his own mouth: "they

"they would more gladly talk with him in person, and take hold of his right hand, which as they assured pawn of his faithful promise, he carried alwayes with him wheresoever he goeth, and they desire no more, I have therefore (saith he) appointed a convenient place of interview and conference: lying out of the way and forth of sight, yet not far from the Romans camp. There the matter may be dispatched in few words, and all the name and notion of the Lucans, reduced under the obedience and alliance of the people of Rome. Gracchus suspecting no fraud nor harm, neither in his words nor deeds, founding all to a great likelihood of simplicity and truth in his conceit, departed out of the camp attended upon with his Sergeants, and guarded only with a cornet of Horsemen: and so by the guidance of his own host, in whose house he lodged, was plunged headlong within the danger of the ambush of his enemies: Who suddenly arose; and Flavius because he would put it out of doubt that he was a traitor, went to their side and joyned with them. Then they let lie arrows, and shot darts against Gracchus and his Horsemen on every side. Whereupon Gracchus alight from horseback, and commanded the rest to do the same, exhorting them, that the only thing which fortune now had left unto them, they would grace and honour with vertue. For what remaineth else for us? (a small handful unto them) environed as we are with a multitude of them, within a valley compassed about with hills and woods, but present death? This only we are to relye upon. Whether in this present amazement and heartlesse fear, we will as beasts suffer our throats to be cut without revenge again; or turning wholly our timorous expectation and suffering of death, into choler and courage, fight adventurously and manfully, and bathing our hands in the blood of our enemies, lose our lives, and fall down dead, upon the weapons and bodies of them, lying gasping themselves under us. Ah! that Lucan, that fugitive rogue and rebel, that treacherous and false traitor, see ye all lay him. Which hap it will be, ere he die, to be his Priest, to sacrifice and send him to the Devil, he shall win an honourable prize, and find no small solace and comfort in his own death.

With these words, he wrapped his rich coat of arms about his left arme. (for they had not brought forth with them so much as their shields) and charged with exceeding force upon the enemies. The fight was far greater on their part than for the proportion and number of the men. The bodies of the Romans lay open most unto the flur, And thus overcharged on all sides by the higher places: as being in the valley subject to the volley of their darts, they were soon pierced through. When Gracchus was left naked alone, and his guard dead at his feet, the Carthaginians did what they could to take him alive: but he having eluded among the enemies his good host and friend, that Lucan, ran among the thickest place: where he was to fully bent to mischief him, that they could not will nor choose but kill him outright, without they would have lost the lives of many other. He was not so soon dead, but Mago sent him straight wayes unto Annibal, and commanded that his body together with the knitches of rods (belonging to his Magistracy) should be presented and shewed before the Tribunal seat of the General. And this is the true report of the end of Gracchus: to wit, that he let his life in the Lucan Land, about the plains which are called Vetereis campi. There be some that tell it otherwise, how he being accompanied with his Sergeants, and three serving men his bondslaves, went out from the camp within the territory of Beneventum, near unto the River * Calore, for to wash himself: where there chanced his enemies to lurk, and lye in wait among the willows and salows that grew by the bank sides, and so being unarmed and naked too, he was assaulted, where he defended himself as well as he could, with flinging at them pile bones such as the River afforded and carried down with the stream, and so was slain. Others write that by advice of the Bowel-priests, he went out of the camp half a mile off, for to purge and expiate in some pure and clean place, whose prodigious tokens afore rehearsed: and there was beset and environed round about with two troops of Numidian Horsemen, who happened there to lie in ambush. See how variable and uncertain the same goeth, both in what place, and after what manner, this so noble and famous person came by his death. Nay, the very funeral and sepulture also of Gracchus, is diversely delivered. Some say he was entered by his own soldiers within the Roman camp. Others give out and say (and that is the more common report) that by the appointment of Annibal he was buried in the very entrance of the Carthaginian leaguer; that there was a funeral fire made in solemn wise to burn his corpse: that the whole army justed and ran at tilt and torment in their compleat armor: that the Spaniards leaped and danced Morrice: and each nation according to their guise and manner performed sundry motions and exercises as well of their weapons, as of their bodies: yea, and that Annibal himself in proper person, with all honor of funeral pomp that might be devised, both in word and deed, solemnized the obsequies in the best manner. This say they that affirm the thing to have hapned in the Lucans country. But if a man should believe them, who record how he was slain at the River Calore, then the enemies cast nothing of him but only his head. Which being presented unto Annibal, he sent Carthalo immediately with it into the Roman camp, unto Cn. Cornelius the Treasurer or Quæstor: who there within the very camp performed the funerals of the General, and both army and citizens of Beneventum together solemnized the same right honourably.

The Consuls being entered into the territory of Campania, as they foraged all abroad, dragging one from another, were by the Townsmen of Capua which fell out, and by the Horsemen of Mago, put in fear; whereupon in great fright and hast, they rallied the soldiers: to their colours, that that were ranged over the Country: but before they could well embattle them, and set them in array, they were discomfited, and lost above a thousand and five hundred men. Upon which good success, the enemies (as they are a nation by nature proud) began to be very ugly and exceeding audacious, insomuch, as they offered to skirmish sundry times with the Romans, and ever challenged them to fight. But that one battail, so unadvisedly and inconsiderately achieved, made the Consuls more circumspect and wary afterward. Howbeit, one small occurrence hapned, which, as it encouraged and animated them again, so it abated the hearts, and daunted the boldness of the other. For in war there is nothing (be it never so little) but one time or other, it is the occasion of some great consequence and importance. There was in the camp one T. Quintus Crispinus, linked in special friendship and familiarity with Badius, a Citizen of Capua. Their acquaintance grew and increased upon this occasion: This Badius upon a time, before the revolt of Capua, fell sick at Rome, and lying in Crispinus's house, was liberally and kindly used, yea, and tenderly seen unto by him, during his sickness. This Badius having put himself forward before the standing guards, that watched at the gate of the Roman camp, willed, that Crispinus should be called out unto him. Which being told unto Crispinus, he lapped no otherwise of it, but that he should talk friendly and familiarly with him. For albeit both nations generally were in enmity, in regard of the publick State, yet the private right and band of hospitality, remained still in force, and was not forgotten, and therefore he went out somewhat apart from the rest of his fellows. Now, when they were come in sight and interview one of the other, I challenge thee, O Crispine (quoth Badius) to combat: let us mount on Horseback, and trye it out between us two, without any other companion, whether of us is the better man at arms. To this Crispinus made answer again and said, We want no enemies, neither you nor I, upon whom we may make proof of our manhood: as for me, if I met and encountered you in the very battail, yet I would decline, avoid, and shift from you, lest I should defile and stain my hand in the murder and bloodshed of my guest and friend. And with this he turned from him and went his way. But the Campanian contrary-wise, upon these words, was the more eager with him, railing and railing at him for his effeminate cowardice and dastardiness, letting lie at the harmless and innocent man, all spitefull terms and reproachfull language: which himself I wot (if he had his due) was well worthy of: calling him a friendly foe, and a kind enemy indeed, and finally charged him, that he made his excuse of sparing him, for friendship sake, whom he knew he was not able to match in manhood and valour. But it (quoth he) thou thinkest, that by the breach of publick league and covenant, our private bands of amity and hospitality, are not yet enough broken in sunder, then here I pronounce openly, in the hearing of two armies, that I Badius a Campanian, renounce all hospitality with thee T. Quintus Crispinus a Roman, and so farewell all friendship for ever: I will, I say, have no more to do by way of acquaintance with thee, no society, no alliance, no hospitality will the guest have with that host, who in hostile manner is come to invade his native country, and to make assault upon the publick buildings and private houses thereof. And therefore, if thou be a man, meet me in the field. Crispinus drew back a long time, and was loath to enter into the action, but at last his fellow Horsemen, serving in the same troop and cornet with him, forced and perswaded him, not to suffer that bragging Campanian, thus to insult over him without revenge. Whereupon he made no more ado, nor any longer delay, but whiles he went unto the L. Generals to know their pleasure, whether they would permit and license him, out of his order and rank, to fight with an enemy that challenged him, and gave him defiance. And having obtained leave, he buckled his armor about him, took his weapon, mounted on Horseback, and calling upon Badius by name, bad him come forth if he durst to fight. The Campanian made no stay, and so with spear in rest, set upon him, and ran their Horses till carrier one at the other. Crispinus with his lance pierced Badius above his shield, through the left shoulder, and therewith unhorsed him, and when he was fallen to the earth with the push, he alight himself from his horse, minding on foot to fall upon him as he lay along, and so to dispatch him outright. But Badius, before his enemy leaped upon him, left his target behind and his horse, and by good footmanship recovered his own fellows. Crispinus then all goodly to be seen with the spoils of his enemy, made shew of the horse and armor that he had won, and bearing up withal the bloody point of his lance, was with much praise and great gratulation of the fondlers, brought honourably to the Consuls, and presented before them. At whose hands he was both highly commended, and also liberally rewarded.

Annibal having dislodged out of the territory of Beneventum, and removed into Capua, within three dayes after he was come thither, brought forth his forces into the field, making no doubt at all, but that, considering the Campanians in his absence, had but few dayes before fought fortuously, the Romans now would be so much lesse able to abide his royal army so often used to victory. And verily when the conflict was once begun, the Roman battalions of the Infantry were much troubled and distressed, especially with the fierce assault of the Horsemen, who overcharged and pelted them mightily with their darts and javelins, until the signal was given to their own Cavalry also, to set hard to, and charge the enemies with their horse. Now whiles the men of arms were busy in fight on both sides, it hapned that the Regiment of Sempronius [Gracchus lately slain] were delisted marching a far off under the conduct of Cn. Cornelius the Treasurer, which put both parts in like fear, lest they were some new and fresh enemies that advanced against them. So they sounded the retreat on either side, as if they had been agreed to

to do, departed out of the field (as a man would say) on even hand, and retired themselves unto their several holds: howbeit, the greater number was slain of Romans, upon the first violent charge given by the Horleimen. From thence, the Consuls intending to draw Annibal away from Capua, departed sundry ways. Fulvius into the territory of Cumes, and Claudius into the Lucans Country. The next day, when Annibal was advertised, that the Romans had abandoned their camp, and that they were gone into divers parts with their several armies, being at first uncertain whom to pursue, relieved at length to make after Appius, and so began to do. But after he had once trained the enemy about to the place that he desired, he returned himself another way to Capua. And Annibal hapned also upon a new occasion presented to have a good hand of his enemies in those parts.

There was one M. Centenius, surnamed Penula, one of the chief Centurions of the Pilani, a singular good Captain in that kind, as well in regard of his mighty and goodly body, as also of his bravemind, and valiant courage. This man having served out his ordinary time required by Law, was by the means of P. Cornelius Sulla the Pretor, brought into the Senat-house, and became a Petitioner unto the LL. of the Concel, that he might have the leading of five thousand footmen: promising that within short time, by reason he was so well acquainted with the nature and qualities of the enemy, and withal so much beaten in coasting those quarters, he would do some great deed, and atchieve a piece of notable service: and look by what cunning devices and stratagems, both our leaders and our armies had been until that day, entrapped and over-raught, the very same would he use and practise against the enemy. He was not so vain and unadvised in making this offer, but they were as foolish and foolish again in taking him at his word, and trusting him: as who would say, A good Leader and Commander, and a stout and hardy souldier were all one. And so where as he demanded but five thousand, he had the charge given of eight thousand: whereof the one half were citizens, the other allies and confederates: and besides them, he himself also gathered together out of the country as he marched, a good Company of Voluntaries: in so much as his power was doubled, by that time he came into the Lucans Country, where Annibal abode, might that he had followed Claudius in vain, and to no effect. But a man that had but half an eye, might see what the sequel and event would be of the conflict between General Annibal, and Centenius Centenius: between both armies also, the one of old beaten souldiers used ever to victories, the other of raw novices and young beginners, yea, many of them taken up suddenly in haste, and slenderly armed by the halves. For so soon as both hosts had confronted one another, and that on neither side they dallied and shifted off, but minded presently to go to it, sight soon were they on both parts arranged in order of battail. And albeit the Romans had many disadvantages, yet they maintained skirmish more than two hours: and that so hotly and courageously, that they thrunk not one jot, so long as their leader stood on foot. But after that he once was stricken down and slain, who not only in regard and remembrance of the former name (that he had won) of valour and prowess: but also for fear of future shame and dishonor, in case he should remain alive after the defeat of his forces, whereof he was the only cause through his fool-hardy rashness, presented himself desperately upon the pikes of his enemies, where he might be sure of nothing but present death: and incontinently the Roman battail was difcomfited and put to flight. And so hard beset they were, in seeking ways and means to escape (all the avenues were so laid and beset with the Horleimen) that of a great multitude, there were hardly one thousand saved, all the rest miscarried here and there, and came by their death one way or other.

In this mean time, Capua was sorely beleaguered by the Consuls, and they began to assault in most forcible manner: great preparation there was of all things needful unto such an exploit, and with great diligence every thing provided and brought accordingly. Corn was conveyed to Castellum, and laid up there for store: at the mouth of the River Fulturnus (where now the City standeth) was the force and castle fortified (which Fabius before had built) and a strong garrison therein planted, to the end that both the Sea so near, and the whole River also might be at their command. Into those two fortresses standing on the Sea side, as well the corn which lately was sent out of Sardinia, as also that which Matius the Pretor had bought out of Hebrum, was transported from the Port of Clusia, whereby the army might be served plentifully all winter season. Or, and besides that lose received in the Lucans country, the army likewise of the Voluntaries, voluntary souldiers (which during the life of Craffus, had served truly and faithfully) now abandoned their colours: as if by the death of their Captain they had taken themselves fully discharged from warfare.

Annibal made no small account of Capua: for willing enough he was, that his allies and friends there should not be forsaken and left in so great peril wherein they stood; and yet upon that fortunate success which hapned unto him through the rashness of one Roman Captain, his fingers itched to be doing with another of them, and hoped to find some good opportunity and advantage to surprise and overthrow both Captain and army. Whereas therefore certain Apulian Embassadors advertised him, that Cn. Fulvius the Pretor, (who at the first in assaulting certain Cities in Apulia, which had revolted unto Annibal, bare himself like a wife and prudent Captain: now afterwards, upon his good fortune and happy speed in those affairs, whereby himself and his souldiers had made up their mouths and filled their hands well with booties and pillage) both himself and his men were grown so idle and so dissolute, that no good government nor military discipline remained among them: hereupon Annibal having good experience, (as often heretofore, so in this late instance but few days past) in how ill stead an army lieth, when it is directed by an unskillful Leader removed his horces into Apulia. Now lay the Roman legions and Fulvius the Pretor, encamped about Herdonia. And when the news came thither that the enemies were on their journey coming toward them, hardly might the souldiers be restrained and stayed, but they would in all haste pack up standards, and ensigns, and straight ways go into the field and bid them battail, without commission and commandment of their Pretor. And no one thing more held them back, than the assured hope they had, to do it at their pleasure whenever they would. Annibal the night following, having certain intelligence, that there was a tumult in the camp, and that most of the souldiers mightily importuned their General to put forth unto them the signal of battail, and called earnestly unto him for to lead them out into the field, made full account to meet with good opportunity and occasion, to have a fair day of his enemies: and therefore he bestowed three thousand men mightily appointed, in divers villages thereabout, among the thick groves and bushes, and within the woods: who at a sign given to them, should all at once upon a sudden, start up and leap forth of their lurking corners: and withal, he gave order to Mages, with two thousand Horleimen or thereabout to keep all the ways whereas he supposed they were most like to flee and make escape. Having thus ordered all things beforehand in the night time: at the break of day he entered the field with his army, and embattailed himself in warlike manner. Fulvius for his part, was not behind: nor induced so much upon any hope or conceit he had of good speed as drawn and halted thereto through the rash enforcement and compulsion of his souldiers. And therefore as they came forth to battail upon a head and heat, inconsiderately they were set in array as disorderly: even at the pleasure of the souldiers, according as they came forth and took up their ranks and files, as they list themselves: and then again as the toy took them in the head left the same, either upon wilfulness or fear. The first legion together with the left wing or corner of Horleimen were hit withal: and the quadrals drawn and stretched out in a great length: notwithstanding all the Knight Marshals and Coronels cried out: that within, there was no strength nor power at all: and that the enemies wherever they should hap to charge, would break in upon them and go through. But now who, whose counsel for their own good might be taken and considered upon: nay they would not so much as lend their ear, and give them the hearing. And by this time Annibal was in place, with another manner of army (you may be sure) and otherwise ordered and arranged. And therefore the Romans were not able to abide so much as the first shout and shock of the onset. The Captain himself (as foolish and heady as Centenius, but in courage and resolution far above him) seeing how the world went the field like to be lost, his souldiers in fear and great perplexity: recovered his horse in great haste, and with some two hundred horleimen fled away and escaped: all the army besides beaten back affrighted, beset behind flanked on the sides, and environed round, were so killed and hewn in pieces, that of eighteen thousand, there were not past two thousand saved. And the enemies besides were masters of the camp.

When these losses one in the neck of another were reported at Rome, the City was set in a great fit of sorrow and fear for the while: but so long as the Consuls, in whom rested the main chance, had hitherto prospered and sped well, they were the less troubled at these by-blows and crosses misfortunes. Whereupon they addressed C. Laetorius and M. Matius as messengers unto the Consuls, willing them to gather together with good care and diligence, those dispersed reliques and reminders of the two armies: also to have an eye and heedful regard unto them that upon fear and desperation they yielded not themselves to the enemy (as it hapned after the Cannian overthrow): and last of all, to make diligent search and seek out those Voluntaries, or voluntary souldiers, that had abandoned their ensigns and called themselves. The like charge was laid upon P. Cornelius, who had commission besides to levy more men. And he made proclamation throughout all market Towns, lairs and places of frequent resort, That those Voluntaries should be found out and brought again to their own colours, to serve as aforesaid. All these directions were executed and accomplished with exceeding great care and diligence.

Appius Clivus the Consul, after he had made D. Junius Captain of the scone erected upon the mouth of the River Fulturnus, and M. Aurelius Cotta Governour of Puteoli, with commission, that as any ships [with corn] from out of Hebrum or Sardinia arrived there, they should immediately send the corn to the camp: went back himself to Capua: where he found Q. Fabius his Colleague, transporting thither all provision from Castellum, and making preparation for the assault of Capua. Then both Consuls, jointly together besegged the City: and sent unto Claudius Nero the Pretor, for to come unto them from Suesula out of the old camp of Claudius. Who likewise leaving a small garrison there to defend the peace, with all his power and forces, descended into the plains before Capua. So there were three royal pavilions pitched for three LL. Generals about Capua: and three full armies in three sundry places began to fortifie: erecting bastions and forts in places not far distant: yea, and to cast a trench and raise a rampier round about the City. And in divers quarters at once, they skirmished with the men of Capua: whenever they came to hinder their fortifications, with so good success, that the Townsmen were driven at last to keep within their gates and walls. But before that those rampiers and trenches above said were fully finished and all ends brought together, there were Embassadors dispatched unto Annibal, to complain in the name of the Capuans, as finding themselves grieved, that he had forsaken Capua, and in a manner delivered it into the Romans hands: and withal, to beleeve him earnestly, that now or never, he would rescue and succor them, being not only besieged, but also shut up and almost trench'd about, as within a prison. P. Cornelius likewise the Pretor of the City of Rome, sent his letters unto the Consuls, advising them before they had fully inveiled Capua round about, to make offer unto the Capuans of this liberty. That as many as would, might depart with bag and baggage out of Capua: and whoe'er went forth before the day, that day, either departed or tarried there still behind, should be reckoned no better than very enemies. These intimations were made known unto the Campains, but so light they set by them, that they fell a railing, reviling, and menacing the Romans, with most reproachful taunts and spitefull terms. Annilus was departed from Herdonia with his legions unto Tarentum, hoping either by force or fraud to gain the Castle. And seeing he little prevailed, he turned from thence and took his way to Brundisium, supposing that Town would be betrayed into his hands. Whiles he lay there also and lost his time in doing nothing, the Embassadors of the Campains arrived and came unto him, with complaints and humble requests both at once. Unto whom Annilus made this glorious and lordlike answer with a Majesty: Once already have I raised the siege, and never will the Consuls, I throw, abide my second coming. The Embassadors having received their dispatch, departed with this hope: but much ado they had, to put themselves within Capua, so enclosed round was it (by this time) with a double trench and a rampier.

It furnished at the very same instant, when Capua was thus treightely beleagu'd, that the siege also and Assault of Syracuse came to an end: helped forward and hastned by intestine treachery and treason withal, as well as by force of army and valour of Captain abroad. For Marcellus in the beginning of the spring, doubtful in himself and hanging in suspense, whether to bend his whole forces toward Agriuntum, against Himilco and Hippocrates, or still proceed to besiege Syracuse: albeit he saw the City might not possibly be won either by forcible assault, (considering it was by situation both by Sea and Land invincible) or pining famine, by reason the passage in manner lay open to and fro between it and Carthage, for safe transporting of all sort of victuals: yet because he would have no stone unrolled, but try all ways that could be devised: he commanded certain revolts from the Syracusians (for there sided with the Romans some of the noblest persons of the City, who at the time of the first backsliding from the Romans, because they misliked and aborted all rebellion and change in the state, were driven out and banished the City) to deal with their bend and faction by way of conference, to found the hearts (I say) of such as were their followers, and to solicit them to their part: and withal to assure them (upon their warrant) that if by their means Syracuse were betrayed, they should live in freedom, and enjoy their own Laws as they would themselves. But no opportunity could they elope for to partly talk with them. For by reason that there were many suspected to encline and draw that way, every man had a careful eye and regard unto them, that there could be no treachery practised, but soon it would be found out and detected. Yet a bond-servant toward one of the banished persons above said, hapned to be let into the City, pretending that he was run away from the adverse part unto them: who hapning to meet with some few, began to move and broach such a matter. After which certain others lying close hidden under the nets in a fisher boat, came about by water to the camp of the Romans, and had conference and communication with those former fugitives and exiled men. And thus from time to time, this was practised in the same manner, by divers and sundry persons, until at length they were a crew of four score in all. Now when all things were concluded for the betraying of the City, next upon the point of execution, it chanced that one istatus (a false brother among them, who took snuff that he was not especially trusted in the matter) disclosed the conspiracy unto Epicles, and appeached the parties: whereupon they were all put to extrem torture, and suffered death every one. When this plot would speed no better, they conceived hope another way by a new occasion and occurrence that presently offered it self. There chanced one Damasippus a Lacedemonian, sent from Syracuse, as a messenger to King Philip for to be taken prisoner by the Roman armada. Now both Epicles was very desirous and exceeding careful how to ransom him, and also Marcellus was not unwilling for his part to grant the same. For even then, the Romans began to affect the friendship of the Aetolians, with which Nation the Lacedemonians were confederate, and in league. So, when there should be commissioners and delegates sent on both sides to parley and treat about his redemption, the most indifferent place for them to meet in, was at the key or wharf of Trogilus, fast by a turret which they call Galegrus, as being just in the midst between, and most convenient for both parties. It hapned now, that as they had recourse oftentimes thither about this business, one of the Romans well viewed the wall near by, he counted the stones that appeared in the forefront of the wall, and made estimate to himself of their quadrature and proportion: and withal, giving a guess as near as he could of what height (by his reckoning) and measure, the wall might be: and supposing it was a good deal lower than either he himself or others had always before taken it to be, and easily to be scaled with ladders, even of a mean size and middle sort, he related the matter, and his conceit of it to Marcellus. And in his opinion it was a thing not to be neglected, but to be thought upon. But forasmuch as there was no access unto that place by reason, that for the lowliness thereof it was the more carefully guarded and defended, it was thought good to wait for some opportunity and advantage to help that difficulty. Which, as good hap was, offered it self presently unto them by means

A means of a fugitive: who gave them intelligence, that they held a solemn feast of Diana at that time within the City, and the same continued three days together: also he said, that for want of other things, during this siege to make good cheer withal, they spared for no wine, but made merry therewith in great plenty and abundance. For why? not only Epicles had bountifully bestowed wine upon the whole Commons, but also the great men of the City had in every ward and parish where they dwelt, allowed a proportion besides, of their own charges. When Marcellus heard this, he called unto him some few of his Colonels and knight Marshals, and conferred with them: and when they had sorted out certain choice and elect Centurions and soldiers, fit and sufficient men to adventure and execute so great a piece of service, and withal provided ladders secretly: to all the rest he commanded a watchword and warning to be given. That they should betimes take their refection of meat and repose of sleep, for that in the night they were to be employed in an expedition and action of service. After this, when he thought it was about the time, that they (as having feasted all day long, and well filled their bellies with meat, and their heads with wine) were gone to rest, and newly fallen down asleep, he commanded one ensign or company of soldiers, to carry ladders: and besides them, there were upon a thousand well armed and appointed, marching with silence and in thin ranks, brought thither to the place. When the foremost without any stir or noise at all had scaled the top of the wall, others followed in their course. For the forward and resolute boldness of the former, was able to animate and encourage the rest, if they had been false-hearted. By this time now, the thousand armed soldiers had seized the part, when the rest of the ladders were set to: and upon more ladders still, they gat up to the wall in diverse places, upon a signal given them from the gate Hexapolis. Unto which places the Romans were now come, and found no stirring at all, but exceeding silence and desolation, forasmuch as a great sort of them had made good cheer within the turrets, and either were fast asleep with drinking wine already, or else were bibbing fill, notwithstanding their eyes were heavy, and their hearts asleep. And yet, some few of them they took in their beds, and killed. Neer unto Hexapolis there is a little wicket, which with great violence they began withal, to break it open. So as now, both from the wall (as was before appointed) they gave signal by found of trumpet: and also from all parts they went not to work any more by stealth, but plainly and openly without dissimulation. For they were come already as far as Epipola, a place full of watchmen and warders. And the enemies were to be terrified now and stricken unto fear, and no longer to be dealt with by craft and guile. And it fell out so indeed, that they were mightily scared. For they heard not so soon the sounding of the trumpets, and the shouting and outcry of them that were possessed of the walls and one part of the City, but the warders, thinking all was gone, some ran along upon the wall, others leapt from the walls, or else were born down headlong, with the press of others that were affrighted. And yet many there were, who were not ware at all of this misery and extremity, both because generally they were all dead asleep, and also by reason that the City was so wide and large, that a thing felt and seen in some remote parts, reached not straightwayes throughout, to all the rest. The gate Hexapolis was broken down somewhat before day, at which Marcellus with all his power entered the City. He awakened them all, and let them to their business: he made them take weapon in hand, and to help (what they could) a City in a manner wholly surpris'd and taken. Epicles made halt from the Island (which they themselves call Naxos) with a company of soldiers about him, making full account to drive them out again: as supposing, that they were but some few, who through the negligence of the watchmen and warders were got over the wall: and ever as he met with any that were scared and in fear, he said unto them estoons, that they themselves made more ado, and every thing worse than there was cause, reporting all in greater measure and more fearful manner than need was in very truth. But when he saw all places about Epipola full of armed men after some small volley of shot, and little skirmish with the enemy, (whereby he provoked them, rather than did any good else) he turned back again with his companies, and retired into Acradina, not fearing to moue the violence and multitude of the enemies, as lest some intestine mischief by this occasion might arise, and that he should find in this tumult and hubbub, the gates of Acradina, and the Island that against him. Marcellus, being entered within the walls, took his prospect from the higher places, and when he beheld under his eyes the most goodly and beautiful City of all others in those days, (by report) he wept and shed tears abundantly, partly for joy that he had brought his purpose to good a pass, and partly in compassion and remembrance of the ancient glory and renown of that City. He called to mind the navies of the Athenians by them sunk and drowned: he thought upon the utter overthrow of two puissant armies, together with the loss of two most noble and famous Captains of theirs: moreover, there came into his memory so many wars fought against the Carthaginians, with so great peril and hazard: so many and so mighty Tyrants and Kings that gained and kept their seat and royal court there, and amongst the rest, he could not chuse but think of King Hiero, of fresh and famous memory, a Prince, who above all other gifts which his own virtue and fortune had graced and endued him withal, was recommended especially for his many favours and good turns done unto the people of Rome. When all these things presented themselves to his remembrance, with this cogitation besides, how all that beauty and glory within one hours space was ready to burn on a light fire, and to be consumed into ashes: before that he advanced his engines against Acradina, he sent before, those Syracusians who had conversed (as is afore said) amongst the guards and garrison of the Romans, to persuade the enemies with mild and gentle de speech, yet, to yeeld the City. It so fell out, that the most part of them that warded the gates and walls both, of Acradina, were certain fugitive revolts fled from the Romans, who had no hope at all, upon any condition whatsoever to be pardoned. These would infer more, either to approach the walls, or to parle and speak with any. And therefore Marcellus, after he saw that enterprise frustrate and disappointed, commanded to retire with the ensignes unto Euryalus. This Euryalus is a little mount and fort, situate in the utmost quarter of the City remote from the sea, and commanding the high way that leadeth into the fields, and the middle parts and very heart of the whole Island: a place very commodious for the taking up and receipt of all victuals. The Captain of this hold was Philodemus an Argive, placed there by Epicides. Unto whom there was sent from Marcellus, Sofis, one of them that murdered the tyrant: and after long communication, Sofis with crafty words abused by him, and colourably put off until another time, made relation unto Marcellus, that Philodemus had taken a farther day of respite and deliberation. But he put off still from day to day, trifling out the time of purpose, until Hippocrates and Himilco might come with their forces and legions, making no doubt, but if he might receive them into his fortres, the whole army of the Romans being now enclosed within the walls, should be overthrowen, and utterly defeated. Marcellus seeing that Euryalus was not delivered up, (and forced possibly it could not be) encamped himself between Neapolis and Tyche (so are two parts of the City named, and may for their bigness go well enough for two entire cities of themselves:) for fear lest if he were once entred into the populous and most inhabited places of the City, his fouldiers greedy of pillage, would not be kept together, but run loosely up and down to rife. Thither came unto him from Tyche and Neapolis, Embassadors and Orators, with olive branches adorned with laced veils and insules, humbly beseeching him to hold his hand from effusion of blood, and firing the City, Marcellus calling his Concel about these their petitions, rather than demands, after mature deliberation, by general consent of all, gave expresse and straight commandment to the fouldiers, that no man should offer abuse or violence to the body of any free-born person whatsoever: as for all besides, his will and pleasure was it should be their booty. Now was the camp of Marcellus defended on both sides with housing in stead of a wall, and he bestowed a good corps de gendarmerie the gates thereof, lying open over against the streets: lest when the fouldiers ran to and fro in the City, the camp in the mean while might be assailed. Then upon the sound of Trumpet the fouldiers fell to their business, ran into all parts, brake open doores, set all on a fearful hurry, but spilled no blood: and they never gave over ransacking and rifling, until they had cut out and carried away all the riches and goods, that had been gathering a long time, during their wealth and prosperous estate. Amid these stirrs, Philodemus also seeing no hope of succours and rescue, after he had covenanted for his security, to return safe and without harm to Epicides, withdrew his garrison away with him out of the fort, and rendered it up to the Romans.

Now whilst every man was turned another way, and busied in that part of the City which was forced, Bomilcar taking the advantage of one night, wherein the Roman fleet by reason of a violent tempest could not ride at anchor in the main Sea, got forth of the haven of Syracuse with 35 ships, and having Sea-room, hoisted up sails, and away he went with a mery gale of wind, leaving 4th behind for Epicides and the Syracusans: and after he had informed the Carthaginians in what danger the State of Syracuse stood, returned within few dayes with a fleet of a hundred sail, rewarded for his labor (as the report went) by Epicides, with many rich gifts, which the treasure of King Hiero paid for. Marcellus possessed now of the fortres Euryalus, and having planted there a garrison, was well rid of one care yet: for he doubted, lest if a new power of enemies had been received behind his back into that fort, they would greatly have annoyed his men, enclosed now as they were, and encumbered within the walls.

After this he besieged Acradina, and invested it round about, and fortified three several camps (in meet and convenient places) against it, hoping to shut them up into such streights, that they should be driven to extrem scarcity and want of all things. Now when as for certain dayes the guards of the one side and the other had rested quiet, suddenly upon the arrival of Hippocrates and Himilco, they within began from all parts to set freshly upon the Romans. For, first Hippocrates (after he had encamped and well fortified himself fast by the great Key, and given a signal to them that kept Acradina) assaulted the old camp of the Romans, where Crispinus lay with his guard for the defence thereof: then Epicides also sallied forth, and brake upon the Corps de guard of Marcellus: and withal, the Carthaginian fleet approached close to the strand that lieth between the City and the Roman camp, to hinder that Crispinus might have no aid sent unto him from Marcellus. And yet for all this ado, the enemies made a greater stir and tumultuous alarm, than any skirmish to speak of: for Crispinus not only gave Hippocrates the repulse, and drove him from the defences of his own camp, but also followed him in chase, as he fled fearfully in haste away: and Marcellus torred Epicides to take the City again, and get it over his head. So as now they seemed very sufficiently provided and appointed against all dangers from thence forth, of their sudden sallies and irruptions.

Over and besides all these troubles, there happened a common calamity unto both, the plague and pestilence: in such manner, as it might soon have withdrawn the minds, as well of the one part as of the other, from thinking any more of war. For, besides that it fell out to be the Autumn or harvest season of the year, the place it self by nature unwholesome, stinking and corrupt (but much more without the City than within) the extrem and intolerable heat of the weather

A weather mightily disordered all their bodies generally, in the camps both the one and the other. At the first, by occasion of the disemperature of the season, and corruption of the place, they both fell sick and died: but afterward by visiting and tending one another that were infected, the disease grew catching and contagious, and so spread and increased more and more: in such manner, as either they that were slain sick perished for want of looking to and diligent attendance: or if any came about them, to keep them and minister unto them, they were infected and endangered also as deeply as the other: so as every day a man could go now where, but either death, or corpses carried forth to their graves, were presented to his eyes: night and day in all places there was nothing heard but weeping, wailing, and piteous lamentation. In the end their hearts were so hardened and made savage again, by continual usage to this misery, that not only they gave over to weep over the dead, and to accompany them unto their sepulchres with due mourning and doleful plaints, but also to carry them forth and to inter them: so that the breathless bodies lay scattered all abroad on the ground in the sight of them, that looked every hour for the like miserable death themselves. The dead killed the sick: the sick infected the found, partly with fear, and partly with the corruption and piteous stench that came from their bodies. And because they would die rather upon the sword's point, than of this malady, some of them made offer to go alone among the armed guards of their very enemies, to be killed out of hand, and rid out of their misery. Howbeit, the plague was hotter by far in the Carthaginian camp, than among the Romans: by reason of corrupt water, and much slaughter committed there, and so long siege about Syracuse. For of the enemies army, the Sicilians at the first, so soon as they saw the sickness to spread commonly, and increase by reason of the corruption of the place, got themselves away, and stole every man home to the Cities neer adjoining. But the Carthaginians were fain to stick by it still, as having no place to retire themselves unto, and so, they together with their Generals themselves Hippocrates and Himilco, died all of them, and not one escaped. Marcellus when he saw this mortality grow thus hot, brought his people into the City, where the houses and shadowy places yielded some good refreshing to the sick and weak bodies: howbeit, many also of the Roman army went off, and turned up their heels. Thus when the Land-fouldiers of the Carthaginians were all gone and consumed of the plague, the Sicilians who had served under Hippocrates, withdrew themselves into certain Towns, which were not dangerous, yet sure and strong, both by natural situation, and also by strength of walls and other defences: the one of them three miles from Syracuse, the other fifteen miles distant from the haven mouth: and thither they conveyed from out of their own cities adjoining, all manner of victuals, and sent abroad for aids of men.

In the mean while Bomilcar set sail once again with his fleet for Carthage, where he made relation of the state of their confederats in such terms, that still he fed them with some hope, that not only by their help they might be saved, but also that the Romans (notwithstanding they had in some sort forced and taken the City) might be surpris'd and taken there themselves: and in conclusion perswaded and prevailed so with them, that they granted not only to send him with a great number of hulks and caricks, laden with store of all things, but also to furnish him with 5 more ships of war, to encrease his Armado. Whereupon he departed from Carthage with 130 Gallies, and 70 ships of burden, and had forewinds good enough to set him over into Sicily. But those winds kept him from doubling the point of the Cape Pachynus.

The fame and rumor first of Bomilcar's coming, and then his delay above mens expectation, that checked it again, wrought diversly in the minds of the Romans and Syracusans, ministering that while fear, another while joy unto them both. Whereupon Epicides fearing lest if the same Easterly winds which then held, and were settled in that corner, should continue many dayes more, the Carthaginian navy would return again unto Africk, leaving the guard of Acradina to the Captains of the waged and mercenary fouldiers, sailed to Bomilcar, riding still with his fleet in the road that looketh toward Africk, and leaving a consist of Sea-men so much as he was inferior to the enemies either in force or number of ships (for he had many more than the Romans) but for that the winds stood more favourably to help the Roman Armado than his: howbeit, in the end he perswaded him to try the fortune of a battail at Sea. And Bomilcar for his part, seeing both the Sicilian forces gather and assemble together from all parts of the Island, and understanding that the Carthaginian fleet was coming with great store of victuals: for fear lest at any time whilst he was shut up within the enemies City, he should be assailed both by Sea and Land: albeit he was short of them in number of ships, yet determined to hinder Bomilcar for arriving at Syracuse. Thus rid two armades of enemies affronting one another, about the head of Pachynus, ready to joyn battail, so soon as the calmnes of the weather would give them leave to advance into the main and open Sea. Therefore when the East wind began to lie, which for certain dayes had blustered and ragged first Bomilcar weighed anchor: and the vanguard of his Armado seemed to gather still into the deep, only because he might more easily gain the Cape and promontory aforesaid. But so soon as he saw the Romans ships make way toward him, (I wot not what sudden accident it was that affrighted him) he set up all his sails and fell off, into the main Sea: and after he had sent certain messengers to Heraclea, willing them to set again their hulks home into Africk, himself coasted all along Sicily, and shaped his course for Tarentum. Epicides disappointed thus on a sudden, of so great hopes that he had, because he would not return again to the siege of a City, whereof a great part was lost already, saileth to Agrirentum, there to abide and expect the event and small issues, rather than to stir himself and try any more, how to help them with any succour from thence.

These things being reported in the camp of the Sicilians, to wit, that Epicides had quit Syracuse: that the Carthaginians had abandoned the whole Iland of Sicily, and in manner yielded it again into the hands of the Romans: after they had founded first their minds who were besieged, by talk and conference with them, they sent Embassadors unto Marcellus, to treat about conditions of surrendering the City. When they were grown in a manner to this point, without any squaring or difference at all, that the Romans should have the signory all and wholly which belonged unto the Kings: and that, all the rest the Sicilians should enjoy, with liberty and their own proper Laws: the Embassadors aforesaid called forth to a parley, those unto whom Epicides at his departure had committed the government of the affairs, and declared unto them, that as they were addrest Orators unto Marcellus, so they were from him sent unto the army of the Sicilians: that generally all, as well the besieged, as those who were without the danger of the siege, should be comprized within the treaty, and abide one and the same fortune: and that neither the one side nor the other should capitulate or enter into any covenant for themselves apart, without all the rest. Who being received and admitted, for to salute and speak unto their kinsfolks and friends, made them acquainted with the agreement and composition between Marcellus and them: and so after they had presented unto them some good hope of their safety, they perswaded with them so far forth, as to join with them, and all together, for to let upon and assault the bodies of the Captains deputed by Epicides, namely, Polyxenus, Philostratus, and one Epicides surnamed Spinus. When they were once made away and killed, they called the multitude together unto a general assembly: where they complained greatly of their poverty, and penury of all things (for which they were wont to murmur secretly among themselves:) "And albeit we are distressed (say they) with so many calamities and calamities, yet are ye not to blame for this, because so long as it was in your own power and choice, either to be delivered from them, or to endure them longer. As for the Romans (said they) it was not hatred, but mere love and charity, that moved them to come against Syracuse for to assault it. For when they heard that the government of the state was usurped by Hippocrates and Epicides (the ministers first belonging to Amibal, and after to Hieronymus) then they began to lay siege into it intending not the overthrow and destruction of the City it self, but to put downward and depose the cruel tyrant that ruled the state. Seeing then, that now Hippocrates is dead, Epicides excluded from Syracuse, his Deputies and Captains killed, and the Carthaginians driven out of all their hold and possession of Sicily, both by Land and Sea, what reason have the Romans, but to be willing and well content, that Syracuse should continue in safety now as well as it Hiero himself were living, the only maintainer and observant upholder of the Roman amity? And therefore, if ought but well should happen, either to the City, or to the Citizens, ye may thank yourselves, and none else, for letting slip opportunity now offered, of reconciliation and amonement with the Romans. Never look to have the like occasion hereafter, to that, which at this instant is presented: if ye had the grace to see what a door is opened for you, to be delivered from the yoke of most insolent and proud tyrants. This speech they gave ear unto with exceeding accord and general applause. But before that any Embassadors were nominated to be sent unto Marcellus, it was thought good that new Pretors should be created. Out of the number of which Pretors, there were Orators addrest unto Marcellus. And the principal man among them, spake in this wise. "Neither we Syracusians (quoth he) O Marcellus, it is first yielded from you Romans, but Hieronymus, impious and wicked Prince as he was: yet nothing so much hurtful to you as to us: nor afterwards, when peace was knit again upon the murder of the tyrant, was it any citizen of Syracuse, but Hippocrates and Epicides (the Kings right hands and ministers, who oppressed and kept us under, with fear of one side, and with deceitful sleights on another side) that made the brack, and were the troublers and disturbers of this peace. Nor yet can any man come forth and say truly, that ever we were at our own liberty: and entertained not peace and amity with you. And now also I assure you, so soon as by the massacre of these, that held Syracuse in such oppression and bondage, we began again to be our own men, and to have the law in our own hands: the first thing you see that we do, is this, to come and present our selves unto you, to deliver up our armor and weapons, to yield our bodies, our City, the walls, and all the strength thereof, and to refuse no condition, that it shall please you Romans to impose upon us. As to your self, O noble Marcellus, the Gods have given you the honour of conquest, over the most noble and beautiful city of all other in Greece. Behold, now, what memorable acts forever that we have at any time achieved, either by Land or Sea, all makes to the advancement of the glorious title and dignity of your triumph. See you then, that another day it be not known by bare hear-say and the trump of fame, how great and mighty a City you have won, but rather that it may stand still and remain for all posterity: for a mark and worthy spectacle to behold: to the end, that who ever hereafter, shall resort thither by Land, who ever shall arrive there by Sea, it may present unto them, both our Trophies and worthy victories over the Athenians and Carthaginians: and also this of yours over us, the bravest conquest of all the rest. See (I say) that you leave for your house and family, the City of Syracuse whole and sound, to do homage and fealty ever hereafter, to the name and lineage of the Marcelli, and to hold of them as of their sovereign LL, in chief and in vasselage. That

"That all the World may see, that the late remembrance of Hieronymus, beareth no greater broke with the Romans, than the ancient name of King Hiero, a noble Prince of famous memory. Much longer was he a friend, than the other an enemy. His good deeds and many favours ye have tasted and felt with great contentment: the folly and madness of Hieronymus, hurt none of you, but wrought his own confusion and overthrow. There was nothing but they might have obtained at the Romans hands: all was clear there, and no danger from thence. But among their own selves they were at more war: there was the peril, there was all the mischief. For the Roman rebels, who were run from them, doubting that they should be delivered over into their hands, and not comprized within the terms of the composition and protection, drove the auxiliaries also that were waged soldiers into the same trouble and fear. They hastily therefore took arms, and first killed the Pretors: and afterwards, ran all about to massacre the Syracusians. Look whom they hapned to meet, them they murdered in this furious fit of choicer. Whatsoever came next to their hands, and lay handie for them, they rifled. And because forsooth, they would not be without their leaders, they created six Provosts or Captains, that three should govern Acradina, and other three Naso. At the last, after the uprore was appeased, the mercenary soldiers aforesaid, followed the matter thoroughly by search and diligent inquiry, what were the capitulations indeed agreed upon with the Romans: and then began the very truth to appear, namely, that their condition and the fugitives were far different.

"These Embassadors in very good time returned from Marcellus, and certified them that they were carried away with a wrong surmise and false suspicion, and the Romans had no just cause to punish them. Now there was one of those three Provosts of Acradina, a Spaniard named Mercurius. Unto him there was sent for the non-compliance among those of the retinue and train of the Embassadors aforesaid, one of the Spaniards, who were auxiliary soldiers, serving under the Romans: who finding Mercurius alone without other company, gave him to understand especially above all things, in what terms he had left Spain (and from thence he was newly come) namely, how the Romans there were grown mighty, and held a great hand over them with their forces. And that himself, in case he had a mind to do some worthy deed, might soon rise, and be a great man in his country: chose whether he list to serve under the Romans, or return again into his own home. Contrary-wise, if he went on still in this course he had begun, and minded still to be besieged, what long abiding place could he have there, shut up as he was from sea and Land? Mercurius pondered well these reasons: and when it was agreed, that there should be addrest new Embassadors unto Marcellus, sent his own brother with them, who by the self same Spaniard was brought apart from all the rest unto Marcellus: and after he had a protestation granted, he laid the plot, and ordered all the matter how it should be done, and so returned to Acradina. Then Mercurius because he would withdraw mens minds from all suspicion of treason, and that he intended nothing less, than to betray Acradina, gave it out. That he liked not, and would admire of this recourse, ever and anon, of Embassadors between: and therefore as he would admit of none to come from Marcellus, so he would send no more to him. And to the end, that all the guards should be kept more diligently, he thought it good to divide conveniently among the Provosts, the quarters of the City, and assign to every one his ward by himself, and that each one should be bound to answer for the safe keeping of his own division, and for no more. Then all gave their consent to part accordingly, and to himself be left the charge of that quarter which reacheth from the fountain or well Archebus, unto the mouth or entry of the great key or haven. And hereof he gave notice and intelligence to the Romans. Whereupon Marcellus called a great Halk, laden with armed soldiers, to be satiated by an halting Trowp unto a Gally of four coure of oars, and so in the night by strength of oars to be rowed and drawn up after it into Acradina, and under the soldiers over against the gate, that is next to the fountain Archebus. This being done about the relief of the fourth watch, Mercurius received the soldiers that were first ashore at the gate, according as before it was agreed, and Marcellus by the dawning of the day, with all his forces gave a Camifado upon the walls of Acradina, in such manner, that not only he turned thither unto his assault all those that kept Acradina, but also from Naso there came running whole squadrons and companies of armed men (leaving their own wards) for to repel and put back the violence and assault of the Romans. In this tumult and trouble, certain Barges appointed and furnished thereto aforehand, were brought about to Naso, &c. there let other soldiers aland: who coming at unwares upon the corps de garnison that were left half naked and very weak, by reason of the departure of their fellows, and finding the gates wide open, at which erewhile the soldiers ran out, with small ado were masters of Naso, left, as it was, forlorn of warders, who in fear made haste to run away and escape. And none of them had less means to defend themselves, or smaller mind to carry still, than the fugitive rebels, for they durst not well trust their own fellows, and so in the hottest of the skirmish made an escape. Marcellus so soon as he understood, that Naso was won, and likewise that one quarter of Acradina was held and kept for him, and that Mercurius with his guard had joyined to his soldiers, founded the retreat: for fear, that the Kings treasure, which was more in name than in deed, should be rifled and spoiled.

Thus by suppressing the violence of the soldiers, both the rebel fugitives that were in Acradina, had good time and place to shift for themselves and get away, and also the Syracusians delivered livered now at last from fear, opened the gates of Acradina, and sent Orators unto Marcellus, craving nothing but life for themselves and their children. Marcellus called his Council together, and those Syracusians likewise, who in the time of civil dissention, were driven to forsake their houses, and remained among the garrisons of the Romans: and then he made the Embassadors this answer. "There have not been (quoth he) more benefices and good turns for the space of fifty years received at King Hiero his hands by the people of Rome, than detriments and mischiefs intended against them within these few years, by them that have seized and possessed the City of Syracusa. But most of those mischiefs in the end, have lightened upon their heads right justly, who duly deserved the same: and for the breach of league and covenants, they themselves have suffered at their own hands more grievous punishment by far, than the people of Rome would willingly ever have required. As for me, this is the third year that I lie in siege before Syracusa; not, I assure you, with this intent, that the City should not be relieved, and found for the natural people thereof to keep and inhabit, but that the Captains and ring-leaders of fugitives and rebels might not seize it, and to hold it in captivity and oppression. How much the Syracusians might have done with me at first, may be easily seen by the example of other of those Syracusians who converted among the guards of the Romans, or of the Spanish Captain Mericus, who yielded up his garrison. Yea, and the hardy and resolute course in the end taken (although it were with the latest) by the Syracusians themselves, may sufficiently testify the same. Whereby also it may appear, that for all my travel and pain which I have undergone, for all the perils which I have adventured and passed through, about the walls of Syracusa, both by Land and Water, thus long; I have gathered no fruit so sweet and pleasant as this, that it may be said, how I was able, yet at last, to win and conquer Syracusa.

Syracusa won and ransacked

killed.

Then the Quæstor was sent, attended with a guard, unto Naxos, for to enter upon the Kings treasure there, and to keep the same in safety. The pillage of the City was given to the soldiers: but there were appointed certain warders over every house of theirs, who were among the garrisons of the Romans, for to save the same. Amids many cruel, spiteful, and foul examples of anger, malice, and covetousness, which happened to be committed during the time of this siege, it is reported, That in so great hubbub as possibly might be, when a City is newly taken, and hungry soldiers run to rifling, Archimedes was brutally occupied, and studying upon certain Geometrical figures that he had drawn out in the dust, and happened to be slain by a soldier, that knew not who he was. Whereat Marcellus was much offended and displeased: and thereupon gave especial order, that he should be honourably enterr'd: yea, and caused his kinsfolks to be fought out: and all they in remembrance of him, and for his name sake, were not only saved, but also well accounted of, and had in good reputation. Thus you see in what sort, and by what means especially Syracusa was won. A City wherein was found such store of wealth and riches, as hardly would have been gotten in Carthage, if it had been forced thence: notwithstanding it was able to hold out with Rome, and maintain war with equal force and power.

Some few days before the winning of Syracusa, T. Octavius with fourscore Gallies, of five ranks of oars, crossed the Seas from Lilybæum to Africa, and being entered the gate before day light, chanced to take by the way certain Caricks charged with corn. After he was disembarked and set on Land, he wasted grievously part of the territory about Africa, and returned to the City with booty and prizes of all sorts. And the third day after he went from Lilybæum he returned thither again with 120 caricks full of corn and other booty: and that corn he lent forthwith to Syracusa: which if it had not come as it did in good time to help the present necessity, the conquerors as well as the conquered had felt the smart of most extremest and grievous famine.

In the same summer, the Roman Generals in Spain (who almost for two years had done no memorable act there, but warred by policy and stratagems, more than by force of arms) dislodged from their forts and winter harbors, and joyned their armies together. Then they called a Council, where they jumped with one general accord in this opinion. That considering all this while they had effected this much only, as to encompass and stay Asdrubal from all means of passing over into Italy, it was now high time to make an end at once of the war in Spain. And to effect and bring this to passe, they supposed verily that their strength was well amended and sufficient, by reason that in the winter time they had levied and put in arms thirty thousand Celtiberians. Now the Carthaginians had in Spain then, no fewer than three armies. Asdrubal the son of Gilgo, and Mago, were encamped with all their forces together, distant from the Romans almost five days journey: Asdrubal the son of Amilcar, an ancient warrior, and an old Captain in Spain, was somewhat nearer with his whole power, before a City named Antiorgis. Him the Roman Generals were desirous to defeat and vanquish first: and in good hope they were, that they had strength enough and to spare, for to accomplish that: many, this was their only doubt and fear, lest upon the discomfite of him, the other Asdrubal and Mago would for fear retire themselves into the unpassable woods, and take the wilds and mountains, and so maintain a long war. They supposed therefore it was the best course to divide their power between them in two parts, and at once to compass the whole war of Spain. And thus they agreed to part their forces: namely, That P. Cornelius should lead two third parts of the army, consisting of Romans and allies, against Mago and Asdrubal: and that C. Cornelius with the other third part of that old army should joyn with the Celtiberians, and war again Asdrubal the Barchine [i. son of Amilcar above-said.] Both these Captains with their hosts set out together in their journey, putting the Cel-

berians before in the vanguard, and encamped near the City Antiorgis in the sight of their enemies, having but the river running between. And there C. Scipio laid behind, and made his abode with the power aforesaid: but P. Scipio went onward to perform that part of the war which he purposed and intended. Asdrubal after he perceived that there lay in camp but a small power of Romans, and that their whole hope relied upon the aids of the Celtiberians: as one that could well skill of the falshood and treachery of the barbarous people, but especially of all those nations, among whom he had been so long a soldier: by reason that both camps, as well his own as the other of the Romans, were full of Spaniards, he used by the means of reciprocal commerce of their language, for to have secret speech and conference with the principal heads of the Celtiberians, and so treated with them, that in consideration of a great sum of money, they were persuaded and yielded in the end to withdraw all their forces from thence, and give the Romans the slip. And this they supposed was not so heinous and odious a fact. For why? they were not dealt withal to turn their swords upon the Romans, and to war against them: again, they were to have as good pay and wages to sit still, and not to serve, as was sufficient to bind them for to bear arms and fight: and last of all, rest it self, and sleeping in a whole skin, together with their return home to their own, and the joy and pleasure of visiting their friends, and seeing their goods and lands, were plausible and pleasing inducements to every man. And therefore the Captains themselves were no sooner drawn thereto, than the very multitude. Over and besides, to strike it dead sure, they stood in no fear of the Romans (being so few as they were) that they could possibly keep them in force. And lastly, this might well serve, to be a caveat for Roman Captains ever hereafter, and such precedent examples and instances as this, may stand in stead of good lessons indeed, to teach them how they trust again the aids of foreigners: and never to rely themselves so much upon them, but that they always have in their camp the greater part of their own forces, and the more number of their natural soldiers. All on a sudden therefore the Celtiberians dislodged, plucked up standards, and departed from them, and never had them farewell. And when the Romans demanded the cause of this change, yea, and besought and importuned them to tarry, they made them no other answer but this, That they were called and sent for home by occasion of wars in their own country. Scipio seeing that these Allies of his were so slippery, and could neither be intreated nor enforced to stay: and that himself alone without them was not able to make his part good with the enemy: and to joyn again with his brother, was a thing impossible: for want of all other good means, for the present, when he saw no remedy else, determined to retire himself as far backward as he could: having this especial care above all things, not to encounter and joyn battail with the enemy in plain field, without some advantage, who now was passed over the river, and traced him hard at heels in his dimarch.

About the same time P. Scipio stood in the like terms of fear, but in more danger by the coming of a new enemy, and that was Masaniassa the young Prince, who then was a friend and pensionary soldier of the Carthaginians: but afterwards mighty and renowned for his amity with the Romans. He with his Numidian Horlemen first encountered P. Scipio, as he marched on his journey, and afterwards both day and night molested and troubled him very shrewdly: in such sort, that not only he would intercept and catch up those that were gone out wandering and stragling far from the camp, a fuelling or foraging, and send them short of home: but also ride bravely even before the camp. Many a time would he venture, yea, and enter upon the thickest of the standing camp de guard, and make foul work and trouble among them. By night also he used oft to make many flurys upon a sudden, and assail the gates of the camp and the sumpier, and put them in exceeding great frights. So as the Romans at no time, nor in no place could be at rest and quiet for him, but ever in fear and doubt of some shrewd turn or other by him: so as they were driven to keep within their rampier, cut off from the use of all commodities abroad, and in a manner as good as besieged: and more strictly yet were they like to be beleaguered, in case Indibilis, who was coming (as the rumor went) with 7500 Sueffetans, were once joyned with the Carthaginians. Whereupon Scipio a wary warrior and prudent Captain otherwise, driven to these hard extremities and forced to make shifts, entered into a rash and inconsiderate designment, even to go on and meet (forsooth) Indibilis in the night, and in what place soever it should be his hap to encounter him, there to bid him battail, and fight with him. Leaving therefore a mean guard to keep the camp, and F. Ponticus his Lieutenant, as Provost and Captain, he set out at midnight, and meeting with his enemies, joyned battail with them: but they skirmished rather by loose companies in their march, than with their united forces in set and pight field. Howbeit, the Romans had the better hand so much as it was, considering what a confused and disorderly conflict there might be. But the Numidian Cavalry, whom Scipio thought he was secured of, and that they were not aware of him, all on a sudden flanked the sides of the Romans, and mightily terrified them. Against these Numidians, whiles Scipio made head again afresh, beheld a third sort of enemies also charged upon his back: even the Carthaginian Captains, who by this time while the other were in fight, had overtaken their allies and were come thither. So as the Romans were to maintain battail on all hands and were at a stand and in doubt with themselves against which enemy to turn first or what way with a close couched squadron to give the venture for to break through. As the General was thus manfully fighting, and encouraging his soldiers, presenting and opposing himself forward, where was most need and danger, his chance was to be run through the right side of his body with a Lance: and that massive band of the enemies which had charged upon the thick battalions, which environed their Captain, seeing Scipio falling from his Horse ready to die, in great joy asd mirth let up a cheerful shout, and ran all over the army, and caried glad tidings that the Roman General was slain. This voice being once spread all abroad, caused both the enemies to take themselves undoubtedly for victors, and the Romans to make no other account but they were vanquished. Whereupon they having lost their Leader, began forthwith to flee out of the field. But as it was no hard matter for them to make a lane and break through among the Numidians, and other auxiliary souldiers lightly armed; so to escape and go clear away from so many Horse, and Footmen also, who were as swift on foot as the horsemen, it was almost impossible. Thus they were more in manner slain in their flight now, then in their fight before. And there had not one remained alive, but that the day being far spent already, and toward evening, the night came on apace and overtook them. The Carthaginian Captains, and those also of Africk, taking the full benefit of this their good fortune, slept not their business, nor made delay: but presently after the battail, scarcely allowing their souldiers so much sleep as would content nature, marched in great haist toward Ashdubal the son of Amilcar: making account assuredly, that when they had joyned their power with his, they should break the neck of this war, and end it once for all. When they were come to him, great joy and gratulation there was between the Captains and the hosts of both sides, for this fresh victory newly achieved: and seeing they had already defeated so brave a warrior and great commander, together with his whole army, they made no doubt but expected certainly to have another hand as good as this.

The news verily of this so great a foil and overthrow, was not yet come unto the Romans: but yet they were stricken into a sad dump and deep silence, and more than that, into a secret preface and fore-deeming of some unlucky tidings: as commonly mens minds use to fore-give and tell beforehand, when there is some mischief and ill toward them. The General himself, besides that he saw he was abandoned and forsaken of his associates, and knew the forces of the enemies so mightily reinforced; by good conjectures and guesses, yea, and by very reason, was induced to suspect some loss and calamity received already, rather than inclined to hope after any good success and happy speed. For thus he discoursed with himself: How is it possible that Ashdubal and Mago should bring their armies together without conflict, unless my brother be slain in fight, or have forgotten to be a warrior? how cometh it that he withstood them not? or how hapneth it that my brother followed not hard after them fast upon their backs? At leastwise, if he had not been able to keep them asunder, but that both Captains and armies must needs meet and joyn in one, yet he him self thinks, at leastwise would have come by this time to his brother, and brought his own power to his. In this perplexity and anguish of spirit, he thought yet, for the present time, that the only good course he could take, was to withdraw himself back from thence as far as he could: and to all that one night unwares to his enemies (who so long only were quiet) he marched a great way, and won much ground of them. The next morning so soon as the enemies perceived that the Romans were dislodged and gone, they sent out the Numidian light Horsemen, and began to follow after them apace, and pursued them as fast as possibly they could: and before night the Numidian Cavalry had overtaken them, and skirmished one while with the tail of their march, another whiles at their sides and flanks, and gave them no rest: whereas the Romans made as it were a stand, and began to defend and save their army as well as they could: yet with great wariness and regard of security, Scipio encouraged them to fight, as they might march on still and gain ground, before the Infantry overtook them. But as one while the army was one foot, and another while stood still, in long time they rid but a little ground. And Scipio seeing the night draw on apace, reclaimed his souldiers from farther skirmishes: and after he had rallied them together, he retired with them up to a little mount, so sufficient place (God wot) of safe retreat for an army, especially so troubled and afflicted already, yet higher than any other place all about. There the first thing that he did, was to bestow the baggage and cavalry in the midst within his forces: and at first the infantry ranged round about in a ring, made no difficult matter of it to put by the violent charge of the Numidian Horsemen. But afterwards when the three Generals marching with three full armies approached, their Captain Scipio perceiving that he was never able to keep that place without some fortification, began to call his eye about, and to bethink with himself, by what means possible he might empale himself round about as it were with a rampier: but the hill was so naked of wood, and the soil of the ground besides so stony and craggy, that he could neither finde any underwood fit to cut out stakes for a pallisado nor earth meet to make turfs for a bank, or minable for a trench: and in one word, all things untoward and unhandy for a mound, and to fortifie withal. Neither was there any place there, to speak of, so steep and upright, but the enemy might at ease mount up and climb it. All the hill on every side, had a gentle rising and ascent up to the top. Howbeit, to represent some show and resemblance yet of a rampier, they were forced to take their pack saddles, with their packs tied fast unto them, and so round about to pile them and raise them to the usual height of a mure: And where where wanted pack saddles to make up the work, there they were fain to heap together, all sorts of fardels, trusses, and other carriages, and to put them between the enemies and them. The Carthaginian armies when they were come, marched very easily up against the Hill. But the new fashion and manner of their defences and fortifications, was very strange unto them, so as at the first the souldiers marvelled much

And were attonied thereat, and stood still. But their Captains on all sides cried out upon them. And why stand ye gaping (say they) so; and do not pull in peeces and pluck away that foolish babble there, good to make sport with? A very toy, that women and children would scarce stand about thus long? Why, the enemy is taken already in a pinfold, and lieth lurking and hiding himself behind the trusses and other carriages. After this manner (I say) the leaders rated at the souldiers. But it was not so easy a matter, either to get over that Barricado of the packs, or to remove and rid them out of the way, as they lay piled close against them; nor yet to unfold and unwrap the pack-saddles, lying overwhelmed as they did, under the packs, and entangled together with them. Thus they were kindred and staid a long time: and when at length they had put this bag and baggage aside that was let in their way, and made passage and entrance for the armed men, and that in divers places, the camp and tents were soon taken on all sides, ere a man could turn about: and so being few to many, and trighted men to late conquerors, no marvel if they were killed and hewn in pieces in every place. Howbeit, many of the souldiers having fled for refuge into the forests near by, escaped into the camp of P. Scipio, whereof T. Fonteius his Lieutenant had the charge. As for Cn. Scipio some write that he was slain upon that mount, at the first on-set and assault made by the enemies: others report that with a few others he fled into a Tower hard by the camp: and that there was a fire made round about it, and so when the gates thereof were burned, which by no violent means otherwise they could break open, the enemies entered and took it, and they within were killed every one. Captain and all.

Thus Cn. Scipio came to his end, in the seventh year after that he went into Spain, and on the nine and twentieth day after that his brother lost his life. Their death was bewailed and lamented no less over all Spain than at Rome. For among the citizens at home one part of their sorrow they took for the loss of the armies, another part went for the distraction and alienation of the Province, and a third again was spent in the cogitation of the public calamity: but Spain from one end to the other, mourned only for their Governors and Captains, and had a great misse of them. And Cneus of the twain, was more bewailed, because he had been longer time their ruler, and had won the favour and affection of men, and possessed their hearts before the other: and was the first that ever gave them in those parts a proof and taste of the Romans just and temperate government.

When the army was thus defeated and brought to nothing, so as Spain seemed utterly lost, there arose one man yet, that recovered all again, and brought the decayed state to the former perfection. There was in the army one L. Martius, the son of Septimius, a Gentleman and Knight of Rome, a forward young man for courage and wit, far above the degree and condition wherein he was born. Besides this excellent and most toward disposition of his by nature, he had great helps by the discipline and instruction of Cn. Scipio: under whom, for so many years he was trained and had learned all military knowledge and skill meet for a souldier. This Martius, what by rallying the dispersed souldiers who were fled, and what by drawing others out of sundry garrisons had raised and assembled together a reasonable good power, and joyned with T. Fonteius, the Lieutenant afore said of P. Scipio. But the Roman Knight, above all others, grew to so great credit and reputation among all the souldiers, that when they had fortified their camp within the River Iberus, and were determined among themselves, to chuse one General over the armies, in a solemn assembly of souldiers, even by their own military election: they went one by one in course one after another, unto the main corps de guard that defended the rampier, and to the other wards belonging unto the camp, until they had all given their voices: and so by general consent created him their General. All the time which they had after, (and that was but small) they employed in fortifying their hold, and conveying thither corn and victuals: and what charge soever was imposed by him upon the souldiers, the same they executed readily and willingly, and without any shew that their hearts were dismayed, and cast down any jot at all. But after that news was brought, that Ashdubal the son of Gigo, was coming against them, to dispatch clean the reliques of the war: that he had passed over Iberus and approached near: and the souldiers lean on the reliques of the battel put forth unto them by this new General: calling to mind, what noble warriors they had served under but a while before; what worthy leaders they were wont to have, and with how puissant armies they had heretofore to go to the field: they fell a weeping every one, shaking and beating their heads: some lit up and stretched out their hands to heaven, blaming and accusing the Gods: others lay along upon the ground, calling every one upon his own Captain by special name. Neither could they their piteous moans and plaints be staid notwithstanding the Centurions encouraged what they could, the souldiers of their companies: notwithstanding (I say) that Martius himself sometimes spake them fair, sometimes rebuked them, for giving themselves to such foolish and vain pining, like women: and not rather resolve to raise up their hearts, and with him to quicken and whet their stomacks in defence of themselves and of the common weal: and not to suffer their former Captains and Leaders to lie dead and unrevenged. By this time now all on a sudden, the shout of the enemies was desired, and the sound of the trumpets were within hearing being come close under the rampier. Whereupon all at once, turning their sorrow and weeping into anger and indignation, they ran every man to his arm and weapon: and as if they had been horn and they hastened from all parts to the gates and entries of the camp and charged upon the enemies as they came carelessly and without order and array. Immediately this unexpected and sudden object, stroke an exceeding fear into the Carthaginians.

as wondering from whence so many enemies should start up so soon, considering the armies were so lately clean in a manner destroyed; and how it came to passe, that being newly vanquished and put to flight, they should be so stout, so bold and confident of their own selves; who a Gods name, should be their General, after the two Scipios were slain; what Captain and Governor had they over the camp; and who gave out the signal of battail: marveling (I say) at these premises, and so many particulars, that they once imagined not afore, at first hand they will not what to do, but as amazed men, began to give ground and retire; but afterwards, being still fiercely followed upon with a violent charge, they were plainly beaten back and put to flight. And verily, either there had been a foul havoc and slaughter of them that fled, or a rash and dangerous enterprise for them who would have followed the chase: but that Martius bethought to found the retreat, and opposing himself against the foremost ensigns of the vanguard, yea, and taking hold of some of them himself, staid the main battail and repressed their violence, who were upon the point already to pursue them with heat. And so he reduced them back again into the camp, as greedy as they were still of murder, and thirsty of bloudshed. The Carthaginians, who at the first were driven from the rampier, and for fear hastened away; after that they saw none to follow them, supposed they had been afraid, and therefore staid still: whereupon they departed to their camp again in reckless manner, fair and softly. And as careless as they were in their retire they remembered and thought again, that they were but the tail and reliques of two armies, vanquished and defeated a few days before. Upon this resolute perswasion of theirs, and base conceit of the enemies, they were very negligent every way within their camp: whereof Martius having by his espial, certain intelligence, resolved upon a designment, which at the first light seemed more like a project of hazard, than an enterprise of hardiness; and it was no more, but even upon a bravery to set upon the enemy in his own camp, and give him a camifado. For as he thought it an easier enterprise, to force the hold and pavilions of Afrubal, being but one, than to defend and keep his own; in case three armies and three Captains should joyn together: so he considered withal, that either if he sped well in this exploit, he should restore and set upright again unto the Romans, the decayed and prostrate State of Spain: or if he were discomfited and put back, yet by giving the adventure first upon the enemies, he should not be altogether condemned, and also reputation. But lest this attempt so suddain, and the terror and error which may fall out in the night-time, should happen to trouble this his designed plot, and the course of his good fortune: he thought it not amiss, to make a speech unto his souldiers, and to exhort and encourage them afore-hand. And therefore calling them together to a general audience, in this manner he discoursed unto them of his intent and purpose.

of Martius to his souldiers.

"My valorous and loyal souldiers, either the reverence and affectionate love of mine, toward our chief Captains during their life, and after their death; or the very present condition and state wherein we all now stand; may be a sufficient testimony and proof to any man whole ever, that this charge and government of mine, as it is in regard of your judgement of me right honourable, so it is in truth, and in very deed, to me most weighty, and full of care and trouble. For at what time as (but that fear took away all sense of sorrow) I was not so much milled by my self, as to seek out and find some comfort and solace for mine own pensive soul and heavy spirit: I was forced being but one, (which is a most hard matter for a man to do in time of grief) to minister consolation unto the common misfortune and calamity of you all. And surely I have no lit at all (the harder is my case) to avert my mind from continual grief of heart, nor so much as even then, when as I am to study and devise, by what means I may be able to preserve (for the behoof of my country) these small remnants of two armies. For whythe grievous and bitter remembrance of calamities past, is ever before me. The two Scipios trouble me all the day time with careful thoughts, they disquiet me in the night season with fearful dreams; they make me oftentimes to start out of my sleep, willing and charging me, to suffer neither them nor their souldiers (who were your fellows and companions, and for the space of eight years in those parts where they served, never received foil) nor yet the Common-wealth, to continue unrevenge: warning me withal, to follow their discipline, their precepts, rules, & good instructions. And like as, while they lived here among us, there was no man more obedient than myself to their directions and commandments: even so after their decease, whatsoever in my conceit, I judge they would have had especially done in all occurrences, the same my desire is, that you also (my souldiers) would like of and approve for the very best. I would not have you to weep, wail, and lament still for them, as if they were extinct and gone for ever; (for they live still, and shall, so long as the world endureth, and continue immortal in renown and fame) their worthy and noble acts) but rather so often as you remember and think of them, to go like hardy and valiant men to a field, even as if you heard them speaking unto you, or saw them giving out the signal of battel. Neither was it (I assure you) any other object but that, presented yesterday unto your eyes and minds, which effected so memorable a piece of service as it was: by which ye have made good proof unto your enemies, and given them to understand, that the Roman name died not together with the Scipios; and that the vigour and virtue of that people which was for extinct and buried, by the overthrow at Canna, will ever live again (ye may be sure) out of all adversities, let cruel fortune storm and rage as much as ever she can. And now, since ye have shewed such valour and hardiness already of your own accord, I have a mind, and

"and would gladly see, how bravely ye will bear your selves upon the direction and commandment of your Captain. For yesterday, when I founded the retreat unto you, at what time as you followed so freely upon the enemy, being troubled and dishearted; my desire and meaning, was not to repress and abate your bold courage but to defer and reserve it against some greater opportunity of advantage, and for a more honourable and glorious exploits that anon upon the first occasion, you being prepared and provided, might surprize them at unawares, and not standing upon their guard, armed and well appointed, assail them disarmed & naked; and that which more is, while they are in their beds fast and found asleep. And the hope that I conceive of this good opportunity and effect thereof (my souldiers) ariseth not upon some fantastical imagination of mine own brain by hap-hazard, and upon vain presumption, but grounded upon good reason and present experience. For verily, if a man should demand even of you your own selves, what the reason was, that being but few in number, and lately discomfited, ye were able to defend your camp, against many more than your selves, and those heartened with fresh victories; ye would make no other answer but this, That you, fearing that which followed, had both fortified your camp in every respect with strong munitions, and were your selves well appointed and furnished, yea, and ready to receive them whensoever they came. And surely, so it is, and we find it true by experience: Men are least sure and secured against that which fortune faith is fearless, and need not to be prevented, because that which we neglect is ever more open and exposed to all dangers. Now the enemies doubt nothing less at this time, than that we, who were so lately our selves besieged and assailed by them, will now come to give an assault upon them in their hold. Let us adventure to do that which no man would believe that ever we durst enterprise, and the self-same cause which seemeth to make the thing most difficult, shall effect it (soebeit of all others. At the change of the third watch I will lead you forth without any noise at all in great silence. Well informed and assured I am, that in their camp the Sentinels are not relieved in due course and order, neither yet the ordinary corps de guard kept as they ought to be. Your shout and outcry shall not so soon be heard at the gates, nor your first charge and assault given, but ye shall surely be masters of the camp. Then let me see you perform that slaughter and execution among them heavy and dead asleep, affrighted with an unexpected alarm, and taken on a sudden unarmed, and in their beds; from which yesterday ye thought much, that ye were called away and reclaimed. I wot well, that this seemeth unto you an audacious enterprise and full of hazard, but when things go crofs and stand in doubtful terms, and when others seem fail the hardest attempts, yea, and the most venturous and desperate courses, are ever safest and speediest. For if a man stay never so little at the very instant when a thing is to be done (whereof the opportunity passeth and sleeth away ere one would think) immediately when it is once gone, he may fling his cap after well enough, and complain thereof and fay, had I wist, but never the nearer. One Army they have hard at hand, and two more are not far off: now if we venture of them here, our opportunity and advantage is as good as theirs. And once already ye have made trial of their forces and your own: put we it off another day, contenting our selves with the bare name of yesterday's rally, and give over so, it will be great doubt and danger, lest all the Generals with all their armies be rallied and re-united. And shall we then be able to hold our own against three Generals and three hosts, whom Cn. Scipio having about him his whole puissance, fresh and in good plight, could not withstand nor abide? Our Captains by dividing their forces, and dismembering one compleat army, were defeated and overthrow: I fearably may our enemies, parted while they be, and severed asunder, be discomfited and brought to nought. Lo, this is the only way for us to war, and none other. And therefore let us wait no longer than the commodious opportunity of the next night. Go ye then a gods blessing, make much of your selves, take your repose, that ye may be fresh and lusty to break into your enemies hold with the same resolute courage, wherewith ere while ye defended your own. The souldiers, as they gladly gave ear to this new counsel of their new captain, so the more audacious and adventurous that it was, the better it pleased them. The rest of the day behind they spent in furnishing and making ready their harness and weapons, and in cherishing their bodies, yea, and abate the better part of the night they slept quietly. And so at the relief of the fourth watch they set forward.

Now were there other companies also of Carthaginians, beyond this next camp above laid, about six miles distant from thence. A hollow way and valley there lay between, standing thick of trees. In the midst of this wood, for a furlong space well near, he bestowed closely a cohort of footmen, yea, and certain horsemen of Romans: but by his leave this was but a crafty and sly trick, borrowed of the Carthaginians. Thus the midday way being intercepted and taken up, the Carthagean forces were conducted in a still march toward the enemies in the next camp. And finding no guards before the gates, no Sentinels upon the rampier, they entered in as it had been into their own hold, and no man made resistance: then they sounded trumpets, and gave the alarm. Some fell to killing of the enemies half asleep: others fling dry litter and straw for to kindle fire upon their huts and pavilions; other some again keep the gates, that none should issue forth. So the fire, the outcry, and massacre all together, put them out of their right wits, and made them as it were, blind themselves: that neither hear they could, nor yet make any shift for themselves. Unarmed and naked men fell among the bands of armed souldiers. Some run in haste to the gates, others finding the waies and passages beset, run up to the rampier: and look as any escaped and got away from thence by that means he flieth straightwaies directly toward the other camp. Where they H were caught up by the cohort of footmen, and the corner of horsemen, which rose up suddenly out of their Ambuscado: and being encloied on every side, were killed to the last man. And yet, if it had been any ones good hap to have escaped from thence with life, to livelily, and with to great expedition, the Romans after they had got the nearer camp, sped themselves to the other, that he could not have recovered it before them, to bring news of the defeat. And even there likewise, the farther they were off from their enemy, the more negligent they were: and became soon also a little before day were slip away a foraging, fuelling, and plundering, the Romans found every thing more loose and out of order, than in the other camp. Their weapons only stood reared up in their corps de guard, the souldiers themselves were unarmed, either sitting and lying all along on the ground, or walking up and down before the gates and under the rampter. With these souldiers to secure, to retcheis, to distarmed and disordered (the Romans being yet in their hot blood, and not cooled upon their fresh massacre, and more than that, lusty and brag for their new victory) began to make a fray, and to skirmish. But the Carthaginians were not able to keep them out of the gates. And to within the Camp there was a hot and cruel fight: for, from all parts thereof, they ran together upon the first alarm that arose in the very beginning of the tumult and fuelling. And long had that skirmish continued, but that the Romans bucklers and targets seen all bloody were a pattern unto the Carthaginians of a former execution; and thereupon draw them into a mighty fear. This fearful fight caused them all to turn back and take their heels: and thus as many of them as escaped killing got out by heaps wherefoever they could make shift to find way, and were clean turned out of their camp, and all that they had. So in the compass of one day and night, by the conduct and direction of L. Martius, there were two encamped holds forced and won from the enemies: in which there were 37000 of the enemies slain, with Claudius who translated the Annals of Acidius out of the Greek tongue into the Latine, and 830 taken prisoners besides the gain of a mighty rich booty. In which pillage there was found a shield of silver weighing 138 pound, with the image and portraiture of Asdrubal the Barchine, Valerius Antias records that the camp only of Mago was taken, and seven thousand men slain, and that in another battell with Asdrubal, upon a fallly forth, there died ten thousand, and 4330 were taken prisoners. Piso writeth that when Mago followed after our men in an hot and disorderly chase (for they seemed to give back and retreat) there were five thousand men killed by the train of an ambush, but all writers do blazon the great honour and fame of Duke Martius, and besides the very truth of his glorious name, they make mention also and speak of some miracles: namely that as he made his Oration unto his souldiers, there was seen a flaming fire burning from his head, without any sent and feeling of his to the great wonder and fear of the souldiers that stood about him: and that in the memorial of his brave victory over the Carthaginians, there remained in the temple of Jup. until the Capitoll was burned that foresaid shield, with the Image of Asdrubal, and it was called Martius his shield. After this, Spain was quiet for a long time, whilst both sides after so many overthrowes given and taken between them, were loath to hazard the main chance in one battell.

In the time that these affairs passed in Spain, Marcellus upon the winning of Syracuse, having set all other things in order throughout Sicily, with such faithfulness and upright integrity, that not only he greatly augmented his own glory but also enlarged the majesty of the people of Rome, brought over to Rome all the goodly and beautiful ornaments of that City, their graven and molten images, their pictures and painted tables, whereof there was great store in Syracuse. These braveries (no doubt) at the first were no more but the spoils of enemies, and lawfully acquired in right of war and conquest. But from thence began our great love and liking to the cunning workmanship of Grecian Artificers: and from hence came afterwards our licentiousness and outgaing spoiling and robbing, so commonly & ordinarily, all sacred and profane places, where these things were to be had: which flaid not so, but proceeded and turned at length to the spoiling of the Roman gods themselves, and to that very first Temple which by Marcellus was beautified and adorned principally above the rest. For strangers and forrein travellers used in pilgrimage to visit the Temples which were dedicated by Marcellus at the gate Capena, in regard only of the most rare and singular workmanship of the ornaments in that kind, of which at this day there is very little or nothing to be seen.

Now from all City well-near of Sicily, there resorted Embassies unto him: as their causes were divers and unlike so their conditions were not all one. As many as before the winning of Syracuse had either not rebelled at all or became reconciled and in favour again they were accepted in the quality of faithful Allies, and made much of: those who for fear after the loss of Syracuse, yielded were reputed as conquered, and received laws and conditions at the will and pleasure of the Conqueror. There remained yet no small reliques of war about Aggrigentum for the Romans to dispatch namely, Epicles and Hanno, the Captains of the former war: and a third, sent new from Annibal in the room of Hippocrates, a Citizen of Hippo (his countrymen name him Murines) descended from the Libyphoenices, a man of Action, and one who under Annibal had been brought up and taught all sorts of arms and skill of warfare. Unto his charge were committed by Epicles and Hanno the Numidian Auxiliaries, with whom he over-ran all the countries belonging to the enemies: he went unto all the Confederates, and so wrought with them to continue fast in their allegiance, and to send aids to every one in due time accordingly: in such sort, that within A within short time he got himself a great name throughout all Sicily so as the favorites and faction of the Carthaginians had no greater hope in any than in him. And therefore both Captains, as well Hanno the Carthaginian, as Epicles the Syracusan, who for a time had been pent up within the walls of Aggrigentum, bearing themselves as well upon the fidelity as policy of Murines, boldly adventured to come forth of the walls of Aggrigentum, and upon the river Himera encamped themselves. Whereof Marcellus having intelligence, forthwith removed with all his power, and stretch down encamped, almost four miles from the enemy, minding to wait and expect what they did or went about. But Murines gave him neither opportunity of place to rest him long, nor respite of time to take counsell in, but crossed the river, and with exceeding terror, and tumultuous noise assailed the standing guards of his enemies: yes, and the morrow after gave them battell as it were in a pitchy field, and drove them within their holds and fortifications. But being called from thence by occasion of a mutiny of Numidians within the Camp (who to the number almost of three hundred were departed to Heraclea Minora) he went to appease their moods, and to reclaim them to due obedience: but he gave the rest of the Captains (by report) a great charge and express warning, not to fight with the enemy, howsoever they did in his absence. But both the Captains were greatly offended thereat, and Hanno especially, who was already male-content, and repined at his glory: What? saith he, thinketh Murines, a base Affrican, and not of the right stamp neither to gage and rule me a Carthaginian General, sent with Commission from the Senat and people? He privadly therefore Epicles effectually to pass over the river, and to strike Catullus for whom he if we should lay for him, and then hap to have a fortunate day of it and win the victory, all the honour no doubt shall redound to Murines.

Bye sure, Marcellus thought this a great indignity, that he who had repulsed at Nola Annibal, even when he bare himself bravely upon his fresh victory at Can., should give one foot to the enemy enemies, vanquished already by him both by sea and land: whereupon he commanded his souldiers to arm in all haste, and to bring forth the standards and ensigs. But as he was arranging his men in battell array, there came riding unto him all on the spur, with bridle on the horse neck ten Numidians from out of the army of the enemies, with these tidings and intelligence, assuring them, "That their countrymen, who first were offended and discontented by occasion of that mutiny aforesaid, wherein three hundred of their company departed and went away to Heraclea:" and then afterwards, because they saw their own head and leader, by the practice of those other Captain, who malignd and envied his glory, lent far enough out of the way, even against the very day when the battell should be fought; were not disposed at all to fight, but would sit still and not stir. A kind of people these were, deceitfull otherwise, and used to break promise: howbeit now, they were just and true of their word. Upon this, as the Romans took better heart unto them, (for there was a speedy purveyor or courier sent throughout the battalions from company to company, for to signify unto them, that the enemy was disappointed and abandoned of his Cavalry, whom they feared most of all other) for the enemies were mightily dismayed and put in fear: for over and besides, that they had no help from them: who were the greatest strength of their army, they were in a deep fear lest their own horsemen would desert upon them. By which occasion the conflict was not great, for at the first shout and shock given, well it was seen which way the game would go, and the matter was soon determined. The Numidians, who at the first encounter, and during the conflict, had stood quiet in both points of the battell, seeing their own fellows turn back and flee, bare them only company for a while as they fled: but after that they perceived them all to make haste forsook to Aggrigentum: fearing also themselves there to be besieged among them, slip away every one to their own Cities. Many thousands were there slain and taken prisoners: and eight elephants besides taken alive. This was the last field fought by Marcellus in Sicily: upon this victory he returned to Syracuse. By this time now was the year almost come about and growing to an end. And therefore at Rome the Senate decreed, that P. Cornelius the Praetor should send letters to the Consuls, lying before Capua, purporting this tenour: That so far as much as Annibal was far from them, and no great matter of consequence like to be performed the while at Capua: the one of them (if they thought fit) should repair to Rome, for to create new Magistrates in the room of the old. The Consuls having received the letters, agreed between themselves and took order, that Claudius should go to hold and accomplish the solemn election of Magistrates: and Fulvius remain still at Capua. So Claudius increased new Cons. Cn. Fulvius Centimalus, and P. Sulpicius Galba the son of Servius: a man that had not born any curule office of state before. After these were Praetors chosen, L. Cornelius Lentulus, M. Cornelius Cethegus, C. Sulpicius, C. Calpurnius Piso. Unto Piso befall the jurisdiction within the City. Sulpicius had the government of the Province Sicily. Cethegus of Apulia: and Lentulus of Sardinia. The Consuls had the government of their Provinces prorogued for to continue Gode year longer.

The fix and twentieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fix and twentieth Book, Annibal encamped himselfe at three miles end from Rome, fast upon the river Anio. Himselfe accompanied with two thousand men of arms, rode to the gate Capena, for to view the site of the City. And notwithstanding that for three daies space the armies of both sides were come into the field ready embattell'd, yet they never joyned in conflict, by reason of the tempestuous and stormy weather: But ever as they were returned again into their Camps, presently it proved fair. Capua was won by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius the Pro-Consuls. The Nobles and principall Citizens of Capua punished themselves. When as their Senators stood bound to stakes (for to be whipped) and whilst they lost their heads, there came letters from the Senate of Rome unto the Pro-Consul Q. Fulvius, with direction to spare their lives: but if ore that he would read them, he put them up into his bosome, and willed the ministers or executioners to let the Law have the course, and to do their offices, and so he went through with the execution. It hapned that in a solemn assembly of the people there was much debate and question, who should govern at L. Deputy the Province of Spain: and when no man was willing to undertake that charge, P. Scipio, the son of that Publius who was slain in Spain, made offer to go that voyage, and by the voices generally of the people, and with one accord of all he was thither sent. In one day he assaulted and also forced New-Carthage, being a young man, not fully 24 year old. And there was opinion of him, that he was descended of some heavenly race: both for that himselfe, after he was come to seventeen years of age, and had put on his mans robe, conversed within the Capitoll, and also because there was a statue or figure seen oftentimes in his mothers bedchamber. This book containeth besides the affairs in Sicily: the amity concluded with the Etruscians: and the war against the Acarnanians and Philip King of the Macedonians.

The fix and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Cneus Fulvius Centumalus, and P. Sulpicius Galba the Consuls, when they had entred into their Magistracy upon the Ides of March, assembled the Senators into the Capitoll, where they consulted with the LL about the state of the Common-weal, concerning the administration of the wars, and as touching the Provinces and the Armies. Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claudius, the Consuls of the former year, continued till their rule and full command, with the charge of the same forces which they had before under their hands. And over and besides, they were expressly commanded, not to depart from Capua (before which they lay at siege) until they had forced and won the City. For at that time the Romans among all their other affairs were most amused upon it: not so much for anger and malice, (whereof they had never against any one City greater and juster cause) as in this regard, that being a state so noble and mighty, like as by revolving first it had drawn and induced certain other Cities to do the same: so if it were recovered and regained, like it was to reduce their affections again, to look back and return unto their old allegiance and obedience to their wonted signory of Rome. The Prætors also of the former year, M. Junius in Tuscany, and P. Sempronius in Gaul, continued in their places of regiment, with two legions a piece under their conduct, the same which they had before. And so M. Marcellus remained as Pro-Consul behind in Sicily, for to finish and dispatch the reliques of the war there, with the power of that army which he had already: and had commission (if need were of new supply) to make up the number of his companies, out of those legions which were commanded by P. Cornelius the Vice-Prætor in Sicily: provided alwaies, that he chose no soldier out of those bands, unto whom the Senat had lately denied, either licence to be discharged, or passport to return home into their country, before the war was fully ended. Unto C. Sulpicius, whose lot it was to govern the Province of Sicily, were assigned those two legions, which P. Cornelius had before with a fresh supply out of the army of Cneus Fulvius, which the last year was shamefully defeated, beaten and put to flight in Apulia. These soldiers, all the sort of them, had the same limitation of service and no other, appointed and set down by the Senat, as those former who remained after the overthrow at Cannæ. And this disgrace they had besides, as well the one company as the other, that they might not winter within any town, nor build them any standing camp for winning harbours, within ten miles of a City. L. Cornelius the Lord Deputy in Sardiny, was allowed to have the conduct of those two legions which were under the leading of Q. Mutius. And order was given unto the Consuls, to levy and enroll a new supply thereto, if need required. T. Otacilius and M. Valerius were appointed to guard and defend all the sea-coasts of Sicily and Greece, with the

the help of those Legions and Armadoes which they had already. The Greeks had fifty fail in their fleet, and were manned with one Legion. The Sicilians had one hundred ships, and two Legions to furnish them. So that in this year the Romans maintained three and twenty Legions, to wage war both by sea and land.

In the beginning of the year, when the letters of L. Martius were read and scanned in the Senat-house, the LL there assembled, liked well of the contents, and spake highly in the praise of his worthy acts: but many of them were offended at the superscription, because he took upon him the honourable title of a Pro-Prætor in his title, and wrote thus, [L. Martius the Pro-Prætor to the Senat] considering, that his command was neither granted by the people, nor allowed and confirmed by the Senat. An ill precedent (say they) it is, and of bad consequence, that Generals of the field should be chosen by armies, and that the solemnity of Elections, so devoutly begun in the name of the gods, and with the religious observance of the Bird-flight, should now be transferred into the Camps and Provinces far from Laws and Magistrates, and committed to the inconsiderate wills of rash affectionate souldiers. And when some there in place were of opinion, that the matter should be put in question at the Council Table, it was thought better to defer that consultation, until those gentlemen of service, that brought the Letters from Martius, were gone and departed. As concerning corn and apparel for the army, they agreed to write back unto him, that the Senat would take order and provide for both: but they would not allow in any case to give him this addition, and to write [T. Martius the Pro-Prætor] left that they might seem to approve the very same thing by their prejudice and doom beforehand, which they had left for to be decided and determined afterwards. When the Gentlemen aforesaid had their dispatch, and were dismissed, the first thing that the Consuls propounded was it, and no other: and generally they jumped in this one point, for to deal with the Tribunes of the peoples, that with all speed possible they would move the Commons, and propound unto them, for to know, who their will and pleasure was should be sent L. Deputy into Spain, for to have the government of that army, whereof Cn. Scipio, L. General, had the conduct.

This matter, I say, was treated of with the Tribunes, and a bill preferred thereof unto the Commons: but there was another greater contention in terms, that had possessed their minds already. For C. Sempronius Blaesus had commenced a criminal action against Cn. Fulvius, accusing him for the loss of the Army in Apulia, and ceased not in all the assemblies of the people to make invectives against him, charging him, "That being Captain General, through his much folly, ignorance, and rashness, he had brought his army into a place of danger: reproving him more over, and saying, That never any Captain but Cn. Fulvius had corrupted, marred, and infected his legions with all kind of vices before that he betrayed them to the enemies: in such wife, that it might be well and truly said, that they were altogether spoiled and defeated before they had a fight of their enemies: and were not vanquished by Annibal, but by their own Colonel and Commander. See (quoth he) the disorder that is in Elections, and how no man, when he is to give his voice doth well weigh and consider, who it is that he choiceth a General, & unto whom he committeth the charge of an Army. Behold the difference between Cneus Fulvius, and E. T. Sempronius. This man having the leading of an army of bondslaves, by discipline, good order and government, within short time brought his souldiers to that good pass, that there was not one of them all throughout the army remembered and regarded how basely he was born, and of what parentage descended, but all in general bare themselves so, that they were to their friends a sure defence, and to their enemies a fearful terror: and after that he had recovered them at Beneventum, & other Cities, (as it were, out of the claws of Annibal) he reformed and delivered them safe & found to the people of Rome. Whereas contrariwise Cn. Fulvius having received an army of Roman Citizens, well and worthily born, liberally and honestly brought up, had taught them servile vices fit for slaves, and so trained them, that with their friends and allies they were stout, proud, and unruly: and among their enemies were cowards & very daftards: & so far forth they were to beare off the violence of the Carthaginians that they were not able to abide so much as their first cry and shout. And no marvel I assure you, that the souldiers could not stick to it in the battell, and hold out manfully: when the General himself was the first that ran away. Truly, I rather wonder at it, that any of them stood to it and died in the field, and were not all of them as fearful as Cn. Fulvius, and took not heels with him for company. Yet C. Flaminius, L. Paulus, L. Posthumus, both Scipios, as well Cn. as Pub, chose rather to lose their lives in battell, than to forsake their armies when they were environed round with enemies. But Cn. Fulvius, he was in manner the only man that returned to Rome with news of the army defeated and overthrowen. Now verily a great indignity it is, and a shameful manner of proceeding, that the residue of the army, after the overthrow at Cannæ, because they fled out of the field, were confined and transported over into Sicily, with express condition, not to return again from thence, before that the enemy were clean gone and departed out of Italy: & that the very same rigorous and heavy decree passed likewise, and was executed against the Legions of Cn. Fulvius, and Cn. Fulvius himself, who fled out of the battell, which was through his own folly and rashness begun, should go away clear, and escape without all punishment: that himselfe I say, should lead his old age in taverns, stews, and brothel-houses, where already he hath spent his youthful daies: while his poor souldiers (who had faulted in nothing, but that they were like unto their Captain) be sent far enough off, and packed away (as it were) into exile, and endure shame."

The Oration of T. Sempronius Blaesus against Cn. Fulvius.

"full and ignominious soldiery. Lo, how unequally at Rome the freedom of the City is parted H "between the rich and the poor; between men of nobility and high calling, and those that are of "mean parentage and low degree.

The answer of Cn. Fulvius.

Thus much spake the plaintiff C. Sempronius Blaesus. The defendant on the other side, shifted all the blame from himself, and laid the whole fault upon his soldiers, alleging and pleading thus: "That when they called upon him hastily, and with great willfulness for to give battle, he brought them forth into the field not on that day which they would themselves (for it was late in the evening) but the morrow after, when both time and place were meet and convenient for the purpose: and notwithstanding they were well appointed and orderly embattled, yet were they not able to sustain either the fame, or the fury of the enemies, I know not whether, And when they fled away again, he also was carried away in the throng of the rout: like as Varro the Consul, at the battell before Cannæ, and as many other Generals elsewhere. And what good could he have done to the Common-weal, in case he had stood behind alone? unless peradventure his death might have cured and remedied the publick forces and maladies, or made amends for the common losses. Neither was it for want of victuals, nor for that he light at unawares upon places of disadvantage and danger: nor yet, because he was entrapped within the trains of an ambush, marching on end forward, without sending his epialls before, that he was overcome; but even by mere force, by dint of sword, in open field, and in a pight battell. And it was not he could do withall, if his own men were fearful and timorous, and the enemies hardly and venturous, he had not the rule of their hearts. It is long of every one his own nature to be either bold or heartless.

Two severall daies was he judicially accused, and at both times a fine of money only set upon his head in case the matter should go against him. At the third Session the witnesses were produced, to be depofed at give evidence: and after that he had been shamefully reviled, and charged with all manner of reproaches, there were very many upon their oath testified, That the first beginning of the fright and flight both, was occasioned by the Prætor himself: and that the soldiers seeing themselves forsaken by him, and supposing verily that their Captain and Leader was not afraid of his own shadow, but had great reason to fear, they likewise turned their backs and fled. Upon which evidence, the whole Court was so incensed against him with anger, that they cried all with one voice, to commence a capital action, for that he was worthy to die. Whereupon arose a new debate and controversy: for whereas the Tribune had twice before laid a penal action upon him of money, and now at the third time said that he would have a jury of life and death go upon him: then he called upon the other Tribunes for their helping hand to mitigate this rigour of the Tribune. But when those his Colleagues made answer again and said, that they would not oppose themselves nor hinder his course, but that he might proceed in the suit at his own good pleasure, more injuriam, i. e. according to the ancient manner used by their forefathers, [either by order of law, or rule of custome, and bring him being but a private person to the trial either of a capital crime, or penal trespass: then Sempronius spake and said flatly, that he laid upon him a criminal action of treason against the State: and requested of C. Calpurnius the LL. chief Justice of the City, for to have a day of hearing and judicial trial by the people. Then the defendant cast about to help himself by another remedy, namely, in case he could compass that M. Q. Fulvius his brother might possibly be present at the Session when he should be judged: who at that time was a man of great credit and reputation, in regard both of the name that went on him for his noble acts, and of that great hope which men had of him, that he was like presently to be Master of Capua. But when this said Q. Fulvius had requested so much by letters, ended to that purpose as effectually as he could devise, and to move commiseration and pity in behalf of the life of his brother, the LL. of the Senat returned this answer unto him again, That it was not for the good of the State that he should depart from Capua: thereupon, before the Sessions day was come, Cn. Fulvius departed of his own accord into exile to Tarquinii, and the Commons made an act and confirmed that banishment of his to be a just, due, and sufficient punishment for his offence.

During these businesses at Rome, the whole strength and force of war was bent against Capua, and yet the City was rather straightly beleaguered than forcibly assaulted: insomuch as neither the servants or bondmen, nor the common people were able to endure the famine any longer: and send unto Annibal any messengers, they possibly could not, by reason of the straight watch and ward that the Romans kept, so near one unto the other. At length there was a certain Numidian offered to go and to escape clear away, who having taken letters unto Annibal to put him in mind to be as good as his promise, departed in the night, and passed through the midst of the Roman camp, and put the Campains in very good hope, to issue forth at all the gates, and to make a sally upon the enemy, whilst their power and strength served them. And verily in many scufflings and skirmishes which they made, they got the better for the most part in horse-fight: O but lightly their footmen had ever the worse. The Romans for their parts were nothing so much pleased when they had the upperhand at any time, as they were discontented and ill apaid, to receive a foil in any kind of service of them, who were not only besieged, but in manner overcome already and conquered. So they devised a means in the end, to make up and supply by industry and policy the defect they had in strength and force. They chose out of all the Legions certain lusty young men, such as for clean strength of body, and lightness withall, were most nimble and swift,

A swift. These had every one of them, a light buckler or target, shorter than commonly horsemen have, and seven javelins or darts apiece, four foot long, with iron heads at one end, like as those javelins have, which they use to lance that are lightly armed, and begin skirmishes. And every horseman took up one of these behind him on horseback, and used them, both to fit the horse and ride, and also to leap down on foot, with great activity and agility, at the signal and token given them. Now, when as, after daily practice and exercise, they were able to do it drible enough, and without fear, they advanced forth into the plain, lying between their camp, and the wall of the City, and affronted the horsemen of the Campains as they stood arranged in battell array: and so soon as they were come within a darts cast, the light javelotters, aforesaid, dismounted from their horses, at a sign given them: and behold, all of a sudden, out of the Cavalry there was a battaillon of footmen arranged, who charged the men of arms of the enemies, and let fire their shot with great force, dart after dart, which they lanced so thick, that they galled many a horse, and wounded also many horsemen: howbeit, their fear was much greater, by reason of the strange and unexpected manner of fight. The Roman horsemen seeing their enemies thus affrighted, set too hard, and charged them upon lustily, chased them and beat them down even to the City gates. After this, the Romans were the better in horse-service also, and hereupon began the manner from henceforth to entertain such light armed javelotters, called velites, even among the Legions. The first deviser of this mingling of footmen among the horsemen they say was one Q. Navius a Centurion, and that he was highly honoured by the General for this invention.

Whiles thus stood thus at Capua, Annibal was greatly distracted in mind, and possessed with two contrary cogitations, whether he should go to gain the Cattle of Tarentum, or to rescue and save the City of Capua. At last the regard of Capua prevailed with him: for he saw that as well friends as enemies depended thereupon, and had their mind and eye wholly bent that way; as being a City like to give the very trial and proof, what would the issue be generally of all the revolt and rebellion from the Romans. Leaving therefore behind him a great part of his carriage in the Brutians country, and all his soldiers heavily armed, he made haste into Campania, with an elect power of foot and horse, such as he supplied most meet and best appointed for expedition and riddance of way: yet as fast as he marched, there followed after him three and thirty Elephants, and so he fate him down closely in a secret valley behind the mountain Tifissus, which overlooketh the City Capua. At the first coming he forced the fort called Galatia, and compelled the garrison there to quit the place, and then he turned and opposed himself against the enemies who besieged Capua. But he dispatched certain couriers afore unto Capua to signify unto them at what time he minded to set upon the camp of the Romans: that they also at the very instant might be ready to issue forth at every gate of the City to do the like. The Romans having no fore-knowledge by their epialls of this occurrence, were mightily terrified: for Annibal himself assailed them one way, and all the Campains as well foot as horsemen (together with the garrison soldiers of the Carthaginians under the leading of Hofar and Hanno their captains) sallied out another way. The Romans therefore being driven to their shifts, as well as they might in so sudden and fearful a case, had an eye to this, not to make head altogether one way, and so to leave the rest quite without defence: therefore they divided their forces in this manner among themselves: Appian Claudius opposed himself against the Campains: and Fulvius against Annibal. Claudius Nero the Vice-Prætor, with the horsemen belonging to the sixth legion, quartered upon the way that leadeth to Suessula: and C. Fulvius Flaccus the Lieutenant with the horsemen of Allies, took up his standing, and planted himself over against the river Vulturturnus. The battell began not after the usual manner, only with shouts and outcries, but besides all other clamours of men neighing of horses, and rustling of armour, there was a multitude of Campains good for no other service of war, placed upon the walls, who together with ringing and sounding of basons and rattles of brass (as the manner is in the still dead time of the night, when the moon is in the Eclipse) made such an hideous noise, that it caused even them that were in fight to be amused thereupon, and to listen after it. Appius with small ado repulsed the Campains from the trench and rampier. But Fulvius on the other part had more trouble to deal with Annibal and the Carthaginians, who charged so fiercely upon him, that the sixth legion there gave ground and retreated: which being once beat back, a Squadron of Spaniards and three Elephants passed forwards as far as the rampier, and had already broken through the main battell of the Romans: but they were in suspense between doubtful hope and present danger, thinking one while to break through and pass into the Camp: and doubtful another while to be excluded from the rest of their companies. Fulvius seeing this fear of the Legion and peril where-in the Camp stood, encountered and exhorted Q. Navius and other principall Centurions, to assault valiantly, to kill and hew in pieces that one company of the enemies which were fighting under the counter-scarp. "For all now lieth a bleeding, quoth he, and in extrem hazard: for either you must give the enemies way, and then will they more easily enter into the camp, then they had already pierced through the thick squadrons of the battell: or else ye must defeat and slay them in the place, even under the trench. And that (quoth he) were no difficult piece of service, considering they are but few in number, levered and shut out clean from the succour of their fellows: and the same Roman battaillon which seemeth now disbanded and open, whilst it is affrighted, if so be it would make head and turn both sides upon the enemy, were able to com-compels round and environ them, and put them to a doubtful hazard, yea, and cut them in pieces within the midst. Navius had no sooner heard the General speak these words, but he caught the ensign of the second band of Hastati from the ensign-bearer, and displayed it in the faces of the enemies, threatening to fling it among the midst of them, unless his souldiers made the better haste to follow him, and settle themselves to fight. He was a goodly tall and personable man of body, his brave armor befitted for him out and beautified his person: and withall, the advancing of his ensign on high, drew every mans eye upon him, as well enemies as friends. But when he was approached once to the banners of the Spaniards, then from all hands they spared him not, but clundred at him their barbed javelins, and the whole battell in manner was bent only against him. But yielther the multitude of enemies, nor the volley of their shot, was able to repress and rebut the violence of that one man. Likewise M. Annius a Lieutenant, caused the ensign-bearer of the first band of the Principes, belonging to the same Legion to enter with his ensign upon the cohort and troop of the Spaniards. The Lieutenants also L. Porcius Licinius and T. Popilius, who had the guarding of the camp, fought valiantly upon the rampier in defence thereof, and killed the Elephants upon the very counterfarp, as they were passing over and entering the camp. And by occasion that their bodies filled up the ditch, the enemies had a passage made them into the camp, as it were over a causey or bridge raised of purpose to give them way: and there over the very carcases of the Elephants, there was a cruel slaughter committed. But on the other side of the camp, the Campains and the garrison of the Carthaginians had the repulse already: and under the very gate of Capua which openeth upon the river Vultururns, there was another skirmish, wherethe R Romans striving to enter the town, were not so much put back and withstood by force of armed men, as by brakes, scorpions, and other engines of ordnance, which being mounted and planted upon the very gate, discharged shot so violently, that they drove the enemies farther off. Over and besides, the forcible and furious assault of the Romans was dented and suppressed, by reason that their General himself, Ap. Claudius, was hurt; who as he was encouraging his men to fight in the very forefront of the vanguard, hapned to be wounded with a dart above in his breast under the left shoulder: yet there were an exceeding number of enemies there slain before the gate, and the rest were driven for fear to make haste and get the City over their heads. Annibal also perceiving the Cohort of the Spaniards lying along dead, and the camp of the enemies so manfully defended even to the death: gave over their assault, and began to retire his ensigns, and to turn backward all his footmen, interposing his horsemen behind them, for fear the enemy should charge them on the tail. The legions were exceeding eager to pursue after the enemies: but Flaccus commanded to sound the retreat, supposing they had done well enough already, and effected two things, to wit, that both the Campains law in how little stead Annibal served them; and also Annibal himself knew and perceived no less. Some writers that have recorded this battell, set down that of Annibal his Army there were slain that day eight thousand men, and of Campains three thousand: that the Carthaginians lost fifteen ensigns, and the Campains eighteen. But in others, I find that the conflict was not so great, and that the fight was much more than the skirmish: for when as the Numidians and Spaniards together with the Elephants brake at unawares in the Roman Camp, those Elephants as they passed through the midst thereof, overthrow and laid along many of the tents and pavilions: and the Sumpter-horses and other beasts there for carriage, with great noise brake their halters, and collars, fled for fear, and bare down before them as they went. And that besides this tumultuous fright and confusion, Annibal dealt fraudulently, by sending in among the rest certain that could speak the Latine tongue (for some such he had about him) who in the Consuls name gave commandment (since that the Camp was lost) that every souldier should make shift for himself, and flee to the next mountains.

But this deceit was soon elyped and prevented with the loss and slaughter of a number of enemies: and the Elephants were coufed out of the Camp with fire. But howsoever this battell was either begun or ended, the last it was fought there, before that Capua was yielded up and surrendered.

The Mediftricitus (for so they call the head Magistrate and Governor of the City of Capua) for that year, was one Seppius Lelius, a man of base parentage and mean calling. The report goeth, that his mother upon a time as she made satisfaction in the name of him (being then fatherless and under age) by a purgatory sacrifice, for a prodigious domestical portent, that hapned in her house, was told by the Soothsaier out of his learnings, that one day the chief government of Capua should befall to that child: whereat, seeing no likelihood nor hope at all of any such matter, said thus again, You talk of a poor City of Capua, when that day comes; and God save all, when my son shall be advanced to the highest place and government thereof. But these words spoken at random and in jest, proved afterwards good earnest, and true indeed. For when as the Citizens were driven to great straits, through word and famine, and were past all hope of recovery: in such sort, as they that were of quality and born for honour, refused to be in place of authority, this Lelius complaining that Capua was forlorn, betrayed, and abandoned by her own nobility, took upon him the chief Magistracy, and was the last of all the Campains that bare sovereign rule in that City.

Annibal perceiving that neither his enemies would be drawn forth any more to fight: nor possibly he could break through their camp for to come unto Capua: for fear lest the new Consuls should stop all the passages, and intercept his purveyance of victuals, determined to dilodge without

A without effecting his purpose, and to remove from Capua. And as he cast and tossed to and fro in his mind what course to take, and whither to go; it came into his head to make no more ado, but to march directly to Rome, the very head and seat-City of the whole war. This was the upshot of all, and the emprise that he most desired. Howbeit as all others much grieved and greatly blamed him, that he had over-slipped the opportunity when it was, even presently upon the battell at Canna: so himself acknowledged no less that he was mightily overseen. And yet the thing was not so far past (he thought) that he should despair, but upon some sudden fright and unexpected tumult, he might seize of some quarter of the City or other. And if Rome were one in that hazard, then either both the Roman Generals, or one at the least, would immediately leave the siege of Capua.
B Who if they had once divided their forces, both of them would be the weaker, and minister either unto him, or to the Campains, some occasion of good fortune. The only thing that troubled his mind was this, for fear lest that as soon as his back were turned, the Campains would yield themselves unto the Romans. He therefore with large and liberal rewards induceth a certain Numidian (an audacious and adventurous fellow, one that cared not what dangers he undertook) to be the carrier of certain letters, and to enter into the camp of the Romans, counterfeiting himself to be a fugitive, from the adverse part unto them: and so when he spared his time, to slip secretly from the other side of the camp to Capua. The letters were very comfortable, importing unto them, "That his remove and departure from thence was for their good and safety, whereby he meant to withdraw the Roman Captains and their forces from Capua to the defence of their own City of Rome: willing them not to let fall their hearts and be discouraged; for by patient abiding some few daies they should be wholly freed and delivered of the siege. Then he made stay of all the shipping and vessels that he could find upon the river Vultururns, and commanded them to be brought to Castellum, which he had fortified aforesaid with a pile or Cattle to guard and keep the place with a garrison. And having intelligence that there was such store of barges and bottoms upon the river, as would serve to transport in one night his whole army: he made provision of victuals for ten daies, brought down his army by night to the river side, and crossed the water with all his power before the next day-light. But this was not carried so secretly, but before that it was effected, intelligence was given thereof by certain runnagate fugitives: whereupon Fulvius Flaccus addressed his letters unto the Senate of Rome, and gave notice thereof. At which tidings men according to their sundry fancies and humours were diversely affected: and as to fearful an occurrence required, incontinently the Senate assembled.

P. Cornelius, surnamed Asina, was of opinion, that all the Captains and Armies whatsoever should be called home out of all parts of Italy, without regard of Capua or any other exploit besides, save only the defence of the City. Fabius Maximus thought it was a dishonest, lewd, and a shamefull part, to depart from the siege of Capua, and to be feared to turn here and there, and to be carried away with every copy of Annibal his countenance, and with his vain threats and menaces. He that won a victory at Canna, and durst not then go forward to the City, hath he conceived any hope now to win Rome, being already repelled from Capua? No, he marcheth toward Rome, not minding to besiege it, but hoping to raise the siege from Capua. And however it be, I am assured (quoth he) that Jupiter (the witness of covenants broken by Annibal) and other gods besides, will defend us with the help of that army which we shall find at home in the City. Between these two opinions P. Valerius Flaccus held the mean, and prevailed: for he having a regard and due consideration, both of the one and the other: thought good to write unto the Colonels that lay before Capua, and to certify them what strength they had of able men to defend the City: as for the forces of Annibal, and what power was needfull to maintain the siege at Capua, they themselves knew best. Therefore in case that one of the Pro-Consuls there, and part of the army might be spared from thence and sent to Rome, and nevertheless, the siege continue with the conduct of the other Pro-Consul, and the rest of the army: then Claudius and Ful-vius should to order the matter between themselves, that the one of them might remain still before Capua at siege, and the other repair to Rome, for to defend and keep their native country from the same danger. Hereupon the Senate agreed, and made an Act: which being brought unto Ca-pua, Q. Fulvius the vice-Consul who was to go to Rome, by reason that his Colleague was sick of his hurt, chose out of the three armies certain companies of souldiers, and with fifteen thousand footmen, and one thousand horsemen, passed over the river Vultururns. Then having certain intelligence, that Annibal minded to march along the Latine street way: he took his journey through the towns and burroughs situate upon the way Appia, and sent his courriers before unto Seia, So-ran, and Lavinium, which are seated near unto it, not only for to lay provision of victuals ready for him in their Cities and towns, but also from the country villages farther out of the way, to bring their provision to that port through-fare: and to draw forces into their towns for their own defence, and every one to stand upon their good guard, and to look unto their state, as well publike as private.

Annibal the same day that he had crossed Vultururns encamped not far from the river. And the morrow after entered into the territory of the Sidicines, and led his host near unto Cales. There, after he had staid one day, foraging and spoiling the country, he marched by Suessula, into the territories of Alifus and Casertum, by the way of the Latine street. Under the town Casertum he abode in camp two daies, and raised booties here and there in every place. From thence leaving Interramna and Agninum, he came into the country about Fregelle, as far as to the river Liris, where

where he found the bridge cut down by the Fregellans for to impeach and let his journey. Fulvius as his life was it laid at the river Vulturnus, by reason that the barges and bottoms were burnt by Annibal: and much ado he had, for the great scarcity of timber and wood, to make punts and boats for to set over his army. But Fulvius, after he had once transported his men in such boats and planks as he made shift withal, had afterwards no hindrance in his journey: but found not only store of victuals in the Towns and Cities as he travelled, but also plenty thereof brought ready for him to the waies side right conveniently. Then the soldiers as they marched on foot cheered and encouraged one another to mend their pace and make speed, considering they were to the defence of their naturall country. Now there was a post sent from Fregella, whorode night and day and never made stay, and he put the City in exceeding fear. The running together besides of the people, that ceased not to make every thing more than it was, and to invent somewhat of their own fingers ends, and put it to the news that they heard, made a greater hurry than the messenger himself, and let the City in an uprore. And not only the women were heard to weep and wail in their own private houses: but also from all parts the Dames of the City came flocking into the streets, running about to all the Churches and Chappels of their gods and goddesses, sweeping the Altars with the tresses of their hair hanging down, kneeling upon the bare ground and stretching out their hands up toward heaven unto the gods, pouring out their prayers and supplications. That they would vouchsafe to preserve the City of Rome out of the hands of the enemies, and to save the Roman wives and their little children from harm and all abuse. The body of the Senat gave attendance upon the Magistrates in the common place, ready to take them their advice and counsell. Some receive of them direction, and departed every man to execute his charge: others offer themselves to the Magistrates, to be employed in any service whatsoever. Sundry guards were bestowed in the Cattle, in the Capitoll, and upon the walls: all places about the City were well manned. The Alban mountain also and the Cattle of Tusculum were furnished with good garrisons. Amidst this alarm tidings came, that Q. Fulvius the Pro-Consul, was departed from Capua, and onward on his journey to Rome with an army. And because he should not be abridged of his power and authority, after he was come into the City, there was a decree granted out of the Senat-House, that Q. Fulvius should have as large a commission of rule and command as the Consuls themselves. Annibal, after he had made fouler work and havoc in the territory of Fregella, than in other places, for anger that they had cut down the bridges against his coming, led his army through the Prusina, Ferentinat, and Anagnine countries, and came forwards into the territory Luvicis: and so by Algidum he marched toward Tusculum. And when he could not be let in there within the walls, he defended beneth Tusculum, on the right hand to Gabii: from whence he conducted his army into Pupinia, and eight miles from Rome encamped. The nearer the enemy approached to the City, the greater slaughter was made of the peasants that fled from him, by his vanquishers, the Numidian light-horsemen whom he sent afore to make riddance. And many there were of all conditions and ages that were taken captive.

In this tumultuous trouble, Fulvius Flaccus with his army entered Rome at the gate Capena: from whence he went through the midst of the City, along the street Carina into the Exquilie, and from thence he went forth, and between the gates Exquilina and Collina pitched his tents. Thither the Ædiles of the Commons brought victuals: the Consul and the Senat referred to him into the camp, where they fate in Council about the State of the Common-wealth. And agreed it was, That the Consuls should lie encamped likewise about the gates Collina and Exquilina: that C. Calpurnius, Prætor of the City, should have the keeping of the Capitoll and the Cattle with a guard, and that the Senators keep residence continually in good number within the compass of the Forum, what needesoever there should be of their counsell and advice, against all sudden accidents. By this time Annibal was come forward as far as to the river Anio, and within three miles of the City lay encamped, where he kept a standing Leaguer. But himself in person with 2000 horsemen advanced forward toward the gate Collina, even as far as to Hercules his Temple, and rode all about as near as he well could, to view the walls, and the situation of the City. Flaccus took foul disdain thereat, and thought it a shameful indignity, that he should brave it at his pleasure so scornfully without revenge, whereupon he sent out certain of his own Cavalry, and gave commandment, That they should set the enemies horsemen farther off, and chase them back into their Camp. Whiles they were in skirmish together, the Consuls gave orders, that the Numidian horsemen, such as were fled from the enemy, and turned to the Roman (who were at that time to the number of twelve hundred upon the Aventine hill) should pass through the midst of the City to the Exquilie: supposing that there were none more near than they, for to fight among the valleys, the garden houses, the sepulchres and hollow waies on every side. Whom, when some from the Cattle and the Capitoll, espied riding down the descent of the hill, called Cleutus Pupinius, they ran crying about the City, The Aventine is taken, The Aventine is taken, Which alarm caused a tumult, and gave such an occasion of fear, and running away, that if the Camp of Annibal had not been without the walls, the fearful multitude doubtless would have abandoned and quit the City. But they took their houses, and got every man up to the terraces and leads thereof: from whence they pelted with stones and other shot, their own friends instead of enemies, as they rode scattering one from another in the streets. This tumult could not be repressed, nor the error appeased, by reason that the waies were so pestered with

A with a number of the country peasants, and of cattell besides, whom sudden fear had driven into the City. Howbeit, the horsemen fought fortunately, and the enemies were removed and set back. And because it was necessary to stay and disorders and uprores that chanced upon small occasions to arise, it was thought good and agreed upon, that all those who had been either Dictators, or borne the office of Consuls, should have their full power and authority until such time as the enemy was clean departed from about the walls. And that was to good purpose: for all the rest of that day, and the night following there were dictators and sundry garbories, without any cause or occasion raised, and the same failed and appeaked by that means.

The next day Annibal pulled over Anio, and brought forth all his whole power into the field. Neither were Flaccus and the Consuls behind hand for their parts, but ready for battell. When both armies flood arranged in order on both sides, amused upon the issue and event of that one fight, which was for no less a prize and reward to the victorious part, than the very City of Rome: there fell such a mighty storm of rain and hail together, and so troubled both hosts, that they could scarce hold their weapons in hand, but were driven to retire themselves for safety into their several Camps, fearing nothing less than their own enemies. The morrow after likewise, when they stood in the same place in battell array, the likemettell parted them alinder. And they were not to soon retired into their Camp, but the day was wonderful fair, and the weather calm again.

The Carthaginians took this for an ominous presage to them of ill luck. And Annibal was Cherd (by report) to say, That one while his mind another while his fortune, would not give him leave to win the City of Rome. There were other occurrences besides, as well final as great that discouraged him and abated his hope. Of more importance was this, that whiles he lay with his host in arms before the walls of Rome, he understood there were certain companies with banners displayed sent into Spuria for to supply the armies there. Of this reckoning was this: that he was advertised by a certain captive, how the very same plot of ground whereon he was encamped, happened at the same time to be sold: not underfoot, but at the full price, and nothing abated. This he took to be so presumptuous a part, and such a scornful indignity, namely, that there should be a champion found at Rome to make purchase of that piece of land, which he was possessed of and held in right of arms, that presently he called for the public crier and trumpeter, and gave commandment unto him, to proclaim port-sale of all the shops of Bankes and money changers at that time about the Forum in Rome. Nevertheless, before he was moved to dilodge and retired his camp backwards from the City to the river Tiberis six miles from Rome. From whence he took his way to the grove of Feronia, where stood a Temple, in those daies much renowned for wealth and riches. The inhabitants thereof were certain Capenates, who used to bring thither the fruit of their corn and revenues yea and many other oblations besides, according to their store: by means whereof they had adorned and garnished it with much gold and silver. Of all those gifts and offerings was this Temple then robbed and spoiled. But after the departure of Annibal from thence there were found great heaps of brass, by reason that the soldiers upon touch and remorse of conscience had cast in many brazen pieces. The lacking and pilage of this Temple, all writers do agree upon, and make no doubt thereof. Cælius saith, That Annibal as he went toward Rome from Erutun, turned thither, and he set forth the beginning of his journey from Rome Cattle and from Amisernum. And that out of Campania, he came into Sabinum and from thence into the country of Polignis, and so passed beside the City Sulmo to the Marcinus, and then by the territory of the Albanes into the Martians land, and from thence he marched to Amisernum, and so forward to the town Fornli. Neither is there any error or doubt in all this, because the marks and tokens of the voyage of so great an army could not within the memory and compass of so small an age be confounded and worn out. For certain it is, that he passed that way. The only difference lieth herein, whether he came to the City of Rome, or returned from thence into Campania, by that way or aloof.

Now was not Annibal to retolue to defend Capua, but the Romans were as fully bent, and more eager to continue the siege and assault thereof, for he sped himself so fast another way in his voyage back first out of the Lucans country to the Bruttians, and so on still to the streight of Sicily and to Rhegium, that with his sudden coming thither, he surprised them at unawares, even before they heard of his arrival. As for Capua, albeit in the time of Fulvius his absence it was no less straightly beleaguered, yet it felt the coming again of Flaccus: and besides, there was much marvel there, why Annibal returned not back as well as he. Afterwards, they understood, by conference with some that were without, how they were forsaken and forlorn of Annibal, and that the Carthaginians were still all hope to keep and hold Capua still to their own use. There was an Edict moreover of the Pro-Consul, passed by order from the Senat, and the same published and divulged among the enemies, That what Citizen soever of Capua would turn to the Romans before such a certain day he should have a general pardon. But there was no coming in, nor ranging to the Romans side; for fear of punishment at the Romans hands, more than for any regard of their allegiance to the Carthaginians: because their transgression and trespass in their former revolt was so great, that it might not be abandoned. And as no one man at all privately on his own head came over to the camp of the Romans, so there was no good order taken by public council for the benefit and safety of the whole City. The Noblemen had given over managing of state-matters and could not be brought by any means to assemble in the Senat.

And in chief place of government was he, who had not won to himself any honour thereby, but his unworthiness was derogatory to the authority and power of that Magistracy which he bore. For now there was not one of the chief Citizens and Noblemen that would be so much as seen in the Market place or Common Hall of assemblies: but shutting themselves within doors in their privat houses, they expected every day for the destruction of their country, together with their own undoing and overthrow. The whole charge and care lay upon Bustar and Hanno Captains of the garison in the fort there of the Carthaginians, and more careful were they of their own welfare, than fearful for the jeopardy of their friends and Allies. These two were letters unto Annibal, sent not only in plain terms and frankly, but also sharply and bitterly: wherein they laid unto his charge, "That he had not only betrayed Capua into the hands of the enemies, but also I delivered and exposed them and the garison to the cruel clutches of the Romans to be massacred and executed. That he was gone his waies, and departed into the country of the Bruttii, as one that turned away his face of purpose, because he would not see with his own eyes the loss of Capua. But, I wot the Romans contrariwise could not be withdrawn from the siege of Capua, no, not by the assaulting of the City of Rome: so much more were the Romans resolute enemies, than the Carthaginians constant friends. But if he would return again to Capua, and bend the full force of his war thither, both they and the Citizens also of Capua would be ready to supply forth and encounter the enemies. For why, they passed not over the Alps with intent to war with the Rhegians and Tarentines; no but where the Roman Legions were, there ought the armies of the Carthaginians to be. Thus at Cannæ, thus at Therapyneum were the victories. X. chieft, by affronting and meeting the enemy, by joyning camp to camp, and by hazarding the fortune of the battell. To this effect were the letters penned, and given to certain Numidians; who for a good reward had offered their service before, for the safe carriage and delivery of them. These fellows presented themselves before Filiculus in the Camp, in habit and quality of fugitives unto his side: hoping to spy out some convenient time when they might give him the slip and be gone. Now by occasion of the famine which had continued long in Capua, there was none but might pretend a good and reasonable cause to depart from thence to the adverse part. But behold, there happened a Capuan wench to come into the leaguer (a naughty pack and an harlot, that one of the supposed counterfeit fugitives aforesaid kept.) She enforced the Generall of the Romans, that those Numidians fraudulently and by covin pretended to flee unto his part, and had letters about them unto Annibal. This would the stand to, and be ready to aver to the very last one of them, who bewrayed & disclosed the plot unto her. At first, when he was brought forth before her, he let a joily countenance of the matter & made it very strange & pretending foolishly that he knew not the woman; but by little and little he was convicted by manifest truths, and especially when he saw that they called for the rack, and that he was upon the point to be put to torture: and so in the end confessed that all was true, and therewith brought forth the letters. Over and besides, another thing was now revealed, which before was kept close and secret: to wit that there were other Numidians besides, who under the colour of fugitives had gone up and down in the Roman camp: of these there were apprehended not so few as three score and ten, and they together with the new were whipped with rods, had their hands cut off, and sent back again to Capua. This piteous spectacle and sight of so fearful execution killed their courage, and brake the very heart of the Campans. Whereupon the people ran together unto the Council-House, and compelled Leptus to assemble a Senat, and openly threatened the Nobles (who a long time had absented themselves from publicke consultations) that unless they would now repair into the Senat, they would go home to their very houses, and pluck them out by the ears into the street. For a while hereof the chief Magistrats had a frequent and full assembly of Senators. Whiles all the rest were of opinion to send Embassadors to the Roman Generals, Vibius Virius (who had been the chief cause and principall author of their first revolt from the Romans) being demanded his advice, spake to the point in this manner.

The Oration
of Vibius Virius in the Senat of Capua.

"They that talk of Embassadors of peace, and of yielding, little consider and remember either that what they would have done. In case the Romans had been at their devotion and mercy, or that themselves must endure and suffer. For what think ye will become (quoth he) of this present surrender of ours, in comparison of that whereby in times past we freely gave unto the Romans our selves, and all that we had, for to obtain their aid and succour against the Samnites? And have we so soon forgot, at what time, and in what condition and state we were when we forsok and abandoned the people of Rome? Alas, after our revolt, how we most cruelly and shamefully killed their garison, who we might have dismissed and sent away with their lives? Moreover, how often we have issued forth against them lying at siege, and how much heavily minded we were unto them, yea, and how we have fallen upon them in their camp? Over and besides, call ye not to remembrance, how we called for Annibal to surpris and defeat them? and that which of all other is most fresh in memory) how we sent him from hence to give assault to Rome? On the contrary side mark well and call to mind, how maliciously they have attempted and practised all hostility against us: by which ye may well know what account to make of them and what ye are to trust unto. For when they had a stranger and forrain enemy in Vulturnus, yea, when they had Annibal their enemy: when the wars were so hot, that all was on a light fire: they passed by all other affairs, yea they let Annibal himself alone, and sent both their Consuls with two compleat Consular armies to besedge and force Capua. This is the

"second year that they keep us enriched round about, penning us up, and pinning us with extreme famine and hunger: during which time they themselves as well as we, have endured the utmost extremities and dangers that are, and sustained most grievous and infinite travells: of enemies being killed and cut in pieces about their rampiers, trenches, and ditches, and finally driven almost out of their Camp and hold. But to let pass and speak no more of these ordinary matters, seeing it is an old and usuall case for them to abide painful toll, and incur many perils: who besedge and assault any Cities or towns of their enemies: See a manifest sign of their deadly feud, and execrable hatred against us. Annibal with a puissant power of foot and horsemen both, assailed their Camp, yea, and in some part was Master of it. Think ye that in so great danger of theirs they were one jot withdrawn from the siege? He passed over the river Fulturnus, and burnt the territory of Calatia: yet for all that calamity and loss, which their allies received, stirred not they one whit, nor gave over their enterprise. He commanded to march forward with banner displayed against the very City of Rome: they made as little account of that dangerous tempest toward, as of all the rest. After he had passed over the river Anio, he pitched his tents within three miles of the City: nay, he approached at length the walls, and made a bravo even under the gates: to be short, he presented unto their eye his resolution, and menaced to make Rometo hot for them unless they levied the siege before Capua; and yet they gave not over but beleaguered us still. The very wild and savage beasts be they never so fell, be they made never so much with blind rage and woodness against one, yet if another go to their dens, and offer to take away their whelps, they will turn again to succour and help their young ones: but the Romans, notwithstanding Rome was beseged, their wives and children in danger; whose piteous cries and lamentable plaints were heard almost even thither; notwithstanding their altars, their sacred fires, the temples of their gods the monuments and sepulchers of their Ancestors, were profaned, abused, and polluted, could not be drawn away from Capua. So eager, so hungry are they to be revenged of us; so thirstily are they to drink out blood. And good reason, happily, they have so to do. For would not we also have done the semblable, if fortune had given us the opportunity? But seeing the will of the immortal gods is otherwise: and considering that I owe nature a death: in my power it is (whiles I am at liberty, whiles I am mine own man, and master of myself) to avoid torments; to shun shamefull ignominies and reproaches (whereof the enemy hopeth I shall feel the smart) and that by one kind of death, which as it is honest, so it is also easie and gentle? Never will I endure to be Ap. Claudius and Q. Fabius proudly and insolently bearing themselves upon their conquest over us: never will I be led and haled bound with chains through the City of Rome; to make a shew, and to serve for a spectacle and gazing stock in their Triumph: and afterwards either in dark prison, or tied openly to a stake, yield my back and side to be rewarded, whipped, and mangled: and then lay my neck upon the block, to have my head chopt off with the bloody axe of the Romans. Never will I behold my native country laked, spoiled, and put to fire and sword, nor the chaste married dames of Capua to be forcibly ravished the fair and beautiful maidens shamefully defouled, and the well-favoured young boies and freeborn, unnaturally abused. They rased Alba in times past from the top to the very foundation, and left neither stick nor stone thereof, Alba lay from whence they had their off-spring, and were first descended to the end that there might remain no memory at all of their stock and first original. And shall I ever beleve they will spare Capua; receive into mercy, against which they are more hatefully and mortally bent than against Carthage? Therefore, my masters and friends, as many of you as are minded and resolved to die before ye see these so many miseries and wooll calamities, I have at home a supper this night well furnished and provided for you all: and when ye have eat meat your fill, and drunk wine to it liberally, the same wastell cup that first will be presented unto me, shall go round about to you all: and that one draught shall deliver your bodies from torments, preserve your spirits from anguish and contumelious disgrace: keep your eyes from beholding all cruel acts, your ears from hearing all shamefull indignities which follow and attend upon conquered perions. There shall be also in readines certain servitors of purpose to make a mighty great fire within the base court-yard of mine house and to cast our dead bodies thereinto. This is the only honest way to death, and beleeving us who are free born and gentlemen indeed. In which doing, our enemies will wonder at our vertue: and valour: yea, and Annibal himself shall well know that he hath forsaken and betrayed his trust and magnanimous allies.

This Oration of Virius, there were more men present that heard with applause and good liking than could find in their hearts to put that in execution which they to well allowed & approved. The greater part of the Senat, not despairing, but that the clemency of the people of Rome, which had been tried and seen oftentimes in many wars, might be gained and extended also unto them: concluded, to send Embassadors with commission to yield Capua into the Romans hands. Some seven and twenty Senators there were that accompanied Vibius Virius home to his house, and lapped with him: and after they had done what they could to drink themselves drunk, and to intoxicate their brains with freely taking in their wine, (thereby to withdraw their minds from the fence and apprehension of their imminent harm and misery) drank all of the poysoned cup above said. This done, and the banquet ended, they rose from the table, took one another by the hand embraced each other, taking their last leave, bidding a final adieu and farewell, and bewailing together with pteuous tears their own misfortune, and the miserable state ring, as touching the ready and delivery of the fortresses in every City, and likewise of prefixing some day, by which time the garrisons should be removed and displaced, and the Carthaginians have away all their bag and baggage without fraud and covin. Asdrubal having obtained his request, presently commanded, that in the very evening, and at night long the heaviest and most cumbersome part of his whole army should escape what way soever they could out of the gullet of the forest. But he gave especial direction, that they should not over many of them that might go forth, because their small number was not only fitter to deceive the enemy, and not so soon to be discovered, but also might more easily pass through those narrow and difficult passages. So the morrow they came to an interview and parl: where the time was spent of purpose in much needless talk, and drawing of books, more than cause was: whereupon the day being far gone, the business was put off unto the next day. And the night ensuing between, Asdrubal more time to fend others away. And yet could not they make an end that day neither. Thus there passed certain daies, employed in open shew about dispute and reasoning of the articles and conditions of agreement, and the nights were bestowed in letting out the Carthaginians closely out of their Camp. Now, after that the greater part of his host was gone away clear, then he began to wrangle and jar, yea, and to go from some offers that he had voluntarily made, and ever they were further and further off from agreement. For Asdrubal the less that he feared, the less also was to be trusted. And by this time in manner all his Infantry were got out of the forest, and the next morning, not only the forest, but all the plains about were overcast, and covered with a thick and foggy mist. Which Asdrubal perceiving, he sent a messenger to Nero, requesting to defer their farther conference and communication to the morrow: pretending, that the present day was a festival holy-day among the Carthaginians, and therefore they made it scruple upon it, to follow any other business but serve God. All this while there was no fraud so much as once suspected. Asdrubal had no sooner obtained respite for that day, but forthwith he and all his Cavalry, together with his Elephants, dislodged, and without any noise or stir recovered without any harm a place of security. By the fourth hour of the day the sun had dispatched and scattered the mist, and cleared the sky, and then the Romans might discover the Camp of their enemies empty, and no creature left therein. Then at length, Claudius perceiving that Asdrubal had shewed him a Carthaginian trick, and that he was at length thus over-raught by his falsehood and cunning practice, began to make out after him, minding to bid him battle. But the enemy would none of that, and fell off. Howbeit these passed some small skirmishes between the reward of the Carthaginians, and the forlorn hope and van-couriers of the Romans. Amidst these affairs (the States of Spain) neither they who revolted after the overthrow of the Romans, returned again unto them; nor any new fell away, more than before.

At Rome, the Senate and people after the recovery of Capua, took as great care for Spain now, as for Italy it self. And agreed they were in general, that the army there should be strengthened with new forces, and a General there sent: but who should be the man was not yet concluded. Forasmuch as they were to take some extraordinary care in the chusing of one to be sent thither, where two singular and renowned warriors were slain within the compass of thirty daies, and to succeed in the room of those twain. Whiles some nominated one, and some another, at length they grew to this point, that the people should hold a solemn assembly (as it were, purchased) for election of a Pro-Consul to go over into Spain. And the Consuls accordingly proclaimed a set day for the said assembly. At first there was great expectation that those persons who took themselves worthy of so great command should put forth themselves: and prefer their own names beforehand. But when this expectation failed and came to nothing, every man began afresh to retrace and renew the former grief, and mourn again for the losses received, and to find the want and misfortune of so valorous Captains whom they had lost. Whereupon the whole City being sad and penive, and in manner destitute of all good counsell, and not resolved what to do in this hard case, came yet down into Mars field upon the day appointed for the election. Every mans eye was upon the Magistrates, and beheld the countenances of their great men and Rulers, how they looked one upon another, grieving and grumbling, that the State was at so low an ebb, and the Common-wealth grown to so desperate a case, that no man durst be seen to take upon him the government and Province of Spain. Then all of a sudden, P. Cornelius (his son that was slain in Spain, a young Gentleman, not fully four and twenty years old) shewed himself, and said, That he would undertake that charge upon him: and therewith stepped up into an higher place, from whence he might be seen and there he stood. Upon whom, when all men had cast their eyes, and viewed him well, in a general accord and favourable affection unto the man, they wished unto him straightwaies a happy and fortunate government. And when the assembly was willing to give their suffrages, and go to a scrutiny, there was not one Century from the first to the last, nor one person from the highest to the lowest, but gave their voice with P. Scipio, for to take a voyage As Deputy into Spain. But after the thing was passed, and their passionate heat of affection once allayed, they were on a sudden driven into a still silence and deep dump, to think what a strange and new deed they had done. And that which they be thought themselves most of, was this, that favour had carried them away in this action more than the due consideration and regard of his age. Some there were that had in dread and horror the ominous fortune also of that family: and the name of him that out of two mournfull houses was to

As go into those Provinces where he must fight amongst the Sepulchres both of father and uncle. When Scipio perceived, that presently upon the election passed in to halcy a fit, the people grew to be heavy and penive: he called them to an open audience, and there before them all discoursed of his young age, of the government committed unto him, and of the future war that he was to manage: and that with so noble courage and haughty spirit, that he renewed afresh and kindled again the former zeal, and hear that was so cooled: and possessed mens minds with more assured hope than usually mans faithfull promise, or reason grounded upon the confidence of precedents pith, or any earthly thing is wont to afford and warrant. For Scipio was a rare and wonderfull man, not only in regard of those true virtues inherent in him: but also for that he had framed himself even from his young and tender years, by artificial means, to the better letting out of those inbred parts and qualities of his own: making shew and semblant before the multitude, of the most things which he did, were either represented unto him by night-visions and apparitions, or else suggested, as it were, by revelation from the gods above: were it he was imperitiously given, and his mind wholly possessed therewith, or that by his policy he might effect his designments, and have his commandments performed with more expedition, as if they were directions delivered from the Oracles and the very mouth of the gods. Over and besides that, he made this overture to credit and reputation, and prepared mens minds in this sort from his very first beginning. From the very time that he came up on his mans gown there was no day went over his head, but before he began his own private business, or entered any publick affairs, he would go into the Capitoll: and so soon as he was entered into the Temple, there it him down, and alone by himself below a good time in some secret Ile and corner thereof. This ordinary manner of his, which he continued all his life long, (were it of purpose considerably or by chance unadvisedly) made divers men believe verily, that it was a truth indeed, which was commonly supposed and reported, That the man had a god to his father. Which deep and settled imagination of the people, resembled and renewed again the like fame (in all the world) to that which went before and was bruited abroad of Alexander the great, and for the vanity and fabulous speech of folk, was the very same and all one in every respect: namely, that his mother conceived him by a mighty great serpent: for that very often in her bed-chamber there was seen some such prodigious and wonderfull thing, and ever as any body came in, it would wind away of a sudden, and vanish out of sight. These strange and miraculous conceits he would never himself elevate and discredit as coies and vanities, but rather cherish and increase the opinion thereof, by a certain cunning cast of his own, in that he would neither deny and disavow any such matter, nor yet affirm plainly and verifie the same. Many other devices he had of like sort, partly true indeed partly leigned and counterfeit, which caused men beyond all measure to have this young man in wonderfull admiration. Upon the strong and grounded presumption whereof, the City at that time conferred upon him (far unmeet, I wot, in regard of his unripe years) so great a government, and a world withall of weighty and important affairs.

Besides the forces which remained in Spain of the old army, and those which were transported over from Pateoli with Claudius Nero, he had a supplement also of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horsemen: and to assist in the conduct of his wars, he had as coadjutors appointed unto him M. Junius Syllanus the Pro-Prator. Thus with a fleet of thirty ships, (and Gallies there were all of five banks of oars) he took the seas, and set sail from the mouth of Tyber, and coasting along the Tuscan seas under the Alpi, and through the gulph of Gallia, he doubled at length the point and cape of Pyrene, and disembarked at Emporia a City of Greeks: (for defended they are also from Phocæa) and there he set his people a land. From thence, having taken order that his ships should follow after, he marched by land to Taracón, which he appointed for the Rendezvous, where all his allies and confederates (for at the wonder and fame of his landing, there flocked Embassadors unto him from all parts of the Province) should meet together at a general Diet. There he commanded that the ships should be bestowed in their docks, gave only three Gallies (of three ranks) which came from Massila, and upon curtesie and kindness accompanied him from home, and those were sent back again. Then he gave audience to the Embassadors, who hung in doubtfull suspense by reason of the variety and of sundry changes and chances that lately had happened, and to them he began to return answer, and give them their severall dispatches: but with such a spirit and boldness (upon confidence that he had in his own rare virtues) that he let not fall in all his speech one word that might move quarrell, and favoured of rigour, and yet whatsoever he spoke it carried an exceeding majesty with it, and a singular credit. Being departed from Taracón, he visited both the States of the Allies, and also the standing wintering camps of the army: where he highly commended the soldiers, for that notwithstanding they had received two shrewd blows, upon two so great defeats one in the neck of another, yet they held the Province still, and kept the field; and nor suffering the enemies to reap and taste the fruit of their fortunate victories, and kept them out of all the countries lying within Ibernia, and defended faithfully all their confederates according to the trust reposed in them. Marius he had in his train alwaies about him: whom he so highly honoured, that it was very well seen, he feared nothing less than that any other man should eclipse or shadow his glory. Then Syllanus succeeded in place of Nero, and the new soldiers were brought into the standing winter leaguers, and Scipio having reviewed all the Cities and the States that he was to survey, and performed all other affairs that were then to be done, retired and withdrew himself to Taracón.

The fame of Scipio was no less bruited among the enemies, than it was with his own Citizens and loving allies: and a certain preface went withall of the future event, which carried (as good hap was) the greater fear and dread with it, as there was less reason that could be rendered and given thereof. They had betaken themselves into their winning harbours far distant and remote afinder. Afrubal the son of Gisgo even as far as to the Ocean sea side unto Gades: Mago into the midland parts, and especially above the forest and chafe of Casula. And Afrubal the son of Amilcar wintered nearest unto Iberus about Saguntum.

In the very end of that summer, when Capua was won, and Scipio come into Spain, the Carthaginian Armado which was sent for out of Sicily to Tarentum, for to intercept the victuals, and empeach the same for coming to the Roman garrison that held the Castle of Tarentum, had verily stopped all the passages from the sea to the said Castle: but by their long abode in those parts, and keeping the seas so fearfully, they had caused a greater dearth and scarcity of victuals among their own friends than their enemies: for there could not by the help of those Carthaginian ships so much corn be along the river that was possessed by friends, nor from the open ports, for to furnish the townsmen of Tarentum, as the navy it self consumed and spent in maintenance of that rabble of sea-men, sailors, and mariners, mingled of all sorts of people. So as the garrison of the Castle being but few in number there was able to be sustained by the provision they had aforehand, without the help of any new brought in unto them: whereas the Tarentins and the Navy could not have sufficient conveyed unto them: by reason whereof, at length the Armado had leave to depart thence with more thanks of the City, than they had for their first hundred victuals. And yet victuals were not much cheaper, because when the help by sea was gone, there could be no corn at all be brought from other parts abroad.

At the end of the very same summer, when M. Marcellus was come to the City out of Sicily, his own Province, C. Calphurnius the Prator assembled the Senat for his sake in the Temple of Bellona. Where, after he had discoursed of the acts by him achieved, and complained after a mild and modest sort, laying open his griefs, not to much in the behalf of himself, as of his soldiers: in that when he had performed and accomplished his charge and commission in his Province, he could not have been able to bring home his army with; he demanded that he might be allowed to ride in triumph into the City: but he could not obtain it. This matter was much canvassed and debated, pro & contra. Whether it were less meet and convenient, to deny him triumph being now present, in whose name whilst he was absent, for the fortunate success and good speed of all affairs under his conduct and government, there was a solemn procession decreed, and sacrifices done to the honour of the immortal gods: or to grant him triumph (as if the war were fully finished) whom the Senate had commanded to make over his army to his successor: which surely they would never have decreed, but that the war remained still within the Province: and especially seeing the army it self was away, the best witness simply, whether he had deserved a triumph or no. At length, a middle and indifferent course between both was agreed upon, namely, that he should enter the City ovant in a petty triumph. And the Tribunes of the Commons, by the approbation first of the Senate, propoled unto the people, that M. Marcellus should the same day that he came ovant into the City retain still his full authority and government. The day before he entered the City, he rode in triumph upon the mount Albanus, and from thence, in ovant whilst he sent a rich booty before him into the City. There was carried in this pomp the counterfeit of the City Syracuse won, crowsbows, brakes, standing slings, and all other warlike instrument: besides, the ornaments testifying long and continual peace, and the great wealth and treasure of the Kings: as divers vessels of silver and brass curiously wrought: other household furniture all rich hangings of tapistry, and garments of great price, many goodly images and right noble statues, wherewith Syracuse was adorned and beautified, even with the best and principal Cities of Greece. In token also of a victory over the Carthaginians, there were eight Elephants brought in a shew. And that which was not the least sight and spectacle to behold, Sofis the Syracusan, and Mericius the Spaniard went avor with crowns of gold upon their heads. The one of them was the guide when Syracuse was entered in the night before: and the other betrayed Nafos, and the garrison there. Both these were enfranchised Citizens of Rome, and had fifty acres of land a piece granted unto them for ever. Sofis had his land let out in the territory of Syracuse, which either belonged to the Kings, or to the enemies of the people of Rome, and a dwelling house (chuse where he would in Syracuse of all those that were seized upon by right of conquest.) As for Mericius and the Spaniards that with him fled from the enemies, and sided unto the Romans, they had assigned unto them a City to inhabit, and land to occupy in Sicily, which sometime belonged to them that had revolted from the people of Rome. And order was given to M. Cornelius for to appoint them the said City and land wherefore he thought good. And in the same territory there were allotted and set out four hundred acres of land unto Belligens, by whose means Mericius was allured and induced to leave the adverse part and turn to the Romans.

After that Marcellus was departed out of Sicily, the Navy of the Carthaginians disbarked eight thousand footmen, and three thousand Numidian horsemen, unto them revolted the Murgantine land, and Hybla, together with Magella and other small piles of base account, took example by them and followed after. The Numidians with their Captain Mutinus, ranged over all Sicily, and fired the towns and villages belonging to the associates of the people of Rome. Over and besides all this, the Roman army there, being discontented and angry, partly, for that together with their General,

And all, they were not licenced to go out of the Province: and partly, for that they were forbidden and debarr'd, for wintering in any good towns: demeaned themselves slackly and lazily in their military service: in such sort, as if there had been a head to lead them, as they had a heart to move them, they would have mutined and rebelled. Among these troubles and difficulties, M. Cornelius the Prator, both appeased and mitigated the stomacks of the souldiers, as well by comfortable words as by rebukes and checks: and also brought under his obedience and subjection, all those Cities which had revolted. Of which he according to the former act of the Senate, allotted Murgantia to the Spaniards, unto whom both a City and land to it was by order afore said. Both the Consuls who had the government of the Province Apulias, seeing there was less cause of fear and terror now from the Carthaginians and Ambal, were commanded to callstos between them for the Provinces of Apul and Macedonia. So Macedonia besell unto Sulpius, and he succeeded there instead of Levinus. Fulvius was sent for home to Rome, about the election of the Consuls. And when he held the solemn assembly of the people, for the choice and creation of the Consuls, the Century of the younger Citizens, which had the prerogative to give their first voice, declared T. Manlius Torquatus, and T. Otacilius for Consuls. Manlius being there present in place, when the multitude came about him to congratulate with God give you joy, &c. (for that there was no doubt, but the whole body of the people would approve this choice of the first Century) came with a great company about him to the tribunal seat of estate where the Consul sat: and made request unto him, that he would give him the hearing of some few words, and command that prerogative century which had given their voices to be called back again to a new scrutiny. And when every man was attentive, and expected what he should demand, he alledged for his excuse a pair of ill eyes. "For a shameless Pilot of a ship is he, and as impudent a General of an army (quoth he) who having to do all by other mens eyes, would require to have the goods and lives of other men to be put into their hands. And therefore may it please your honour to command this Century of the younger sort to give their voices anew, and in creating Consuls, to remember the war that is in Italy, to consider of the troublesome state of the Commonwealth, and to think of this, That scarcely yet mens ears have had any rest, since they resounded and rung again with the noises and alarms, that the enemies raised within these few months, when they lay in siege neer unto the walls of Rome. But after these words, when the said Century cried With one accord, that they were of the same mind still, and would nominate the same Consuls again, and none other: then Torquatus, "Neither (quoth he) shall I be able, if I were Consul to bear with your fashions and conditions, nor you again endure my rule and commandment. To the scrutiny therefore once again, and think how the Carthaginians war within Italy, and Annibal is the General of the enemies. Then the Century moved as well by the authority and reverence of the mans person, as by the applause and admiration of the people, who wondered at his virtue, besought the Consul to call forth and cite a Century of the elder band: for that they would willingly confer with more ancient men than themselves, and by their sage advice and good direction nominate the Consuls. When those elders were called to this Century, there was some time allowed for to commune apart secretly with them, within the place called Comitia. These ancient laid unto them, that they were to consult of three persons, whereof two already were full of honourable dignities, which they had born, to wit Q. Fabius and M. Marcellus. But verily, (say they) in case ye would have some new sort, to be choic'd, for to be opposed against the Carthaginians, ye have M. Valerius Maximus, a notable man, one who hath performed singular good service, and achieved many noble deeds, both by sea and land against King Philip. So when they had three propounded unto them, the elder were dismissed, and the younger entered into a second scrutiny: and declared for Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus (glittering then in the prime of his glory, for the late subduing and conquest of Sicily) and M. Valerius, who was absent. This freedom and choice of the prerogative Century, all the rest followed after, and by their suffrages confirmed. "Let them mock on now and scoff hereat all they that have nothing in admiration but antiquity and things done in elder time. For mine own part, if there be any such City and Commonwealth at all, consisting of wife men and Philosophers, as some great Clarks have rather imagined in their fancies, than found in effects: I dare be bold to think & say, that in it there could not possibly be either rulers and Magistrates more grave and temperate in their desire of dignity, and government, or a people better mannered, nurtured, and instructed. But that it should be thought an unlikely matter and scarce credible, that a Century of younger persons were willing to consult with the elder, and be advised by them, to whom they should give their voices, for to be created the chief Magistrates: it is the corruption of this our age that is the cause: wherein we see how small reverence and authority even parents themselves have, and of how slender and base account they be amongst their own natural children.

After this followed the Election of Prators, wherein were created P. Manlius Volsus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, C. Lestorius, and L. Cincius Alimentus. When this Election was finished, it was reported that news came, how T. Otacilius (whom the people, as it seemed, would have choic'd in his absence to match T. Manlius in the Consulship, but that the ordinary course of the election was disturbed and stopped) departed this life in Sicily. The Apollinare games in the former year had been exhibited: and when Calphurnius the Prator put up a bill, and moved the Senate, that they might be celebrated again that year also, there passed a decree, That they should be vowed to continue from time to time for ever.

The Oration
to the Consul.

" many Sicilians in the towns and villages near unto the City, backbiters and slanderers of him; who for his own part he was far off from hindring, but that they might freely for all him, divulgate and publish abroad in Rome all those crimes which were devised and spoken against him by his adversaries, that were it not that they pretended some fear forsooth, to charge the Consul with any matters, in the absence of his Collegue, he would straightwaies give them audience in the Senate: but so soon verily as my brother Consul is come home, I will not quoth he, I assure you, suffer any one matter to be debated here, before that those Sicilians be sent for into the Senate house, And I understand that M. Cornilius hath taken general leave like a mutter over all Sicily, to the end there might come a number to Rome with complaints of me: he also with letters full of untruths hath buzzed into all mens ears, and born the whole City in hand, that the war continueth still in Sicily, and all to diminish and abridge my glory. The Consul having that day won the commendation and name of one that knew how to rule and govern his affections diminished the Senat: and it seemed that there would be a general vacation not allow matters only, but of all other things & as it were holiday till, until the other Consul came unto the City. This rest and idleness (as the wonted manner is) let the Commons having nothing else to do, a talking: and now their tongues walked apace, ceasing not to spread rumours, That by this long and continuall war, not only the lands and territory about the City of Rome (especially where Annibal had marched with his cruel army) were wasted, but also Italy was in a manner dispeopled and laid desolate, by reason of so many multiers and levies: complaining, that whole armies were defeated and put to the sword at Canna in defence of the Common-wealth: and that there were two Consuls created, both martial men, and warriors, over-free and eager of fight, in as time of peace and quietness were able to find occasions of war: solitude was it to be looked for at their hands, that in time of war they would seek for peace, and suffer the City to have any breathing time and intermission. These speeches rumoured among the common people were interrupted and staid by occasion of a Scarfe fire that began in sundry places together about the Forum, in the night of that day, which was immediately before the festival daies of Minerva, called Quinquaginta. At one and the selfe same time the seven merchants shops and ware-houses, which afterwards were turned into five, and the shops of the Bankers and money changers which now are called Nove, (or the new-shops) were on fire. Divers private mens houses also the fire caught; for as then there were no stately Halls and Palaces of the City there built. Likewise the fire took hold of the common prison, called Lavinia the Fifth market hall likewise, and the royal gallery or walking-place. Hardly could the Chappell of Vesta be saved, and that by the good help and pains-taking especially of thirteen bondslaves; whose bondage was bought out at the Cities charges, and they made freemen. The fire continued one night and a day: and no man made doubt, but it came by mans hand, and was the practice of some lewd persons; for that the first began in many places at once, and those far distant asunder. Whereupon the Consul by the advice and direction of the Senat, made proclamation in a solemn assembly of the people, that whoever would come forth and give notice by whose means that fire was procured, he should be well rewarded: if he were a free-man, with a piece of money; if bond, with freedom. In hope of which recompence, a certain slave belonging to the Calpurnii the Campans, (his name was Manius) was induced to bewray the matters whom he served, and five other young Gentlemen of Capua, whose fathers had lost their heads by the commandment of Q. Fulvius. Those he appeached to have made the said fires: and he gave them a warning besides, that they intended to do more mischief about the City, if they were let alone, and not apprehended: so they were attached, and their household servants. At the first, these persons made light account both of the informer, and the information they made, and elevated the credit that was given thereto: alledging that the day before the party himself being chastised and scourged by his Masters, ran away, and so upon an anger and pique did devise (by occasion of this misfortune which was meer casual) to frame an accusation against his masters. But when the matter was overred to their teeth in open place, and that they, by whose ministry the feat was done, were in the midst of the Forum put to the rack for to utter a truth, then they all made confession of the fact. So as well the Masters that were the setters thereof, as the servants that were privy and accellary thereto, had their defenses, and suffered for it. The informer who disclosed the villany, was made free, and had 20000 siles for his labour.

As the Consul Levinus passed by Capua in his journey [homeward,] there flocked about him a number of Campans, and besought him with tears, that they might have leave to go to Rome, and present themselves before the Senate, there to make suit (if it haply there were any pity and commiseration in them) not to destroy them utterly, nor suffer Q. Flaccus to consume the name and generation of the Campans from off the face of the earth. " Now Flaccus for his part denied flatly that he bare them any private grudge by malice: but only hated the Campans as those common enemies to the state, and so he would do ever so long as he knew them to ill affect: as they were to the people of Rome; for there was not a nation upon earth, nor a people under heaven more spitefully & deadly bent against the Roman name than they were. And that was the cause (saith he) that he penny them up within their walls. For whoever of them changed any way to make an escape, they ranged about the country like brute and savage beasts, running, scaring and killing whoever came in their way. Some of them are fled to the adverse side unto Annibal: others are gone to Rome to set fire on the City, and there (quoth he) shall the Con-will find the market place half burned, and the very points and tokens remaining fresh of the Campans mischievous practices. There should he see that they minded to have done violence upon the Chappell of Vesta and to have put out those eternal fires, and utterly defaced the fardle of the Roman Empire, bestowed and laid up there in the most secret place of the Chappell. Neither thought he it was safe for the City to permit the Campans to come within the walls thereof. Then Levinus having called the Campans to take a corporall oath, and swear unto Fulvius that they would make return to Capua before five daies were expired, after they had their answer and dispatch from the Senate, he commanded them to come after him to Rome. Attended thus as he was with his company, he encountered the Sicilians also, who came forth to meet him, and with this multitude he entered the City, accompanied (as say) with the Campans and Sicilians, both vanquished and subdued by war, and victors of two most famous persons, Marcellus and Fulvius, who had conquered two most noble and renowned Cities, Syracusa, and Capua.

But both the Coll created and consulted first with the Senate about the state of the Common-wealth, and the government of the Provinces: There Levinus related in what terms Road Macedonia and Greece: the Aetolians also, with the Acarnanians and Locrians; likewise what acts he had achieved in those parts both by sea and land; and how he had repulsed Philip back into Macedonia, when he began to make war upon the Aetolians, who now was retired and gone into the utmost parts of his Kingdom: so as the Aetolians might be withdrawn from thence; for that the Armado was sufficient to keep the King forth of Italy. Thus much spake he of himself, and of the Province whereof he had been governor. Then both Consuls in common, propoied unto the Senat, concerning the Province. And the LL. decreed that one of the Consuls should take the charge of Italy, and of the war with Annibal; and the other should have under his hand the Armado, whereof L. Octavius was the Admiral; and together with L. Cincius the Prator govern the Province of Sicily. They were allowed the two armies which were in Tuscan and in France, consisting of four legions: whereof two of the former year, that were of Citizens should be sent into Tuscan; and those two which the Consul Sulpicius had conducted, should be led into France. Moreover that he should have the government of France; and the leading of the Legions there, whom that Col. would appoint. whole lot it was to have Italy for his Province. Into Tuscan was C. Calpurnius sent, with Commission after the term of the Pratorship expired, to have his full jurisdiction to continue for a year. Likewise to Q. Fulvius was assigned the keeping of Capua, and his rule prorogued for another year. The armies, as well of Citizens as of Allies, were by commandment of the Senat abridged and made less, so that for two legions there should be but one, and that consisting of five thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen: that they should be discharged of soldiery who had served longest: that of Allies there should be let seven thousand foot, and three hundred horse: with the same respect and consideration of service in dismissing the old soldiery. As for Cn. Fulvius the Consul of the former year, he took the same Province of Apulia still, without any alteration of his forces: only his government was continued unto him another year. And P. Sulpicius his Collegue, was commanded to send away all his army, only the mariners and sailors excepted. Likewise order was given that so soon as the new Consul was arrived and landed in the Province of Sicily, the army there, which was commanded by M. Cornilius, should be sent out of Sicily. Unto L. Cincius the Prator were assigned the soldiery that remained after the defeat at Canna, for to keep Sicily in order, and those arose to two legions. And as many legions were appointed for P. Manlius Vols the Prator, for to go into Sardinia, even those whereof L. Cornilius had the leading in the same Province the former year. As for the legions of Citizens, the Consuls were enjoined to levy and enroll them so, as they entertained no soldier of all those who had served in the army, either of M. Claudius, or M. Valerius, or Fulvius: nor exceeded the number that year of one and twenty legions of the Romans. When these Acts were passed in the senate-house, the Consuls cast lots for their severall Provinces, Sicily and the Armado fell to Marcellus: Italy and the war against Annibal, to Levinus.

This lot that fell to Marcellus so struck the Sicilians dead, (who stood in the presence of the Consuls, looking for the event of the lottery) as if Syracusa had been lost again: in such sort, as their pitifull lamentations, and their wofull plaints, for the present turned all mens eyes upon them, and none after ministred cause of much speech and talk. For they went about to alledge Senators from one to another in poor and vile array, protesting, " That if Marcellus came amongst them again as L. Deputy, they would not only forsake every man his own country where he was born, but also abandon the whole Island of Sicily: complaining that without any desert of their parts, heretofore he had been cruelly bent against them, and his hatred was irreconcilable: and what would he now do in his choler, and knowing that the Sicilians came to Rome of purpose to make complaints of him? The Island were better (say they) to be on a light fire to burn with Etna; or to be all a very ice, than thus to be exposed as a prey unto a mortal enemy, for to be devoured. These grievous moans and piteous complaints of the Sicilians fast carried to the houses of the Nobles and great men of the City, and there taken up and much talked of by many, whiles some pitied the Sicilians, others envied Marcellus, spread abroad at length for, until they came to the Council-Table. And the Consuls were dealt withal, to Propoie unto the Senat, that they might exchange their Provinces one for another. Then Mar-

E The other Consul in the mean time, put to question the demands of the Sicilians before the LL. Much canvassing a long while, and discussing there was of the matter, and divers opinions paid. Many of the Senators following T. Manlius Torquatus the head and principal man, that maintained a free, were of this mind, "That they should have made war against the tyrants; the continued enemies as well to the Syracusans, as to the State of Rome. And as for the City, it was (say they) rather recovered and received, than won by force: and being so received, it was to be re-established in her own ancient laws and freedom, and not after it was so wearied with "miserable servitude, to be scourged and afflicted with war upon it. But between the warring of "the tyrants of the one side, and the Roman General of the other, a most beautiful and noble City, "standing in the midst (as a prize and reward for the winner) is undone by the means; even that City which (sometime had been the garner (as it were) and the Treasure-houle of the people of Rome: by the munificent liberality and bounty whereof, by whose rich presents and goodly gifts "our City many a time and oft, yes, and but of late dayes in this Punick war, hath been relieved and adorned. If King Hiero should arise again from the dead and come among us, Hiero (I say) the most faithful maintainer of the Roman Empire, with what care could we thew unto him, either Syracuse or Rome? When he should seee of one side, his own native country, half railed and wholly "spoiled: and on the other side, coming to Rome, in the very entring of the City, and hard at the "gate, should behold the spoils of his own City? Notwithstanding these and such like speeches call out among them, to procure ill will and hatred to the Consul, and to move pity and compassion to the Sicilians; yet the LL. of the Senat in favour of Marcellus, agreed upon a milder decree, and so enacted, That whatsoever he had done, either during the war, or after conquest, should be justified and allowed for good: Item, for the time to come, the Senat would take order and provide for the good of the Syracusans, and give the Consul Lavinus a special charge, to have regard of the welfare of that City, to far forth, as might not be prejudicial to the State of Rome. Then were two Senators sent into the Capitol to the Consul, to request him to repair again unto the assembly of the Senate: and after the Sicilians also had admited into the place, their act and decree aforesaid was openly read. The Embassadors had good words given them, and were dismissed: whereupon they fell down prostrate at the feet of Marcellus the Consul, beseeching him to pardon that which they had spoken, either to bewail, or to ease their calamity; and to receive both them in particular, and the City of Syracusa in general, unto his merciful protection. After this, the Consul with gracious words licensed them to depart.

When the Sicilians had their dispatch, the Campanians had audience given them in the Senate and as their speech was more lamentable, so the cause was heavier, and harder to be digested; for neither could they themselves deny, but that they deserved condign punishment: nor Tyrants had they any, upon whom they might lay the blame. But they thought they had suffered enough for their sins already, in that so many of their Senators died by poison, and so many lost their heads. Some few of their nobility and but a few remained yet alive, who as they were not touched in conscience, nor so faulty, as to lay violent hands upon themselves, so the Conqueror in his furious wrath, adjudged them not worthy of death: they therefore made humble suit for themselves, their wives and children, to obtain freedom, and to enjoy some part of their own goods, being as they were, mere citizens of Rome, and most of them by affinity and near kindred, upon mutual and cross marriages, linked in alliance and blood to the Romans. After that they also were willing to void out of the Senat house: for a while, there grew some question and doubt, whether Q. Fulvius should be sent for from Capua (for presently upon the taking of the City, Claudius the Consul died) that this matter might be argued and discussed in presence of the General himself, like to the other had been reasoned of and debated between Marcellus and the Sicilians. But afterwards when they saw in the Senat house M. Arilius, and C. Fulvius, the brother of Flaccus, both his Lieutenants: likewise Q. Minucius, and L. Veturius Philo, Lieutenants unto Claudius, who had been present in all actions, and were eye-witnesses of every thing; and besides, were unwilling that either Fulvius should be called away from Capua, or the Campanians longer delayed: M. Arilius Regulus, who of all them that had been at the service of Capua, was of greatest authority and reputation, being demanded his opinion, spake in this wise.

"I take it (quoth he) when Capua was newly won, I was one of Counsel with the Consuls there, when question was asked, and enquiry made, Whether any one Campanian had deserved well of us and our Common-wealth. And found it was, that two women only, to wit, Vespa Oppia, born in Atella, but dwelling then at Capua, and Fanula Clodia, sometime a common strumpet and courtesan, were well willers unto us. The former of these twain daily sacrificed for the welfare, life, and victory of the Romans; she other, secretly sustained the poor and needy Roman captives with food and victuals. As for all other Campanians, from the highest to the lowest, they were no better affected unto us, than the Carthaginians. And even those, who were beheaded by Quintus Fulvius, suffered death, not because they were more faulty than others, but for that they were of greater mark and calling than the rest. Now, that the Senate should decide the cause of any Campanians, who are enfranchised denizens of Rome, without a grant from the people, I see not how it can be. For in our fore-fathers time the like case was of the Satrians that rebelled: and then M. Anisius, a Tribune of the Commons, first put up a bill, and the Commons afterwards passed it, namely, That the Senat might have power and authority to give their opinion, and determine of the Satrians. Therefore I am of mind, that we deal with the Tribunes of the Commons, that one or more of them, prefer a bill unto the Commons, by vertue whereof we may be authorized to set down some order for the Campanians. Then L. Arilius, a Tribune of the Commons, by leave and advice of the Senate, propoied unto the Commons a bill in this form and manner. Whereas the Campanians, Atellans, Calatins, and Sabellans, who have yielded themselves unto Fulvius the Pro-consul, to be at the pleasure and devotion of the people of Rome: all that also, which they have surrendered together with themselves, as well their territory as their City, as all men, both sacred and profane, and their necessary implements, and all other things whatsoever, I demand your will and pleasure. O. Quirix, what shall be done with the premises? The Commons after deliberation, gave their voices to the said bill in this form. Our will and pleasure is, that whatsoever ye the Senators, who now are set in Council, or the most part of you think good and determine, shall stand for first and last. Upon this grant or Act of the Commons, the Senat by a decree awarded unto Oppia and Lucia, first their own goods and liberty: and moreover if they were desirous to crave farther reward at the Senates hand, they were left to repair unto Rome. For every family and several house of the Campanians, there were special acts and decrees made, all which to repeat and rehearse, would not quit the labour. Some had their goods confiscated: their wives, their Children and Wives were to be sold, excepting those their Daughters which were wedded, before that they came under the subjection of the people of Rome. Others were to be kept up in Prison, until farther order were taken for them hereafter. Moreover, of some Campanians they made distinction by valuation of their wealth, whether their goods were to be confiscated or no. All their beasts and cattail which were taken, save Horses; all their bond-slaves, but males fourteen years of age and upward, all moveable goods also which were not annexed to and salted to the soil, they awarded for to be restored to the true owners. All Campanians, Atellans, Calatins, Sabellans, excepting those, who either themselves, or whose parents took part and sided with the enemies, they judged to be free: provided always, that none of them were either Free-denizens of Rome, or of Latium. Item, it was enacted, that none of all them who had been at Capua whilst the gates were shut, should remain either in the City or territory of Capua, within a certain day prefixed: but should have a place set out unto them for to dwell in, on the farther side of Tyberis, so it were not upon the very bank close unto Tyber.

A Tyber. As for those that during the time of war had been neither at Capua nor in any other City of Campania, which revolted from the people of Rome, they should be removed to inhabit on this side the River Lyris between it and Rome: but (such as were turned and passed to the Romans side, before that Annibal came unto Capua, they should be transplanted on the hither side of Volturnus the River: provided, that none of them should possess either house or Land within fifteen miles of the Sea. As concerning them who were displaced and confined to inhabit beyond the Tyber, neither they nor their heirs and successors for ever, should purchase and hold house or Land in any place, but in the territory either of Veii, Surium, or Nepesinum: but so, as they exceeded not the limit of five hundred Acres of ground. As touching the goods and chattels of all the Senators, of such as had born Magistracy in Capua, Atella, or Calatia, they awarded that sale should be made thereof in Capua. As for those that were free born, and whole bodies were to be sold, they should be sent to Rome, and there set at sale. Finally, the Images and Statues of bras, which were said to have been won and taken from the enemies, whether they were sacred or profane, they referred to the College of the Priests and Prelates, to determine thereof at their discretion. Thus they gave the Campanians their dispatch, and sent them away much more afraid for their decrees, than they were when they came first to Rome. And now they complained no more of the cruel proceedings of Q. Fulvius against them, but blamed the iniquity and unjust dealing of the very Gods, and their own cruel fortune together.

After the Sicilians and Campanians were dismissed, there was a muster taken: and when an army was levied and enrolled, there began some question and reasoning about the mariners and Rowers to furnish the Gallies. For the accomplishment whereof, when the Consuls could neither raise men enough, nor yet find money at that time in the Chamber of the City, for to presse and hire them, and pay their wages withal: they published an edict, that private men according to the rate and proportion in the Subsidy book, out of all orders, degrees, and companies, should as aforesaid find Rowers at their own charges, and maintain them with meat and money for thirty dayes. Upon which Edict and Proclamation, all men so grumbled and muttered, and were so highly discontented and angered, that they wanted an head and Captain, rather then matter and occasion of a mutiny and insurrection: giving out, "That the Consuls had taken a course, and were in the very train to plague, undo, and destroy the Commons of Rome, like as they had already the Sicilians and the Campanians. For thus many years they have been pulled, polled, clean spent and consumed with exaction of tributes, and had nothing left them but the bare ground, and the same lying wait and untilld. As for their Houses upon their Lands, the enemies had burned: their servants and bonds, such as should husband and till their grounds, the Commons-wealth had bereaved them of: one whilst buying them up to the war, for some small piece of money: other whilst levying and pressing them to the Seas to be Gally-slaves, for a thing of nothing. A man could not so soon get one bras farthing, or single silver denier before-hand, but it went by and by either for Gally-pay, or for yearly Tribute. And to give that now which they had not, they might never be brought by any force or for any mans commandment whatsoever. Let them sell and make an hand of their goods, imprison and punish their bodies too, when all is gone besides: seeing there is nothing left them to ransom and redeem the same again. These and such like words were not only muttered in huggenugger, but uttered aloud and given out in broad terms even in the market-place and before the Consuls, by the multitude that flocked and gathered together in exceeding great numbers: in such sort, as the Consuls were not able with all that ever they could do, to appease the mutiny, neither by sharp rebukes, nor fair words and comfortable speeches. Then they said, that they would give and allow them three dayes respite for to think and consider of these matters: which they themselves bestowed wholly and employed in taking a view and survey of their goods, and making dispatch and ridance thereof out of the way. The next day the Consuls called the Senat together to consult about the supply of Rowers and Gally-slaves: where, after much debating and arguing, that the Commons had good reason to make denial; at length the drift of all their speech was this, "That whether it were right or wrong, the burden mult lie on privat mens shoulders, there was no remedy: forseeing there was no money in the common chest, how should Mariners and Rowers else be gotten and levied? And without Arraunces, how possibly should either Sicily be held (still in possession, or Philip be kept out of Italy? or the Sea coasts of Italy remain in safety and security? In these distresses and difficulties the Council being perplexed, and to seek for remedy; and whilst every mans wits were in the wan and so confused, as if they were benumbed and stone cold: Then Livius the Consul, as the Magistrate (quoth he) goeth before the Senat in place of honor, and the Senat likewise before the common people in worth and dignity: so they ought in all difficulties and hard occurrences to undergo the weightiest burdens first, and be the Foremen and Leaders in all dangerous adventures whatsoever. For if a man would enjoy his interiors to bear some grievous and heavy load, let him first take it up himself, yea and impose the same upon his own train and company: all the rest then, will be more willing and obedient to follow after, and do the semblable. And never will they grutch at any cost or charges, when they see their Leaders and Rulers take more upon themselves, than they are well able to wield and sustain. To the end therefore that the people of Rome may be provided and furnished of a fleet rigged and trimmed, as our desire is, and that private persons may not think much, nor refuse to find Rowers thereunto; let us first that we here command our own selves: let us,

Livius the Consul.

"I say, that be Senators, bring abroad in common all the gold, all the silver, all the brazen coin
 "that we have, so as every man relieverings only for himself, his wife and children; and a little
 "tablet or Jewel for his son, as a pendant to hang about his neck. Also let all them that have wives "or daughters, retain still one ounce weight of * gold, and * one pound of silver: And as many as "have born office of State, and sitten in the Ivory Chair, keep still the trappings and caparison of "their Horse, and two pound weight a piece, the one of gold, the other of silver: for to have a "Salt-seller, and a little boll or cup, to sacrifice and offer unto the Gods withal. As for the rest of "the Senators, let us leave them but one pound weight of silver, and no gold at all, and five thou"sand * Asses in coin, to every household a piece. "All other gold, silver, and brazen money be"sides, let us forthwith bring abroad and present unto the Triumvirs or publick bankers, before "that we make or enact any decree of Senat: to the end, that our good example in this volum-
 "ary benevolence and contribution, and our earnest endeavour to help the Common-weal, may "sit up and provoke the hearts and affections, first of those that are by calling Gentlemen, and "Knights of Rome, and then forward the rest of the commons, to imitate and follow us with "some emulation. This is the only means which we that are Consuls have thought upon and de"vised, after much talk and conference together. Set to therefore, my masters, in the name of "God, and lead the way: God will bleis your good beginnings. So long as the City standeth
 "on foot, and holdeth up the head, no man need to fear his private State; but it shall do well "enough. Go the weak publick to wreck once, and decay, let no man ever think to save his "own. All the whole house liked so well of these motions, that not only they gave their accord
 "and consent thereto, but over and besides, yielded hearty thanks unto the Consuls for their good "advice and counsel. When the Senat was dismissed, every man for himself brought forth his gold,
 "his silver, and braise money, and laid all together in common: and that with such speed, striving
 "a vie who could go before another, and have his name entered first in the publike Rolles and Regis"ters: as neither the foresaid Triumvirs were able to receive it fast enough, as it was tendered un-
 "to them: nor the ordinary Clerks and Notaries to let it down in writing, and take note thereof "accordingly. This consent and agreement of the Senators, the Knights and Gentlemen of Rome in "their place and calling seconded; and the commons for their parts were not behind. So without "any constraint of law, without edict, without any exhortation made by the Magistrate, the com"mon-weal waited neither Rowers for to furnish the armadoes, nor money to pay the Rowers.
 "And thus when all things were provided necessary for the wars, the Consuls went forth to their "several Provinces.

"Never was there any time of this war, wherein Carthaginians and Romans together, had "more trial of the alternative and variable change of fortune: never hung they more in equilib-"rantes, between fair hope and fearful danger. The Romans, in their Provinces talked both of "sweet and sour. In Spain on the one side, they sped ill and lost: in Sicily on the other side, they "sped well and won: so as their sorrow was interlaced still and mingled with joy. Also in Sicily,
 "the losse of Tarentum turned to their woe and damage: but the keeping of the Castle there with "the garrison, beyond all their hope and expectation, brought them joy and comfort for their sor"row. Also, their suddain fright and fear, for the siege and assault of the City of Rome, was raised "and cured again within a few dayes after, by the forcing and winning of Capua: and all that be-
 "wines and mourning turned into mirth and gladness. The affairs also beyond Sea, were checked "with interchangeable turns and courtes. Philip became their enemy in all time, and when "they had little need thereof. Contrary-wise, the Ætolians and Attalians the King of Asia the less,
 "proved to be their new friends and loving allies: whereby even then fortune, seemed to smile on
 "the Romans, and by that overtur, promised as it were, unto them the Empire of the East.
 "Sensibly the Carthaginians, as they lost Capua, so they won Tarentum, and made a saving "game of it. In like manner, as they took no small pride and glory, in coming to the walls of Rome
 "without resistance; so they were danted and dismayed again, that this their enterprize took no bet"ter effect in the end: and held themselves much disgraced and dishonoured, that whilst they "sat themselves before one gate of Rome, there was an army of Romans led forth at another, and N
 "sent into Spain. And even in Spain also, the greater hope men had there, that upon the death "of two so noble and valiant Generals, and the des... of two as puissant armies, the war was "come to a final end, and the Romans driven from thence for ever: the more spight it was, and "the greater grief and vexation they conceived again, when by the valour of L. Marcius a tumultu-
 "ary Captain, chosen in halt they knew not how, those former victories turned to vanities, and "chance to just nothing. Thus fortune was indifferent, and all things doubtful and wavering in in"sufficiency, both on the one side; and the other. Their hope all one as it was at first; their fear, the same
 "still, neither more nor less: So as between hope and fear, they taried, as if the war at this time "were new to begin.

"Annibal above all other things, was vexed to the heart, that Capua, being more hotly and "eagerly assaulted by the Romans, than manfully and faithfully defended by him, had diverged "and turned away the hearts of many States of Italy from him. For neither was he able to hold "them all with sufficient garrisons, unless he would dismember into many small portings, and mangle
 "by piece-meal his army: which to do then, was no good policy: nor he thought it stand good,
 "to withdraw his garrisons from thence, & leave the fidelity of his allies at liberty, either to depend "upon sickle hope, or to sway with suddain fear. And (as he was by nature covetous and cruel-
 "ly ly minded) he resolved at length upon this course, to make spoil of those Cities which he was not "able to keep, and to leave them wast and empty for the enemy. This designment was not dis"honest and shameful in the first enterprize, but it proved as bad and hurtful to himself in the "effect and conclusion. For he lost the hearts clean, not only of those that were the parties grieved, "and suffered these indignities, but also of all others besides. The present calamity and losse touched

 "but some few: but the precedent and example reached to many more. Neither was the Roman "Consul behind hand for his part, to sollicite and sound those Cities, from whence he saw some "light appear, and any hope to gain them unto him.

"There were in Salapia two noble men above the rest, Dafnus and Blafus. Dafnus was friend to "Anibal, Blafus (so far as he might with safety) affected and favoured the Romans. And by enter-
 "B course of secret messengers, had put Marcellus in some good hope of betraying the City; but "without the help of Dafnus the plot could not be compassed and effected. Wherefore, after much "musing and long deliberation, after many stayes and delays, at length he resolved (for want rather "of better counsel, than upon any hope to speed) to address himself to Dafnus, and acquaint him "with the matter. But Dafnus not only misliking utterly and abhorring the thing, but also carrying a "secret enmity to the party himself, the only eye-sore and concurrent that he had, striving to be "greater than he, disclosed all to Anibal. Whereupon, both were sent for, and convened pec-"remptorily before him. As Anibal was sitting upon the Tribunal seat, giving audience and dis"patch to certain other matters; and that he might anon the better attend unto Blafus and the at"tention intended against him: whilst the plaintive and defendant stood apart by themselves from the "C rest of the people a good way, Blafus went in hand again with Dafnus, and solicited him for to "deliver the City to the Romans. With that Dafnus (as if the matter had been too too apparant) cried
 "out and said, I that he bashed not to break unto him and move him, even in the presence and sight
 "of Anibal, for to practise treason and betray the City. Anibal and all they that were there pre"sented, gave little credit unto Dafnus: and the more audacious the thing it felt was, the less likely-
 "hood it carried with it of a truth. Every man supposed verily, it was nothing but emulation, envy, "and enkindled malice, that caused Dafnus to charge upon him that crime, which because there was "no witness to the contrary, he might untruly devile and more freely endeavour against him. And so "for that time they were both discharged the court. But Blafus never gave over to follow till this "bold enterprize, but beat still upon this one point, shewing how good and commodious the thing
 "D would be, both to themselves in private, and to their country in common, until he had wrought "him to, and won him to grant, that the Carthaginian garrison, (and those were Numidians) to"gether with the City Salapia, should be rendered unto Marcellus. But without much bloodshed they "could not possibly be thus betrayed and delivered: for they were the most hardy and valiant horse"men by far, of all the Carthaginian army. Wherefore, albeit they were taken on a suddain unpro-"vided, and had no use of Horses within the City, yet with such weapons, as in such a suddain tu-
 "mult and upurce they could catch and come by, first they assayed and gave the venture to break "through and escape a way: and when they saw that they could by no means save themselves and "get forth, they fought it out to the last manfully, even unto death: so as there were not of them a"bove fifty left alive, and came into the hands of the enemies. And surely, the losse of this corner of "B Horreum, was a greater damage unto Anibal, than the forgoing of Salapia: for never from "that day forward, had Anibal the upper hand in cavalry, which was the only service whereby "ever before he most prevailed.

"Much about the same time the Castle of Tarentum was streightly distressed for want of victu"als, and hardly could endure and hold out any longer. The only hope that the Roman garrison "had, which lay there, and the Captain thereof M. Livius the Constable of the Castle, was in the "provision sent out of Sicily. For the safe convoy whereof, along the coast of Italy, there rid at "anchor a fleet welnear of twenty sail before Rhegium. The Admiral of this fleet appointed to "wait these victuals from time to time, was one Decimus Quinius, a man of old time birth and bala-
 "perance, howbeit, for many worthy acts and feats of arms, much renowned in martial "plogy.

"At the first he had the charge but of five ships, whereof two of the greatest, which were three-"banked Gallies, were allowed him by Marcellus: afterwards, upon his good service, when he had "burn himself bravely in many conflicts, he had three more committed unto him, and those were
 "of five banks of oars, until at last himself, by calling upon the confederat Cities, as Rhegium,
 "Q Velia, and Patium, for the ships due by covenant unto the people of Rome, he had made a pretty "Armado, as is above said, of twenty sail. As this fleet had disanchored and was gone from *Rhegi-
 "um*, Dimocrates with the like Armado for number of Tarentin ships, encountered almost two "legues from the City of Tarentum, at a port called Sacratorium. It fortuned at that time, that the "Roman Admiral, little looking for any battle, came forth under sail only, but about Croton and
 "Q Sibarie, he had furnished his ships with Rowers also, and so his fleet for the bigness and talness "of the Vessels, was well appointed, and sufficiently armed and manned. And even then it hap"ned at once, that both the docterous wind lay, and the enemies also were within kenning,
 "so they had scarce time enough to fix their tackling, to make ready their Rowers, and to let in "under their fighting men, against a skirmish that was to next toward. There was not lightly seen
 "a greater conflict, fought more hotly and fiercely between two royal Armadoes that affronted
 "one another, than between these small fleets. For why, the battle was for a greater matter, than all their ships came to. The Tarentins maintained the fight more eagerly, because they were desirous to recover their Cattle out of the Romans hands, as they had done their City, almost two years almost, during which time, they had been out of the possession thereof: hoping thereby, if they could be masters of the Sea once by some fortunate and victorious battle, to cut off and intercept all hope of victuals from the enemies. The Romans on the other side belittled themselves as lustily by keeping the possession of the Cattle, all the world might see, that Tarentum was not lost by force, clean strength and valour, but betrayed by stealth and treachery. So they founded the battle from both parts, and ran affront one at another, with the beaks and stems of their prows, and neither staid rowing main forward, nor suffered their enemy to part or go aside from them, until they clofed and grap'd their ships together, by the means of iron hooks like hands. And to neerer they buckled, in hot and furious fight, that not only they discharged shot aloof one against another, but also they coped together (as it were) foot to foot, at hand strokes with sword and spear. Their prows and fore-ships stuck graped together, while the poops and hind-decks were driven about with contrary oars of the adverse part. So neerer and so thicker withal flood the ships and within so narrow a room, that scarce one dart light into the water in vain, and did no harm. With their beak-heads they assailed one another, as it had been on land fight, and so close they were, that the soldiers might pass out of one ship into another, as they fought. Howbeit, two ships there were above all the rest, that maintained a notable fight, and in the vanguard and forefront of the battle, invetted one another most furiously. In that of the Romans was Quintius himself in person, and in the other of the Tarentins, was Nico, surnamed Perce, a man not only odious unto the Romans, for the publick quarrel between both states, but also maliciously bent, upon a private spite and rancour, as banishing with that faction, which had betrayed Tarentum to Anibal. This Nico elysing Quintius both fighting and also encouraging his men withal, charged him at unawares, and ran him quite through with a pike: who was not so soon slain forward headlong upon the fore-deck, armour and all, but the Tarentin following the train of his victory, and seeing the ship disorderly to defend and keep the poop and hind deck: with that, another gally of the enemies appeared on a sudden, and charged the hind-part. So the Roman ship in the midst between both, was boarded on every side, and taken. Whereupon all the rest were greatly terrified, seeing the Admiral-ship was won by the enemy; and they fled on all hands. Some were sunk in the deep sea, some made halt with their oars, and scudded to the land, but anon were a prize and prey to the Thurins and Metapontins. But of the Huls and Caricks, which were fraught with victual, and followed after, very few there were that fell into the hands of the enemies: the rest shiking and turning their sails cross, this wayes and that wayes, according to the inconstancy of the wind, recovered the main Sea.
 "their

But about Tarentum at the same time, their fortune was nothing so good. For whereas there went out of the Town upon a four thousand men a foraging, for to purvey corn, Livius, Constable of the Cattle and Captain of the Army, spying his time (as he waited ever for all opportunities) made out of the said Cattle a thousand soldiers, under the leading of C. Perius a valorous and industrious man: who let upon the Tarentins stragling out of order, and dispersed in wandering wife over the fields: and after he had followed a long time the execution, killing them here and there as he encountered them; the rest, which were but few left of so many, he chased to the Tower: for they made halt in great fear thither, and were let in at the gates standing half shut, for fear lest at the same random the Town should have been lost. So the Tarentins and Romans, when they had made the reckoning, put up all on even hand. For the Romans were winners by land, the Tarentins at Sea: and both of them disappointed alike of their hope of corn, which was presented to their eyes, but they never tasted thereof.

At the same time Levinus the Consul, after a good part of the year was gone about, arrived in Sicily, greatly expected and looked for, as well by the old allies as the new: and the first thing of all other and most important, he supposed, was together with this new peace, to settle and compose the State of Syracusa, so much disordered and out of frame. After that, he led his legions to Aggrigentum, where only there remained the reliques of war: which City was kept by a strong garrison of Carthaginians. There fortune favoured his first designs. Hanno chanced to be the General over the Carthaginians, but he wholly relied and reposed all his hope in Mutius and the Numidians. This Mutius had ranged all over Sicily at his pleasure, and raised booties out of the territories and Lands of the Roman associates, and by no force or policy could he be intercepted of his passage back to Aggrigentum, nor yet be pinned within the City, but that he would issue forth whenever he listed. This glory of his, because now it checked (as it were) the fame and honour of the General, turned the man at length to displeasure and danger: so as, what good service soever was achieved, it was never well taken by Hanno, nor joyously accepted, in regard of the person, who was a prick always in his eye. Whereupon in the end he gave away the Captainship of Mutius from himself, and bestowed it upon his own Son: thinking, that together with his government and command, he should lose all his authority and reputation also among the Numidians. But it fell out far otherwise. For the more that he was in disgrace and disfavour with Hanno, the greater grew the old favour and love of the Numidians toward him.

Neither

Neither could he himself endure any longer the unworthy wrong and indignity offered unto him: and therefore in revenge he presently dispatched certain secret messengers unto Levinus, with credence, that he would betray and deliver Aggrigentum into his hands. By the mediation of these intercouriers, there passed sufficient security and assurance between them: and the matter being concluded, the manner also of contriving the plot, was agreed upon. Whereas therefore the Numidians were possessed, and had the guard of that gate that openeth toward the Sea: after they had either driven out the old warders from thence, or killed them, they let in the Romans at the same gate into the City, who were sent of purpose, according to the former agreement. And when they marched up into the midst of the City, even to the market place, with banner displayed, and with great tumult and noise; Hanno supposing it was nothing else, but a tedious uprising of the Numidians (like as they had done sometimes before) came forth as to appease and stay a mutiny and commotion. But discovering a greater multitude afar off than the Numidians were: and hearing withal the Romans to shout, with the manner whereof his ears had been well acquainted before time, he took him to his heels ere he came within the dart-shot. And being let out at a back postern gate, taking with him Epicides, he recovered with some few other the Sea side, where, as good hap was, they light upon a small bark or pinnace: and so leaving Sicily to the enemies, for which there had been much strife so many years together, they passed over into Africa. The multitude besides both of Carthaginians and Sicilians, without any skirmish either began or intended, fled like blind men they wist not whither: and finding all ways made up, and no passage forth, they were miserably slain and hewn in pieces about the gates. Levinus being possessed of the City, caused all the chief men and rulers of the City, to be beaten with rods, and to lose their heads: all the rest together with the pillage he sold in port-sale, and the money that was raised thereof, he sent to Rome.

When the news of this misfortune of the Agrigentins was blown over Sicily all at once, turned Roman, and Anibal lost all. For in short space there were 40 Towns betrayed and yielded, six forced by assault, and to the number of 40 voluntarily surrendered to the devotion and protection of the Romans. The principal noble men of which States, after that the Consuls had either rewarded or punished according to their several demerits, and compelled the Sicilians generally to lay by arms and weapons, and to take themselves to the plough, for to cultivate and sow their grounds; to be that the land might bring forth fruit, not only to sustain and maintain the natural inhabitants thereof, but also to ease the price of corn and victuals in the City of Rome, and throughout all Italy, like as it had done many times before: he transported over with him into Italy a rabble and damned crew of unruly people from Aggrigna. Some four thousand there were of them, a confused multitude of all sorts, a very multimash and sink, dunglily of vile and wretched persons, most of them Outlaws, Bankrupts, and notorious malefactors, in danger of death by the laws of their Cities where they lived. And being led their countries, some for one law, some for another, they chanced all upon like fortune to lose themselves (as commonly birds of a feather will fly together,) and at Aggrigna, they made choise like outlaws, to live by robbing and spoiling: and this was their only profession and trade. Levinus thought it no good policy to leave behind him these good fellows in an Island, which began out how upon new peace to knit and unite again: for fear lest they would minister matter of innovation and change; and besides, there was some good use of them among the Italgians, for to forage and rove about the Brutians country: for such they stood in need of, and had laid for a company which were acquainted with theevings an Italgian. And so this year made an end of the war in Sicily.

P. Scipio L. Deputy and General in Spain, having in the prime and beginning of Spring put his ships to Sea and set them afloat, and by an edict summoned all the allies at the allies to repair to the Rendezvous at Taracum; gave order and commandment, that as well the ships of war as of charge and burden, should from thence set forward, and shew themselves at the mouth of the River Iberum. And after he had given direction and charge, that the legions from out of their winter harbours, should there meet together, himself accompanied with five thousand of his sives put himself on his journey to his main army. Being thither come, he thought it good to make some speech to the old soldiers especially, as many as remained alive after so great defeats and overthrowes, and when he had attended them all together to an audience, in this wise he spake unto them. "Never was there new General before my self, that could by good right, and in regard of desert, render thanks unto his soldiers before he had employed them, and made trial of their good service. But as for me, before I ever came within sight of this Province, before I entered my government and saw the camp, fortune hath obliged me, and made me beholden unto you. First, for your kindness and zealous affection to my father and to mine uncle, both while they lived, and when they were dead. Secondly, in that when the possession of this Province was lost; after so great toils and overthrowes, ye have by your virtue and valour recovered the same again, and kept it entire to the behoof of the people of Rome, and my self, the next successor in place of sovereign rule and command. But forasmuch as myself purpose and present resolution is, by the leave, favour, and power of the Gods, not so much to hold the possession our selves and abide in Spain, but to dispose the Carthaginians that they may have no footing nor abode at all there: and since the thing that we go about, is not to stand keeping the bank of Iberum, for to stop the passage of the enemy; but to give the attempt o pass over our selves by force: yes, and therewithal to transport the war over with "us into his own country, and to come home unto him. I fear me greatly, lest this will seem "unto some of you a greater deſignment, and more auſpicious enterprise of mine, than may ex"pect ſuit and ſort with the freſh remembrance of thoſe late defeats, or ſtand well with my young "and unripe age. The foils and unfortunate foughten fields in Spain, can be of no man in the "World forgotten later than of my ſelf, whole father, whole Uncle, were within the ſpace of "30 dayes there ſlain, to the end that ſorrow upon ſorrow, funeral upon funeral, one mournful "death after another, ſhould unfortunately be heaped upon our houſe and family. But as this de-"ſolate eſtate and deſect almoſt of all my houſe and name (wherein I only, in manner, am left alive

 "of my race) wounderh my heart and makes it bleed, as often as I think of it: To the publick ſor-
 "tune and virtue of the Common-weal, reviveth my ſpirit again, and will not ſuffer me to de-"ſpair totally of the ſtate of this Empire: conſidering the deſtiny and Providence of the Gods,
 "whereby it is a thing given unto us, and our luck hath ever been, that howſoever we have receiv"ed overthrow in all great wars and dangerous battails, yet in the end, we have gone away "with the victory. I omit to ſpeak of old examples, of Perſena, of the Gauls, and Samnites; and "I will begin at the Punick wars. How many armados and fleets, how many brave Captains, "how many valiant and puſſant armies were there loſt and murthered, during the former? And "what ſhould I ſay of this in our dayes? In all the defeats and overthrows, I was either preſent
 "my ſelf in perſon: or if I were not in any of them, yet I am ſure, I was he that felt the ſmart of "them, more than any man elſe whatſoever. The River Trebia, the mere Thraſymenus, the Town
 "Cannæ, what are they elſe, but the very ſepulchres and tombs of the Roman armies there been "in pieces, and of their Conſuls ſlain. And thereto, the general revolt of Italy, the rebellion of "Sicily, the falling away of the greater part of Sardinia. Moreover and beſides, this laſt alſright
 "and terror; namely, the Carthaginians camp pitched between Anno and the walls of Rome, and "Annibal ſeen well near, as conqueror at the very gates of our City. In theſe ſo great ruins and "adverſe diſtreſſes of our ſtate, yet the virtue alone and valour of the people of Rome hath ſhown
 "upright, ſound, and immutable; yea, and hath raiſed up again and ſet on foot, all that which lay
 "along on the ground. You only, my valorous ſouldiers, were the firſt, that after the diſcomſure
 "of Cannæ, under the leading and good fortune of my father, withſtood Aſdrubal in his journey and "expedition toward the Alps, purpoſing to go down into Italy; who if he had joyned with his "brother Annibal, certainly by this day, there had remained no memory of the Roman name.
 "And in very truth, theſe affairs falling out ſo proſperouſly, made amends and recompence for all "the former loſſes. But now through the goodneſſe of the Gods, all things proſper and go well "forward: and the affairs of Italy and Sicily both, mend daily, and are every day better than "other. In Sicily, Syracuſe and Argentine are won and wholly ours: the enemies be driven "out of all the land, and the ſtate is reduced into the form of a Province, ſubject to the people of "Rome, and under their obedience. In Italy, the Town of Arpi is recovered by ſurrender, the "City of Capua is forced by aſſault. Annibal himſelf, having meaſured all the way, (but inſer-
 "full halt and in manner of a ſlight) as long as it is from Rome to the Brutians country (in high
 "Calabria) is there driven up into the furtheſt angle and corner thereof, nothing moe willing "and praying for at Gods hands now, than to be able to retire and get away ſafe out of his ene"mies Land. What thing then were leſſe beſeeming, my hardy ſouldiers, than ths. If you who "have ſuſtained and upheld the decaying and down-falling eſtate of the Roman Empire in this "Province, you (I ſay) together with my two parents (whom for the reverence that I owe to "them, give me leave to make equal, and to honour with that name) at what time as calamities
 "and loſſes, hapned ſuddenly one in the neck of another, and the Gods themſelves ſeemed to ſake
 "part and ſtand with Annibal: ſhould now let fall your courages and be faint-hearted, becauſe in "theſe Provinces aforeſaid, all things go well to our hearts deſire and great contentment. As for "the late miſfortunes and adverſities which have hapned here, would to God they had paſſed over "without ſorrow, as well of my part, as of yours. But for the preſent, the immortal Gods, Prote"ctors and Governors of the Roman Empire, who inſpired into the minds and hearts of all the "Centuries, to wiſh and chule me to this place of foreign honor, even the ſame Gods by augu-
 "ries and ſuſpices, by all tokens of the birds either by flight or ſight, yea, and by viſions alſo in the "night ſeaſon, do portend, ſignifie and promiſe unto me, all good ſpeed and happy ſucceſſe: yea "and mine own mind giveth me, (which ever hitherto, hath been to me the trueſt prope-
 "and never deceived me) that all Spain is ours; and that within ſhort time the whole Punick name
 "nation, being expelled and driven out from hence, ſhall fill all Seas and Lands with their flame-
 "full and diſhonorable flight. That which my ſpirit and ſoul of it ſelf preſageth, the ſame doth bear"ſon alſo conclude by moſt certain and infallible demonſtration. The allies and ſubjects here of "the Carthaginians, oppreſſed and wronged by them, have humbly by their Embaſſadors craved
 "our aid and ſuccour, The Captains General of their forces, being at difference and odds all three "among themſelves, inſomuch as they had like to have departed and revolted oneſt from the other,
 "have diſtracted and diſmembred their forces into three parts, and beſetwined them in three ſeveral
 "all countries, moſt removed and diſtant aſunder. And no doubt, the like fortune is ready to fall "upon their heads, which lately was our undoing and overthrow, upon the ſame occaſion. For "even as we before were forſaken of the Celtiberians, ſo are they now abandoned of their allies.
 "Beſides, they parted and divided their armies aſunder: which was the only cauſe, that brought "the utter ruin and deſtruction upon my father and uncle. And be ye ſure, that their intestine
 "diſcord

A "diſcord and diſſention, will never ſuffer them to joyn friendly and unite again in one. And thus "ſingled as they are, they cannot poſſibly withſtand our puſſance. Now my ſouldiers, for your "part, do but favour the name of the Scipios: do but affect and love me, the iſſue and off-ſpring of "your noble Generals, budding forth again (as it were) out of the old ſtock, cut down to the root.
 "Go to, old ſouldiers, and redoubted ſervitors, with bold couraſe ſet over the River Iberus a new "army and a new Captain: paſs over with them into thoſe Lands, which ye have often conquered,
 "and wherein ye have achieved many valiant and memorable acts. And for my ſelf, I will ſo
 "endeavour and effect, that as ye now agnize in me, the reſemblance of my fathers and uncles vi-
 "ſage and countenance, the ſame feature, proportion, and lineaments of the body: ſo I will ſhew
 "and repreſent unto you, the true picture and portraiture of their ſpirit, wit, faithfullneſs, and ver-
 "tue, even as the expreſs and lively image taken and drawn from their own ſelves is juſt ſuch, as "every man may ſay, That Captain Scipio is either riſen from the dead, or new born again. Hav"ing by this Oration, incited and inflamed the courages of his ſouldiers, and left Syllanus with a "guard of three thouſand foot, and three hundred Horſe, for the defence of that coaſt; he tranſpor-
 "ted over the River Iberus, all the reſt of his forces, amounting to the number of five and twenty "thouſand foot, and 25 hundred Horſemen. There he was adviſed by ſome about him, ſeeing the "Punick armies were departed into three countries ſo far remote and diſtate aſunder, to ſet upon
 "and aſſail that which was next: but he doubting and fearing leſt by that means he ſhould draw
 "them altogether, and knowing that he was not able alone, to match and make his part good with ſo
 "many hoſts at once, determined in the mean while, to be doing with new Carthage, and to beſiege
 "C and aſſault it. This City, as it was rich and wealthy in it ſelf, ſo it was full of all the enemies furniture "and provision for war. There was their armour kept, there was their money laid up, there re"mained the hoſtages of all Spain. Beſides, as it was leaſed commodiouſly to croſs over from thence
 "into Aſſyria: ſo it flood upon a convenient and large haven, able to receive and harbour the greateſt
 "navy on Sea. and the only haven (if I be not deceived) of all that coaſt and tract of Spain, which "boundeth next upon our Sea. But no man was made privy to his determination, or knew whither
 "they ſhould take their journey, ſave only Lalium. He being ſent about with the armado, had di"rection ſo to temporize and guide his courſe by ſail and oar, that at one and the ſelf ſame inſtant,
 "both Scipio might preſent his Land forces in the view of Carthage, and the fleet enter the haven.
 "So they departed from Iberus, and within ſeven dayes came before the City of Carthage, both by Sea "and Land. His camp he pitched on the north ſide of the City: which he entrenched and fortified
 "on that outward back-part, that flood fartheſt from the City: as for the forefront, it was by natural "ſituation of the ground, defended ſufficiently enough. For the ſtreit of Carthage is in this ſort. There is a "gulf or creek of the Sea, in the middle coaſt and river well neer of Spain, oppoſite moſt to the "South-weſt wind, running & retiring in length within the Land half a mile, out lying out in breadth "ſomewhat more. In the very mouth of this creek, there is a little Iſland from the open Sea; which "ſerveth ſheltereth, and defendeth the haven from all other winds, but only the Southweſt. From the "innermoſt nook of this bay, there beareth out a promontory like a demy Iſland, which is the very Hill or "Cape whereupon the City is built. The ſame on the Eaſt ſide and the South is compaſſed with the "Sea: from the Weſt, it is enſealed with a lake or ſtanding mear, which alſo ſpreadeth ſomewhat
 "toward the North, of an uncertain depth: which altereth according to the tide, and as the Sea ei"ther ebbereth or floweth. Now, there is an elbow or bank of firm ground, ſomewhat leſſe than a quar"ter of a mile over, that joyneth the City with the main or continent. To that ſide (notwithſtand-
 "ing it had been no great piece of work there to fortiſie) the Roman General caſt no trench, nor
 "traiſed any rampier: either upon a brave and haughty mind, to ſhew the enemy how confidently he "ruled in his own ſtrength; or becauſe, whenſoever he advanced to the walls of the City (as "often times he took occaſion ſo to do) he might have open recourſe and regrets again into the camp.
 "But when the utter ſide, which required fortifications, was finiſhed, he let the ſhips in order with"in the haven, making a ſlew, as if he would beſiege them alſo on the water ſide. And when he had "gone through all his armado, and given the Captains of the ſhips in charge, to look well to their "Centinels and watches in the night (for that commonly enemies at their firſt beſieging, make what "attempts and adventures they can in every place) he returned into his camp. And becauſe he "would not only yield his ſouldiers good reaſon of his diſſignment, in that he began war firſt
 "and principally with the beſieging of that City: but alſo encourage them, and put them in good "hope of the winning and conquelt thereof, he aſſembled them together, and diſcourſed before "them in this manner,

"My valiant ſouldiers and truſty friends, If any man here thinketh, that ye are brought hither
 "to aſſail a City only, and there an end: he rather maketh reckoning of your preſent pain and "travel, than caſteth the profit and commodity thereof enſuing. For ye ſhall in very truth give "the aſſault to the walls but of one City: but in that one City ye ſhall be matters and conque"rors of all Spain. Here lie the hoſtages of all their Nobles, their Princes, and States. And no
 "ſooner ſhall ye be Lords of them, and have them in your rule and cuſtody, but preſently, all that "now is under the hands of the Carthaginians in Spain, will be ſurrendered unto you, and as "your devotion. Here is all the money that the enemies have: without which, like as they are not "able to maintain war, (as who wage and entertain all their armies for pay) ſo it will mightily
 "aſſeſs us (if we light upon it) in gaining the hearts of the barbarous people. Here are their engines "and artillery, here is their armour, here is their tackling and provision for their navy, and all of Scipio to his

was a mighty mass brought unto the General. Golden cups or bowls there were 270; every one weighing almost one pound. Of silver-tyers, wrought, and coyned, 18300 pound weight: and much plate and vessels of silver. All this C. Flaminius the Treasurer, received either by weight or tale. Of wheat there was 40000 Modii, of barley 29000. Of barks and ships of burden, there were in the haven by force, and taken, 123. Some were fraught with corn, armour, brails, beads, and iron, sail-cloth, and hemp, or part for cables and ropes, also with timber for ship-weights. Carriage the Town it self, in so great store of wealth and warlike provision, was the least of all other.

That day Scipio, having committed the charge of guarding and keeping the City unto Laelius and the mariners, brought back the legions into the camp, and commanded the soldiers to refresh their bodies with food and rest, wearied as they were, and over-laboured in one day with all manner of toil and work that belongeth to war-service: as who, had both fought a battle in the field, and also taken to great pains, and undergone so much hazard and danger, in assaulting and forcing the City, yea, and after it was won, had fought with disadvantage of ground, with those that were fled into the Castle.

"The next day, after he had called both soldiers and mariners together, first he rendered laud and praise, yea, and thanks unto the immortal Gods, who in one day had not only made him Lord of the most mighty and wealthy City in all Spain, but also had laid up for him there against his coming, all the riches well-near of Africk and Spain: whereby as the enemies now had nothing left them, so he and his had all things plentiful. Then he commended the virtue and valour of his soldiers, whom neither the falling out of the enemies could fright, nor the mighty height of the walls scare, nor the blind and untired foorde of the lake could once dismay, nor the situation of the Castle seated upon an high cliff terrific, nor yet the Castle it self most strongly built and fortified, was able to daunt and make afraid, but that they would pass over all and break through all. And therefore albeit every one of them deserved at his hands all rewards, yet the principal honour of a mural crown and garland, belonged properly unto him that first scaled and mounted over the wall. Come he forth therefore (quoth he) and shew himself, who taketh himself worthy of that gift, and let him claim his due. Whereupon there were two that put in for it, and demanded the same, Q. Trebellius, a Centurion of the fourth Legion, and Sex. Digius, a Servitor at the Sea. Neither stirred these parties themselves so hotly about the matter, as the love and favour of them set all the whole army divided into legionary soldiers, and servitors at Scipio, in heat of contention, to labour for him that belonged to their side, and was a member as it were of their body. C. Laelius Admiral of the fleet, went with the Sailors and Seamen. M. Sempronius Tudianus was altogether for the legionary Land-soldiers. This debate was like to breed a schism, and to raise a very mutiny in the host. Whereupon Scipio pronounced that he would appoint Delegates three Commissioners, to sit upon the cause who should take the deposition of witnesses, and give their verdict accordingly, whether of these two persons entered over the wall first into the Town. Now because C. Laelius and M. Sempronius were Advocates to the one party and the other, he therefore adjoynd unto them a third person, one P. Cornelius Caninius, to go as an indifferent Mediator between them two: and gave order and commandment, that those other three commissioners above said should sit together, and hear and determine the controversy. When the matter grew to a greater heat of contention, by reason that men of such mark and worth, were acquainted with the action, and had their hand in it, who were not so much Advocates to plead, but moderators and judges to bear down a side; C. Laelius, rising out from the court, came to the Tribunal seat unto Scipio: and informed him that the manner of proceeding in this matter in question, was without all good order, modestly and reverence; and so handled, that they were like to go together by the ears, and try it out by knocks. But, be it, quoth he, that no blows be dealt, yet it is a most shameful example and detestable precedent, that the honour and guard due to virtue, should be carried by fraudulent cover and ungodly perjury. For, quoth he, the legionary soldiers stand of the one hand, the Sea-servitors on the other, and ready they be to swear on both sides all the oaths of God, and to that rather which their will and affection carrieth them N to, than which in their conscience they know to be true. By which guilt of forswearing and perjury, they will not only bring a curse and vengeance upon themselves and their own lives, but also upon the ensignes, standards, and very Eagles, yea, and their religious military Oath and Sacrament. Thus much I thought good to give you advertisement of afore-hand, and that by the advice of P. Cornelius, and M. Sempronius. Scipio after he had highly praised Laelius, called the soldiers to an assembly, and there with a loud voice pronounced, and said thus: I am sufficiently informed upon certain relation, that Q. Trebellius, and Sex. Digius scaled the wall both together, and therefore I award as well to the one as to the other a mural garland, in token and testimony of their singular virtue. Then he rewarded the rest also, according to every mans desert and valorous service. But above all other, he honoured C. Laelius Admiral of the fleet, not only in matching him equally with himself in all commendable parts and qualities, but also in presenting him with a coronet of beaten gold, and thirty Oxen. Then he gave commandment that the hostages of the Cities and States of Spain should be called forth. What a number were of them, I am amazed and loth to set down in writing: for almost as I find in some Chronicles, that they were upon some three hundred, in others 725. The like variety there is of other matters: amongst sundry writers; One writeth that the Punick garrison were ten thousand: another 7000, and

A and a third comes with his two thousand, and no more. I meet with one record which reporteth, that there were 10000 taken prisoners: and another, that there were above 25000. Of Scorpions or Crossbows, great and small, I should say there were gained some 60, if I would talk for mine author Silenus, a greek writer: but if I follow Valerius Antias and go by him I should tell you a tale of six thousand of the greater sort, and thirteen thousand of the smaller. See how little rule they had of their tongues to over-reach, or flay of their pens to set down so loud lies upon record. Nay, they are not well agreed so much as upon this point, who were the great Captains and Commanders. Most of them say, that Laelius was L. Admiral: there be again that would have M. Junius Syllanus to be the man, and Armet was Captain of the Punick garrison, and yielded to the Romans, if ye list to believe Valerius Antias: but by the testimony and credit of others, it was M. Ige. Moreover, the records accord not about the number of ships that were taken, nor of the weight of gold and silver, nor yet of the sum of money that was raised of the pillage. To conclude, if we must needs believe some one or other the mean between is the best, and carrieth most likelihood of the truth.

But to return again to Scipio: "When he had called forth the hostages into his presence, first he "bad them all in general to be of good cheer: for why? they were now in the hands of the people of Rome, who ever desired to bind men unto them by favours and good turns more than to "awe them with fear and dread: and to have forraign nations knit and joyned in faithful amity, "rather than held in subjection by heavy servitude. Then after he had taken the names in writing of their several Cities, he also reviewed the number of the prisoners, and counted just how many belonged to every State. Which done, he dispatched messengers home into their countries, willing their parents and friends to come and receive every man their own, lithely any Embassadors of their Cities were present, he restored unto them their own hostages without delay: for all the rest, he gave express charge to C. Flaminius the Treasurer to see into them in all kind, courteous, and liberal usage. Whiles he was busie in taking this order, there hapned to come from among the hostages, even out of the midst of the company, an aged gentleman, the wife of Mandanius, brother to Indibilis, a Prince and great Lord of the Illegretes. "She shed tears, and "fell down prostrate at the feet of the L. General: and withall began to beseech him most instant-ly, to give a more special charge, concerning the custody of the women-folk: and to recommend "them to their keepers, for to be guarded with a careful eye, and to be kept and attended on "more tenderly. Why? quoth Scipio, I warrant thee good woman, they shall want for nothing "that is meet for them. Then replied this Dame again, We stand not so much (quoth she) upon "these terms: for a little thing God wot, may serve and content them in this poor estate and low "condition: my care is for another matter, when I consider and behold the young and tender "age of these maidens here, as for my self, I am now past date, and without danger of that injury, "which our sex is subject and exposed unto. Now there stood about her the daughters of Indibilis, virgins in the fresh prime and flower of their age, and passing fair and beautiful withall: besides some other Ladies as nobly born as they: who all honoured her as their natural mother that brethem. Then Scipio, "I would (quoth he) in the ordinary course as well of mine own discipline "as of that which is established by the people of Rome, have a respective consideration, that no "one thing among us should suffer abuse, which elsewhere in any place of the world is held inviolable: this would I do, I say, for mine own credit, and for the honour of Rome: but to have a "more special eye that way, your own virtue also and worthiness bindeth me: who in the midst "of these your calamities and miseries have not forgot your womanly carriage and the honour of "your sex. And thereupon he delivered them over to the custody of a man of approved honesty and integrity, commanding him to guard them with no less reverence, modesty, and continency, than if they were the wives or mothers of their nearest friends that gave them entertainment. After this, there was presented unto him by his soldiers a damsel and virgin of ripe years, taken also prisoner: but so well favoured and surpassing in beauty, that whereforever she went every mans eye was upon her, in admiration of so rare and perfect a creature. Scipio having enquired of her country where she was born, and likewise of what parents she was descended: among other things learned, that she was espoused and affianced to a young Prince of the Celtiberians, whose name was Alucius. Forthwith he sent home to her parents and forefathers, for to repair unto him: and in the mean time he understood that her husband that should be was wonderfully enamoured of her and ready to die for her love. So soon as the young Gentleman was come, Scipio entered into a more familiar speech with him, than he did either with the father or mother of the maiden, and in these terms he entertained him: "I am a young man (quoth he) as well as your self. Come therefore, let us young men both devise and commune together more freely, and "be not too nice, coy, and bashful one to the other. After that your espoused wife taken captive "by my soldiers, was brought unto me, and that I heard of the exceeding fame and affection "that you cast upon her, I believed it full well: for her singular beauty deserveth no less. Now for- "asmuch as my self, if I might be allowed to use the pastimes of youth, (I mean no otherwise than "in honest and lawful love) and were not called away by the Common-weal, & employed wholly "in other affairs of state, I would think to be pardoned and held excused, if I had an extraordinary liking to a spouse of mine own, and loved her extremely. Inmut therefore needs favour and "tender your love, which is the thing I can, considering that I may not the other in any wise. Your "sweet-heart and best beloved I have entertained as well, and as respectfully, as she should have

"been with your father and mother in law, who are her own kind and natural parents. Reserved she hath been, and kept for you alone, that you might receive her at my hands, unspoiled and untouched, and a present becoming me and you both. In lieu and recompence therefore of this boon and gift which I now bestow upon you, I require at your hands again this only promise and faithfull covenant, that you will be a friend and well-willer to the State of Rome. And if you take me indeed to be a good and honest man, such as these nations and people here have known my father and uncle to have been before me: know you thus much, that in the City of Rome there are many more like unto us: and that there cannot at this day a nation in the world be named, which you would with less to be an enemy to you and yours, or desire more to entertain as your friend. The young Gentleman being abashed for very modesty, and yet right glad and joyfull withall, held Scipio by the hand, called upon all the gods, and bestowed them in his behalf to thank and recompence him therefore, since it lay not in his own proper power, in any proportion or measure to be thankful and make requital, either as himself could wish, or as Scipio had deserved. Then were the parents and kinsfolk of the maid called for: who seeing the damo-sell freely rendered and given them again, for whole ranome and redemption they had brought with them a sufficient sum of gold, fell to entreating and requesting Scipio to vouchsafe for to accept the same at their hands, as a gift and token of their good will: assuring him, that in so doing, they should take themselves no less bound and beholden unto him, than for the restoring and delivering of the virgin untouched and undefiled: Scipio seeing them so earnest and importunate, promised for to receive it, and withall, commanded that it should be laid down at his feet: and calling Alucius unto him, "Here (quoth he) over and besides all your other dowry which you father in law must pay you, have from me thus much more money to mend your marriage with, take this gold therefore to your self, and keep it for your own use. And to alter this rich reward given, and great honour done unto him, he was dismissed and departed home with much joy and hearty content: where he made report unto his countrymen and people of the praise-worthy virtues of Scipio, and the favours from him received; saying moreover, there was come into Spain a young man resembling the immortal gods in all respects: who as well by bounty, liberality, and bestowing benefits, as by martial prowess and force of arms, is in the very way to win and conquer all. So when he had assembled and mustered all his vassals and tenants, he returned within few daies, accompanied with a train of fourteen hundred of the best and most choice horsemen of his country.

Scipio keeping Lælius still with him, until by his advice and counsel he had disposed of the captives, hostages, and other prizes and pillage: after he had feiled all in good order, appointed a Gallace of five banks of oars, wherein he embarked the prisoners, with Adongo and some fifteen Senators besides, who together with him were taken, and sent them to Rome with a messenger, to carry tidings of this victory. Himself determined to journey a few daies in Carthage, which time he spent in training and exercising his souldiers, as well of land service as at sea. The first day he caused the Legions to run to and fro in their armour four miles out in length. The second day he commanded them to scour and furnish their harness and weapons before their tents. Upon the third day they joyined and encountered in battel-wise, and practised to fight with blunt wasters and battons: yea, and lanced one at another darts and javelins, rounded at the point end with m-bals in manner of foils. The fourth day they rested and repoied themselves. On the fifth day again they ran at tournament as before armed. This order they kept, exercising, labouring, and reining by turns, so long as they abode at Carthage. And thus much for the Legionary souldiers. The sea-servitors and mariners used in calm water and still weather to row up into the sea, and there to make trial of the nimbleness and agility of their ships, representing shews of sea-fight and skirmish. Thus without the City, they endured their bodies, and quickened their spirits and courages both on land and water. Within the town there was nothing heard but preparation of war-furniture. All the publique shops and work-houses full of smiths, engineers, and all other artificers for the purpose, plying their work, and never going from it. The General himself, as supervisor, with equal and indifferent care oversee all. One while he would be with the Armado in the harbour: another while, he conversed among the Legions, and turneyed with them. At time he would set for to visit the works about the walls, and see how they went forward. Otherwhiles he would be in the shops aforesaid, among the multitude of the Carpenters, and Smiths, and other Artizans, viewing what they did there: and in the srenal and ship-docks, observing and marking how much they went forward day by day, striving by way of emulation as they did, who could do most and quit himself best. Having thus set them a work, repaired the walls which he had battered and shaken, and placed certain guards there, for the defence of the City: he took his journey to Tarcon: and all the way he was vined and plied with sundry embassages. Some of them he answered and dispatched as he was in his journey: others he put off, to give their attendance at Tarcon: for thither he had summoned all the allies and confederates, both new and old, to meet him. And in manner, all the Cities and States on this side Iccrus, and many also of the farther Province of Spain there assembled.

The Carthaginian Captains and Commanders at the first of set purpose, suppressed and stopped the rumour of the winning of Carthage. But when the thing was too too apparent, & could not be hidden, and smothered, they used all the words they could to elevate it, and make the matter less than it was. To wit, "That by a sudden invasion and expedition of the Romans in one day

(as it were) by stealth, it chanced that one of the Cities of Spain was surprized: that the insolent and foolish young man bearing himself prodigally proud, and jocund beyond all measure, would seem to make up the measure: so to small a catch that he had got, with a great shew of a brave victory: but when he shall hear once that there are three Generals coming toward him, and three victorious armies of enemies, he will soon pull in his horns: he will then tell us another tale, when presently he shall call to remembrance with grief of every vain in his heart, the death of father, of uncle, and other progenitors. These and such like speeches they gave out among the people and common sort, knowing in their own conscience what a blow they had caught, and how much their strength was decayed by the loss of new Carthage.

The seven and twentieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the seven and twentieth Book.

C NENT Fulvius the Pro-Cos. was slain, and with his army utterly d. feared by Annibal at Herdonea. But Cl. Marcellus, the Cos. had better fortune in a battell against him before Numidia. From whence Annibal dislodged and departed by night. Marcellus pursued after him, and over as he fell off, followed him hard still, until he gave him battell. In the former fight Annibal had the better; but Marcellus in the later, Fab. Max. the father being Consul, had the Tarentine yield up unto him by treason. In Spain, Scipio fought a battell with Adrubal the son of Amilcar, at Betula, and won the field. Among others there was a boy taken prisoner of royal blood, and of incomparable beauty: whom he sent with rich gifts unto Mafanida his uncle by the mother. Claudius Marcellus and T. Quintius Crispinus the Consuls, who chanced to go out of their Camp to discover, as usually, the country, were foretold by an ambush of Annibal, and entraped. Where Marcellus was slain: Crispinus fled. This book containeth also the wars and exploits achieved by P. Sulpitius the Prætor, against Philip and the Achæans. The Consuls held a solemn survey and numbering of the Citizens, and purged the City. In which survey there were found of Roman Citizens 137,108. By which Account it was seen, how many the people of Rome had lost, by the adverse fortune of so many battells. Alidrubal, who with an army had passed over the Alps for to join with Annibal, was slain, and with him 56000 men besides, by the conduct of M. Livius the Consul, but not without the equally good service of Cl. Nero the other Consul: who being appointed to make head against Annibal, left the Camp so, as the enemy was not ware thereof, and with an elect power of hardy men, environed and enclosed Alidrubal about, and so defeated him.

The seven and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

THIS stood the affairs in Spain. In Italy the Consul Marcellus having recovered Salapia by composition, won by force two towns from the Samnites, Maronea and Mela. Where there were slain three thousand of Annibal his souldiers, who had been left there in garrison. Some good portion of the pillage was shared among the souldiers. Of what besides there was found there 240000 measures called Modii, and of barley 100000. But the joy from hence was not so great as the loss and damage received within few daies after, nor fat from the City Herdonea. Cn. Fulvius the Pro-Consul lay there entangled upon hope to regain that City, which after the defeat at Cannâ, had revolted from the Romans: a town neither feared in a place of safety, nor yet well furnished and manned for defence. The Captain thereof (Cn. Fulvius aforesaid) was by nature ever negligent, but grown much more reckless now, presuming upon a vain hope that he had of them within, in that he perceived how the townsmen already began to fail in their devotion and faithfull allegiance to the Carthaginians, especially, after they heard, that upon the loss of Salapia, Annibal was departed out of those parts into the Brutian country. Annibal had intelligence of all this brought unto him from Herdonea by secret messengers, which, as it caused him to have a careful eye into the saving and keeping of a friend City, so it ministered good hope unto him for to surprize his enemy at unawares and unprovided. Whereupon with his army lightly appointed, he took long journeyes and made haste to Herdonea, so as he prevented almost the same and bruit of his coming. And to strike the more terror into his enemy, he thither marched in battell array. The Roman Generall, as adventurous and bold as he every way, but footing at all by politick, nor so strong, brought his forces forth in more haste than good speed, and gave him battell. His fifth legion, and the left wing, or corner of Cavalry began the skirmish, and charged hotly. But Annibal had given his horsemen direction that when the Infantry was in the midst of skirmish, with mind & eye wholly occupied that way, they should wheel about and fetch a compass, and whiles some of them assailed the Camp, the rest should play upon the back of their enemies: himself iterating discourses unto his men the name of Cn. Fulvius for likeness sake, because two years before in the very same quarters, he had vanquished another Cn. Fulvius who was Praetor also, assured them of the like success now in this conflict. And verily this conceit and hope of his proved not vain and frustrate. For when as in close fight and skirmish of the footmen many of the Romans were slain down and slain, but so, as yet the ranks stood unbroke, and the ensigns upright, behold a sudden secta charge of the horsemen on their back, and a great shout of the enemies withall decried and heard from the camp, first discomfited the first legion, which being marshalled in the second battailon had been put in disarray before by the Numidians, & then the fifth, & so consequently even those that fought in the forefront of the vanguard before the ensigns. Some fled mainly, others were killed in the midst between, where Cn. Fulvius himself with twelve Tribunes of Knight marshals were left dead in the place. Of Romans and Allies how many died in that conflict, who is able to set down for certain: seeing in some records I find the number fifteen thousand, and in others not above ten thousand?

The conqueror Annibal was Master likewise of the Camp and all the pillage there. As for the town Herdonea, because he understood for truth, that it minded to have revolted unto the Romans, and would not continue fast in their fidelity, if his back were once turned: after he had conveyed away the multitude of the inhabitants to Metapontum and the Thurians, he set it on fire and burnt it quite. The Nobles and principal Citizens, who were known to have had secret talk and conference with Fulvius he put to death. The Romans, who out of so great an overthrow escaped, made shift by divers and sundry waies to flee, half naked as they were, to Marcellus the Consul, Sammium. But Marcellus nothing dismayed and affrighted at this so great defeat, addresth his letters to the Senat at Rome, with advertisement of the loss of the Captain General, and the army at Herdonea: giving them yet to understand how himself even he who after the Cannian field had tamed and damed Annibal, as luty and proud as he was upon that victory, was minded presently to encounter him, and make him take no long joy and pleasure, wherein he now lay vained and exalted himself.

And at Rome verily, as they mourned much for the loss past, so they feared as greatly the future dangers. The Consul having passed out of Sammium into the Lucans country, late downed Numistro, in the very sight of Annibal, and there in a plain encamped himself, notwithstanding the enemy was possessed before of the hill, and had the vantage of the ground. And for to make more show of his own confidence, and how little he feared, he first brought forth his men, and marshalled them in order ready to bid battell. Annibal so soon as he saw the ensigns advanced forth of the gates, staid not behind. And they arranged their battels in such manner, as that the Carthaginians with the right wing took up part of the hill, and the Romans displayed their left wing in length, to the very walls of the town. After they had continued fight from the third hour of the day unto night, and that the vanguards on both sides were weary with maintaining of skirmish so long: then the first legion of the Romans, with the right wing of their horsemen the Spanish soldiers also of Annibal his part, the Balearian slingers likewise, together with the Elephants, began the fight, whilst the rest were already in hot conflict, and close together. For a long time the fight thrunk nor of any hand. The first legion of the Romans was seconded with the coming in of the third: and among the enemies likewise there came in new soldiers that were lusty in place of the soiled and wearied. Whereby of a lingring and long skirmish there began all on a sudden a new, hot, and cruel battell, by reason that their courages were fresh, and their bodies in heart. But the night parted the fray, and left the victory doubtful in the midst. The morrow after, the Romans from sun-rising stood arranged in the field untill it was far day: and seeing none of the enemies appear and shew themselves, they fell to gather up the spoils by leisure, and heaped up in one place all the bodies of their own men that were slain, and made one great fire, and burnt them to ashes. The night ensuing Annibal dislodged secretly without any noise, and departed unto Apulia. And Marcellus, so soon as day-light discovered the flight of his enemy, leaving his hurt and wounded people at Numistro with a small guard, and L. Furius Purpurio a Colonel to be their Captain, followed him by his steps, and at Penusia overtook him. There for certain daies passed some sallies from the guards of both armies, whilst both horse and foot one with another rather made slight skirmishes, than any set battels: and lightly the Romans had always the better hand. From thence the armies were conducted through Apulia, seeking some memorable fight at all, by reason that Annibal in the night season ever set forward, leaving some opportunity of forelaying and entrapping his enemy: and Marcellus never followed but in broad day light, and sent out his espials before to clear the coasts.

In this mean while Flaccus spending the time at Capua, in making port-sale of the noblemen's goods, and in setting and letting out to farm the land which was confiscated and forfeit to the common wealth of Rome (and all for a rent of corn) there happened a new complex and practice which lay hidden for the time, to be detected and come to light, to the end that he might never want any matter or other to take occasion for to plague and torment the Campanians. He had taken order that his soldiers should remove out of the houses within the town, partly for that as well the remembrance of the laid town within as the lauds without should be renewed forth: and partly for as much left the exceeding pleasant and delectable seat of that City should esteem his army, as it had done the host of Annibal before time: and commanded them to build themselves about the gates and along the walls; cottages and sheds in warlike fashion, and only to serve for soldiers. These were most of them made of hurdles and boards, some walled and wined with reeds, and all of them thatched with straw and stubble, as it were of purpose to minister fuel for fire. Now there were some hundred and seventy Camps had conspired at one certain hour of the night, to set all a fire: and the principal heads and Captains were certain brethren of the Bluffs: and it turned that by some of the same house and family the conspiracy was disclosed. Whereupon at once the gates were made fast by the commandment of the Pro-Consul: and the alarm being stricken up and sounded all the soldiers ran together. All those that were party or privy to the intended treason were apprehended, and after rigorous examination had by torture, they were condemned and executed: the informers were made free, and had each one a reward of a thousand pieces of brals called Astres.

When the Numidians and Aferians made moan that they wanted place of habitation, forasmuch as Asura was in part burnt, and Nuceria utterly razed and destroyed: Marcellus relieved them over to the Senat of Rome, and sent them thither. The men of Asura had leave granted to re-edify against their own edifices which were burned: But they of Nuceria, according to their own design, were translated to Atella, and the Atellians commanded to remove unto Caldina, there to dwell.

Amidst the managing of many and weighty affairs, which falling out variably, one while well, another while ill, buried and amused the minds of men: yet the Romans forgot not the Castle of Tarentum: for M. Octavius and P. Aquilius, went as Embassadors into Asia, for to buy up Corn, to be conveyed: and brought to Tarentum: and a thousand soldiers out of the City army, whereof the number of Romans and Allies was all one, were sent with the said corn thither to lie in garrison.

Now was the summer at an end, and the time drew near of the Consuls election. But the letters of Marcellus unto the Senat (wherein he signified that it was not for the good of the Commonwealth to depart one foot from Annibal, whom he himself pursued till at heels, and so much the more lively, because he fell off and forbore to fight): set the LL. of the Senat into a great perplexity, for fear either to call away the Consul from the wars, especially now in the midst of his best service, or go by without Consuls the next year. But it was thought in the end the best course, that Valerius the Consul, although he were, not in Italy, but beyond sea, should rather be sent for, and called forth of Sicily. So by order from the Senat, there were letters dispatched unto him, from L. Manlius the Praetor of the City, together with those other letters of M. Marcellus the Consul: to give him to understand what the reason was, why the LL. called him rather out of his Province than his Collegue and companion in government.

At the same time there fortune Embassadors to come unto Rome from King Syphax, a "Re- counting what prosperous wars their King had fought with the Carthaginians, assuring the Senat, that their Lord and Master, as he was not a greater enemy to any nation: than to the Carthaginians: so he was not more ready to friend any State, than the Romans: saying moreover, that he had intent to foretime his Embassadors into Spain unto the Roman Generals Cna. and P. Scipio, and now was most willing to seek forth the amity and friendship of the Romans even at the very fountain and well head. The Senat not only returned answer to those Embassadors in most gracious and courteous terms, but also addressed Embassadors of their own with rich gifts unto the King, and by name, L. Genucius, P. Petellius, and P. Popilius. The presents which they carried were a hide robe, and a kirtle of purple, an Ivory chair, a bowl or cup of beaten gold, weighing five pound. These Embassadors had in commendation and charge, presently after they had dispatched with the King, to visit other Princes and great Lords of Affrick: and for to bestow on them also, they carried robes purified and embroidered with purple, and golden bowls of three pound weight. Likewise there were sent as far as Alexandria (in Egypt) unto King Ptolemy and Cleopatra the Queen, M. Antullius and M. Atilius as Embassadors, for to call to remembrance, and renew the old friendship: and to them also they presented gifts, namely, unto the King a long robe and a kirtle of purple, with an ivory chair: unto the Queen a rich mantle of Baidkin, wrought with sundry colours, with a veil of purple.

In this summer time, whilst these forelaid matters passed, there were from out of the Cities and country towns adjoining many prodigious lights, and fearful tokens reported. At Tusculum, there fell a Lamb, having an udder yielding milk: the lower and lantern of the Temple of Jupiter was stricken with lightning, and in manner all the roof uncovered. And much about those daies at Anagnia, the very soil and ground before the gate thereof caught fire with lightning, and for one day and night burned (so, without any matter of fuel): and the souls and birds of the air forsook their nests which they had built in the trees of the grove consecrated to Diana near unto the carriage of a cross way of Anagnia. Near unto Tarracina there were seen in the sea, not far from the haven, serpents of an huge and wonderful bigness to leap up above the water, and to disport and play like fishes. At Tarracina a swine farrowed a pig with a mans face. Also in the territory of Capena, about the grove and temple of Feronia there were four Statues (wearing bloud a day and a night. These fearful tokens were by a device of the Prelats purged and expiated by greater sacrifices. And a solemn Supplication proclaimed one day at Rome in every Church and Chappell before all the shrines of the gods: and another day in the territory of Capena, at the said grove and chappell of Feronia.

M. Valerius the Consul, called by the foresaid letters of the Senate, after he had recommended the charge of the Province and the Army unto Cincius the Prætor; and sent M. Valerius Messala the Admiral of the Navy, with a certain number of ships into Africk, as well to fetch in prizes, as to espy and learn what the people of Carthage did and went about: himself with ten sail took the seas, and having a prosperous fore-wind arrived at Rome. And being come, presently he assembled the Senat, where he declared what acts and deeds he had performed in his Province, namely, "Whereas for the space almost of threcore years there had been war in Sicily both by land and sea, and the same oftentimes fought with great losses and many defeats: that he now had brought those troubles to an happy end, and set the Province in quiet. That there was not in all Sicily one Carthaginian left: nor one Sicilian, of all them that for fear had been chased and driven out from thence, but was returned and there replanted: that they were all brought home again to their own Cities to inhabit, to their own lands, to plough and sow; that now at last the fore-let and waste ground was husbanded again, and made fruitful, not only for the profit and commodity of the occupiers and tenants thereof, but also for the most assured relief and renovation of the people of Rome, both in war and peace. After this, Mutines, and the rest who had deserved any thing well of the City of Rome, were brought into the Senat: unto whom, both all and some (for the credit of the Consul, and to disgrace him of his promise unto them) there were rendered all sorts of honourable recompence. Mutines also was enfranchised Citizen of Rome, and a Bill was preferred in that behalf to the people, by the Tribune of the Commons, and with the grant and authority of the Senat.

During the affairs at Rome, M. Valerius Messala arrived in Africk with a fleet of 50 sail, and being landed one morning before day, suddenly and unawares to the people of the country, made a rode into the territory about Thica: and having foraged it far and near, taken many men and women prisoners, and raised a great booty of all sorts of things besides, returned to the Amado, and crossed the seas back for Sicily, and arrived again at Lilybæum upon the thirteenth day after he loosed from thence, and took the seas first. Of the Captives (after straight examination) he learned thus much (which also he set down orderly in writing, and sent unto the Consul Levinius, that he might be acquainted likewise with the state of the affairs in Africk): namely, "that there were in Carthage five thousand Numidians, under the conduct of Masaniassa the son of Gadus, most forward young man, and a right valiant warrior: that there were other soldiers also throughout all Africk waged and levied for money, ready to be transported and sent over into Spain unto Asdrubal, to the end that he with a most puissant power might with all speed pass over into Italy, and joyn his forces with Annibal: that in the effecting of this designment, the Carthaginians were assuredly perswaded of the victory. Moreover, that there was a mighty navy by a fugging and decking for to recover Sicily again, and as they verily thought, it should pass the seas very shortly.

These news being read by the Consul, so troubled and disquieted the Senat, that they thought there was no tarrying for the ordinary election of Magistrates, summoned and called by the Consul, but that they should nominate a Dictator of purpose to assemble that solemn Session, and the Consul immediately to return again to his Province. But hereupon grew some debate and question for a time, while the Consul said, that he would nominate and create Dictator M. Valerius Messala, who was then in Sicily, Admiral of the fleet: but the LL. replied again and said, that a Dictator might not be elected or declared without the Territories of Rome, and those were all within the limits and marches of Italy. But after that M. Lucretius (a Tribune of the Commons) had put this controvertic to question before the Senat for to be cast and decided by their opinions: then the Senat granted out a decree, That the Consul before he departed from the City, should put up a bill or supplication unto the body of the people, that it would please them to elect a Dictator; and whomsoever they by their suffrages chose, him should he pronounce and declare for the Dictator: and in case the Consul refused to do so, then the Prætor of the City should propose the same unto the people: and if not he neither, then the Tribunes should propound it unto the Commons. But when the Consul denied flatly to put it unto the people, being a thing merely belonging to his authority and place, and likewise expressly forbade the Prætor to do it, then the Tribunes of the Commons took the matter upon them, whereupon the Commons granted, that Q. Fulvius, who then was in Capua, should be nominated Dictator. But the night before that very day that this assembly of the Commons was to be holden, the Consul departed privily, and took his journey toward Sicily. The Nobles thus being disappointed and destitute, thought good to send letters unto Marcellus, for to lend his helping hand now unto the Common-weal, thus forsaken and abandoned by his Colleague, and to declare him for Dictator, whom the people had by their voices elected. So Q. Fulvius was pronounced Dictator by Marcellus the Consul: and by virtue of the said act of the Commons, P. Licinius Crassus the Arch-Priest, was by Q. Fulvius nominated General of the Cavalry.

The Dictator after he was come to Rome, sent Cn. Sempronius Blaesus his Lieutenant, whom he had at Capua, to the Army into the Province of Hærruria, in stead of C. Calpurnius the Prætor: whom by his letters he moved to take the government of Capua, and his army there. And himself sent out precepts for the solemn elections of Consuls, against the first Comitial day that he might by Law. But by reason of a contention that grew between the Tribunes of the Commons and the Dictator, it could not pass and be performed. For the Century Galeria of the younger sort, sort, which by lot had the prerogative of giving their first voices, elected for Consul Q. Fulvius, and Q. Fabius: unto whose election no doubt, the rest of the Tribes called forth in right course and lawful order would have inclined, but that C. and L. Arianus, the Tribunes of the Commons came between with their negative voice: who said, it stood not well with civility, that one man should continue ever still in Magistracy, and besides, that it was a more shamefull example and foul precedent, that himself should be created Consul, who assembled the election: and therefore, if the Dictator would admit of his own name, and allow himself eligible, they would not suffer the assembly to continue any longer: but if there might be some other propounded besides him, they would not hinder the proceedings thereof until all was finished. "The Dictator allegeded in the behalf of the election, and maintained the cause by the authority of the Senat, by the grant and act of the Commons, and by sundry examples of former times. For when Cn. Servilius was Consul, at what time as Flaminius the other Consul was slain at Thrasymenus: by order granted out of the Senat, there was a bill preferred to the Commons, and the same passed by their voices. That so long as the war continued in Italy, it might be lawful for the people to chuse and create Consuls again, as often as they pleased, whosoever they would, out of the number of them that had been Consuls. And as for examples (quoth he) in this case, I can allege both old and new: to wit, long ago L. Posthumus Megillus, being Interrex, was even in that very election which he called and held, created Consul himself, with Cn. Jun. Bubulcus: and of latter daies Q. Fabius likewise, who verily would never have accepted of the Consulship, and suffered it to be hung upon him so continually, if he had deemed it to be against the good of the common-weal. After much debate and long alteration, entertained with sundry like speeches, at length the Dictator and the Tribunes agreed to this point, and agreed of this issue, That they would stand to the award and judgment of the Senat. The LL. of the Senat were all of this mind, that the present condition of the common-weal required no less, but that the state and the affairs thereof should be managed by old and experienced Captains and Generals, and such as were skillful in feats of arms. And therefore they utterly disliked that the election should be hindered and disturbed. Thus the Tribunes relented, and the election went forward and was finished. So there were declared Consuls, Q. Fabius Max. the fifth time, Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time. Then were created Prætors, L. Veturius Philo, T. Quintius Crispinus, C. Hostilius Tubulus, and C. Aufidius. When the Magistrates were once elected for the year, Q. Fulvius resigned up his Dictator's room.

In the very end of this summer, a Carthaginian fleet of forty sail, under the conduct of Amilcar the Admiral, passed over into Sardinia, and at first invaded and wasted the territory of Olbia: then, after that P. Manlius Vulso the Prætor there, shewed himself with an army, they yet a compass about, and sailed to the other side of the Island, and foraged the lands about Caradina: and returned again into Africk, enriched with prizes and booties of all sorts.

In that year divers Priests died at Rome, and new substituted in their rooms. C. Servilius the Prætor or Pontifex was invested and installed instead of T. Otacilius Crassus. In like manner T. Sempronius Longus, the son of Caius, was chosen Decemvir, deputed for holy ceremonies, in place of T. Sempronius Longus, the son of Titus. M. Marius the King of Sacrificers departed this life: and M. Aemilius Pappus likewise the grand-Curio or Priest of the Curia: but to succeed them, were no Priests deputed that year. In this year also were Censors created, to wit, L. Veturius Philo and P. Licinius Crassus the High-Priest. As for Crassus Licinius, had neither been Consul nor Prætor, before he was made Censor, but stepped straight from his Ediles room into the place of Censor. But these Censors neither made choice of new Senators, nor yet did any public act: the reason was, because L. Veturius died, whereupon Licinius also gave over the Censorship. The Ediles of the Chair L. Veturius, and P. Licinius Varus, exhibited the Roman games, and renewed them again one day more than ordinary. The Ediles of the Commons, Q. Catius, and L. Portius Licinius, set up in the Temple of Ceres, the molten images of brass, which were made of the money taken for fines and amercements: and represented the plaies and pastimes to their office belonging, right stately and with great furniture and preparation, as the wealth and plenty of those times would afford.

In the end of this year C. Lælius the Lieutenant of Scipio arrived at Rome, the four and thirtieth day after that he loosed and took sea at Taracoon. And as he entered the City with a mighty train of Captives, he set the people on running out of all parts to see that sight. The morrow after he was admitted into the Senat-house: where he related, that new Carthage, the head City of Spain, was forced and won in one day: that divers Cities which had revolted were received upon surrender: and other new entered into society and friendship with the people of Rome. And by enquiry of the Captives they found their intelligences to agree in manner with the advertisements and tidings contained in the letters of M. Valerius Messala. But the thing that troubled the Lords most, was the voyage of Asdrubal into Italy, which hardly was able to withstand the forces of him and Annibal together. Lælius being brought into the general assembly of the people, discoursed of the same points which he had related in the Senat-house. And the Senat, in regard of the happy succels of P. Scipio, granted by a decree, a solemn procession for one day: and gave order that C. Lælius with all convenient speed should make haste again, and repair into Spain with the very same ships that he brought from thence.

The winning of Carthage I have set down in this year, having the warrant of many writers: and yet yet I am not ignorant, that some there be, who have affirmed that it hapned the next year following. But me seems, it was an unlikely matter; that Scipio should spend one whole year in Spain doing just nothing.

Now when Q. Fabius Max. was Consul the fifth time, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time on that very day upon which they entered their office (which was in the Ides of March both of them by decree of the Senat, had the government of the Province Italy: but so, as their jurisdiction was set out by the countries: so as Fabius should war about Tarentum; and Fulvius in the Lucas and Bruttians countries. M. Claudius continued till ingovernment one year longer. The Pretors had their Provinces parted between them by lot: unto Caius Hostilius Tullius fell the jurisdiction over the Citizens, but to L. Veturius Philo, over foreigners, together with Gallia, Tinus Quintius Criminus ruled Capua, and C. Aurunculeius governed Sardinia. The armies were divided among the Provinces in this wise: Unto Fulvius were assigned the two legions which M. Valerius Levis had in Sicily: Unto Q. Fabius, those in Heitruia, which were commanded by C. Calpurnius. The City army was appointed to succed those Legions in Heitruia: and C. Calpurnius was ordained to sit in the government of that Province, and to have the leading of that army which Q. Fabius had. It was agreed moreover, that T. Quintius should be Lord President of Capua, and have the charge of the army there. And that C. Hostilius should receive the jurisdiction of C. Lestorius the Pro-Pretor, over the province at Ariminum, and likewise his army. Unto M. Marcellus the same legions were allowed; wherewith he had waited so fortunately when he was Consul. Unto M. Valerius and L. Cincius (for they also continued one year more governors in Sicily) was the army remaining after the battell at Canna granted: and they were commanded to supply and make up all the companies thereof, out of those soldiers that were left of the legions of Cn. Fulvius. For the Consuls caused them to be sought out and gathered together, and sent them into Sicily: and disgraced them with the very same kind of ignominious soldiery, in which the Cannians served: as also those who remaining of the army of Cn. Fulvius the Pretor had been thither sent by order from the Senat, for anger and despite that they fled like as the other. Unto C. Aurunculeius, the same legions were given by decree in Sardinia, wherewith P. Manlius Vulso had ruled and governed that Province. And P. Sulpicius having his government prorogued for one year longer, was commanded to rule Macedonia with the same legion and Armed still. Thirty Gallies of five banks of oars were appointed to be sent out of Sicily, unto Tarentum, to Q. Fabius the Consul. With the rest of the navy, it was agreed and order set down, that M. Valerius Levis should either him self pass over into Affrick, for to forrage and spoil the country; or send L. Cincius or M. Valerius Messapus, whether of them he would. For the government of Spain there was no alteration, save only this that Scipio and Syllanus had their commission continued, not for a year as the rest, but till such time as they should be called from thence by order from the Senat. This were the Provinces divided and thus were the forces bestowed for this year.

Among other affairs of greater importance, the Election of the high Curio, or chief parish-Priest who was to be elected in the room of M. Enylius late deceased, renewed and set on foot again in old contention between Commons and Nobles. For the Patres denied, that C. Manlius Atilius (who was the only man of the Commons that stood for it) was eligible, and therefore not to be picked; forasmuch as never any before him obtained that sacerdotal dignity, but one of Senators calling. The Tribunes being called unto for their assistance referred the matter to the Senat. And the Senat put it unto the people, for to be decided by them. So C. Manlius Atilius was the first Commoner that ever was created Maximus Curio, [i. e. the grand-superintendent over all the Cure in matters of Religion.] And P. Licinius the Arch-bishop constrained C. Valerius Flaccus to be initiated, and inaugurate the Flamine of Jupiter against his will. And C. Lestorius was created Decemvir for holy rites and ceremonies, and for sacrifices instead of Q. Mutius Scævola late deceased. The cause and occasion of inaugurating that Flamine by constraint and compulsion I would willingly have concealed and smothered in silence, but that the ill name, wherewith he was, turned afterwards to good fame and reputation. This Flaccus for his careless, loose and riotous demeanour in his youth, in regard of which vicious course of life he was odious to his own natural brother L. Flaccus, and other his kindred, was for the same cause chosen Flamine by P. Licinius the said Arch-bishop. This man, so soon as his mind was employed about Church-matters and religious ceremonies, so suddenly all at once altered his life, and cast off his old behaviors, that there was not one of all the young men in Rome in more account and credit, nor better liked of the chief of the Nobility and LL. of the Senat, as well those of his own house and lineage, as others that were strangers unto him. And when he saw himself grown generally into this good opinion and reputation among men, he began to have a very good conceit of his own powers and worthiness: inasmuch, as he brought up an old custom again, and was so bold as to take his place in the Senat-house: a thing, that for many years space had been intermitted and discontinued in regard of the base unworthiness and insufficiency of the former Flamines. When he was entered into the Senat-chamber, C. Licinius the Pretor willed him to go forth, as being no place for him, and therewith drew him out: whereupon the Flamine called for help of the Tribunes of the Commons pleading the ancient right and prebeminence of that Priestly dignity, and alleging, that Q. Manlius in times past enjoyed that place, together with the pall, or embroidered rich robes, and the Ivory hair. The Pretor on the other side came upon him again, and said, That right was not grounded upon old examples past all date, fetch out of Chronicles time out of mind: but A but he would needs have it to be carried by the most fresh practice of the newest and latest custom, affirming, That by prescription of the time, either of our fathers or grandfathers daies, there was no Flamine of Jupiter usurped that privilege. The Tribunes, who were to moderate this question, gave their judgment thus, That if a thing were foretold, and discontinued through the supine negligence of some Flamines, it was worth for themselves, and they deemed it no reason, that it should hurt or prejudice the whole priesthood. Whereupon, the Pretor himself forced not greatly upon the point, nor stood much with him, and so they admitted the Flamine into the house with great content of the Nobles, as well as of the Commons. And all men thus conceived of it, That the Flamine had obtained the thing, rather in regard of his sanctimony and holiness of life than in the right of his sacerdotal dignity.

The Consuls before that they went into their Provinces, enrolled two legions of Citizens, for to supply and make up sufficiently the defect of all the other forces. The old City army Fulvius the Consul committed unto C. Fulvius Flaccus his Lieutenant. (and brother he was besides to the Consul) for to be led into Heitruia: with direction, that the Legions already in Heitruia should be brought to Rome. And Fabius the Consul caused the residue of the army of Fulvius to be sought up and rallied, which arold to the number of 3360: and commanded his son Q. Maximus to lead them into Sicily, unto M. Valerius the Pro-Consul, and of him to receive the charge of two Legions, and the thirty gallies aforesaid, bearing five ranks of oars. The withdrawing of these Legions out of the Island, nothing diminished nor abridged the garrisons of that Province, either in strength or shew. For besides the two old legions, well and sufficiently filled and furnished, he had a great power, as well horse as foot, of Numidians, such as were fled from the adverse part unto the Romans: and took up and levied besides for new soldiers, even those Sicilians also, who had been of the army of Epicides and the Carthaginians, men of approved valor, and skillful warriors. These forrain aids, when he had put to each of the Roman legions, he kept till the form of two compleat armies. With the one he gave order to L. Cincius to defend that part of the Island which had been the Realm of King Hiero: with the other he maintained the rest of the Island, divided sometimes by the confines of the Roman and Punick dominions. There was a fleet also rigged and trimmed, consisting of seventy ships, for to guard and defend all the maritime coasts, along the tract of the sea side. Himself in person, with the horsemen of Mutius, rode about all the Province, for to visit the lands and grounds, and to take note which were tilled and well husbanded, which lay forelet and untilled, and to commend or chastise and rebuke the landlords and owners thereof accordingly. The care and regard of corn, thus far forth did good, that the Province was able both to send good store to Rome, and also to convey unto Canna sufficient to maintain the army that was to lie in standing Camp that summer about Tarentum.

But the soldiery who were transported over into Sicily (and for the better part they were Latines and other Associates) were like to cause a great rising and commotion: whereby we may see, that of small occasions and beginnings oftentimes arise great matters of important consequence. For the Latines and Allies in all their Diets and Councils at home, began to mutter and Egmble, "That now for ten years space they were with continual murtherings and payments of soldiery wages consumed and spent, that there was not a year in manner went over their heads, but it cost them some great loss and overthrow in battell. Many were slain in the wars, other died of diseases. So that a Citizen of theirs, if he were taken and pressed once by the Romans, for to be a soldier, was more like to perish, than if he were taken prisoner by the Carthaginians: for the enemy sent their captives back again, ransomed, and without ransom, home into their country: the Romans posted and packed them away out of Italy, as confined to a place of banishment (to speak truly) rather than appointed to serve in warfare. For see how the soldiery, reasoning after the field of Canna, have continued there, and wakened old their eight years already, and no doubt these were they like to lay their bones before that the enemy (who never so flourishing, nor was so strong as now) would depart from thence. In case then that old soldiery be returned not into their country, and new still be chosen, within a while there would be none left behind. And therefore best it were for them, before they were come to extremum poverty and desolation, presently to deny the people of Rome that, whilst some what is left, which shortly they must be driven to do of very necessity when all is gone. And if the Romans see their Allies once agree together, and make this comie, they will then verily bethink themselves, and grow to some terms of making peace with the Carthaginians. For otherwise be sure, as long as Annus had such a day to live Italy will never be clear of wars. These and such like speeches passed in their Diets above said. There were at that time thirty Colonies of the people of Rome: and whilst the Embassages from them all were at Rome, swathe of them denied the Consul Italy, and said they were not able any longer to find either men or money. And those were the Ardeans, Neptis, Surinians, Circetis, Alba, Castellis, Stessis, Sora, Seis, Calis, Narnis, Interamn, &c. The Consuls amazed at this strange and unexpected accident, being desirous to drive them out of that mind, and to scare them from so despicable a resolution, supposed they should prevail more by chastising and rebuking, than by fair and gentle dealing: and therefore told them again, "That they had presumed to speak that unto the Consuls, which they again were ashamed, and could not find in their hearts to deliver and relate in the Senat-house. For surely (say they) this is not a cessall of soldiery and war service, but a very meet revolting from the people."

of Rome, and no better than an open rebellion. Therefore they were best to return again speedily into their several Colonies, and to consult with their neighbors & countrien, whilst the matter remained yet all whole, as men who had rather let fall some words rashly at adventure, than resolved indeed to attempt and commit to hainous an act; yea, and to tell them, and put them in mind, that they themselves were neither Campans nor Tarentines, but meer Romans, from them deicended, and of their race; from thence sent as Colonies into the lands that were won by conquest, for to breed, increase, and multiply; and to admonish them, That whatsoever duties children owe to their parents, the same they owed unto the Romans, if there remained in them any kind and natural affection, any remembrance of their ancient native country; and to exhort them to consider better of the matter, and to lay their heads together anew. Forasmuch as those designments of theirs tended to betray the State and Empire of Rome, and to deliver the victory of all unto Annibal. When the Consuls one after another had dealt and been in hand with them a long time in this manner: and the Embassadors nothing moved with their words, made answer again, That neither they knew what other message to bring home; nor their Senate what new counsell to take; since that they had not any more men to be mulctured for soldiers, nor money to be paid for wages: the Consuls seeing them to be stiffly and obstinately bent, made relation thereof before the Senat, whereupon every man was stricken into to great fear and trouble of mind, that many of them gave out, that the Empire of Rome was come to an end. The like they, will the rest of the Colonies do, and surely all our confederates and allies are combined and agreed to betray the City of Rome unto Annibal. But the Consuls comforted the Senat, and bad them be of good cheer, saying, That all the other Colonies besides would continue loyall and fast in their duty and allegiance: and even those also which had failed in their obedience, if there might be Embassadors sent amongst them, to rebuke and chastise them, and not to speak them fair and entreat them by way of prayer, would no doubt have a respective reverence of the majesty of the Roman Empire. Now when the LL. of the Senat had committed the ordering of this matter wholly unto them for to manage and handle, according as they should think good for the weal-publique: after they had thoroughly founded the hearts and minds of all the rest of the Colonies, they called and cited all the Embassadors, and demanded of them whether their soldiers were in readines, according to the capitulations of the covenant. Then M. Sextilius of Fregis made answer in the behalf of eighteen of them, That not only their soldiers were ready according to the form of the covenant, but also if more were needful, more they would allow, and whatsoever else the people of Rome imposed upon them, and wished them to perform, the same would they strain themselves to do to the utmost: for, as yet they had people, force, and a purse good enough: and as for their hearts, it was much better than their ability. The Consuls after they had made a short speech unto them by way of a preamble, saying, that they thought it not sufficient for their desert to be commended from their mouths only, unless all the LL. generally in the Senat-house gave them condigna thanks with one voice and common accord, wished them to follow after them thither. The Senat having thanked them in as honourable terms as they could possibly devise, and entertained them with most gracious words, gave order to the Consuls, to bring them forth also in the face of the whole people of the City: and before them, among other singular favors and kindnesses which they had shewed both unto them and also unto their ancestors, to make rehearsal of this late good desert of others, which they afforded unto the Common-wealth: to the end, that now also, after so many ages and lives of men past they should not be forgotten and buried in silence, nor defrauded of their just praise and due commendation. And these were they that remained true hearted and fast unto the City of Rome: The Signins, Nolans, and Norbanis; the Saturnians, Brundisins, and Fregellans; the Lucernis, Venusins, and Adrians; the Firmins and inhabitants of Ariminum. And from the other sea-side the Pontians, Pellans, and Cossans: and of mid-landers, the Beneventans, Efferonsis, Spoleitins, Placentins, and the inhabitants of Cyrennoia. Upon the aid and succour of these Colonies, the Roman state at this time rested and stood maintained: and these all were highly thanked both in the Senat: and in the assembly of the people. As for the other twelve Colonies, which had refused to do their obedience; the LL. of the Senat gave express commandment, that they should not be so much as once minded or named; and that the Consuls should neither give them their dispatch, nor retain them still, nor so much as speak unto them. This silent kind of rebuke without word giving, seemed to stand most with the majesty and grandeur of the people of Rome.

Whilst the Consuls were diligent in providing and making ready all other things requisite and meet for the wars, it was thought good to bring abroad the vicissinary gold: to wit, the twentieth part of all their tributes and revenues, which had been laid up and reserved apart in a more secret closet of the City-chamber, against an hard winter (as they lay) to serve for what needsoever the Common-wealth should stand in. So there was taken forth four thousand pound weight of gold, whereof three hundred pound was given to the two Consuls apiece, and likewise to M. Marcellus and P. Sulpicius the Pro-Consuls: and to L. Veturius the Praetor; unto whose lot the Province of France befell, and Fabius the Consul had an addition besides himself above the rest of one hundred pound weight of gold for to be carried into the Castle of Tarentum. The rest of the gold they disbursed for to make ready payment down upon the nail unto them that undertook to provide apparel for the army in Spain, which to their own fame, and the honour of their General, served therein in the wars.

Moreover, it was thought good, that before the Consuls departed into their Provinces the prodigious tokens should be purged and expiate. On the Alban mount there were smitten with fire from heaven the Image of Jupiter, and a tree standing here unto the Temple: likewise the lake at Hoffia, the wall at Capua, and the Church of Fortuna: and at Siniffa the wall and gate of the town. These, I say were, blasted with lightning, and smitten with thunderbolts. There were some also brought out, that the water at Alia ran bloud, And at Rome within the sanctuary of the chapel of Pari Fortuna, a little image that stood upon her coronet, fell of its own accord from the head of the goddess into her hands. And at Priverium it was for certain reported and known of a truth, that an Oxe spake, and that a Vulture or Gripe flew into a shop in the market place, when it was full of people. And at Siniffa there was an Infant born of doubtful sex, both male and female, (which the common sort call Androgynos, as for the most part Greek names, admit more easie composition of two words than the Latine) and there it rained milk, and a man-child was born with an Elephants head. These strange and fearful signs were expiate, and satisfaction made for them with greater sacrifices: and a solemn procession in all the Churches and Chapels, with prayers and supplications was proclaimed for one day. Besides a decree was granted, that C. Hostilius the Praetor should vow and let out the games and plaies of Apollo, in such manner as of late years they had been vowed and let forth.

About the same time Q. Fulvius the Consul held an assembly for the creation of Censors, and elected Censors were M. Cicerilius, Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, who neither of them had ever had been Cbf. And by the grant or creation of the Senat, there was a bill preferred unto the Comitions, and the same passed, that these Censors should let, and to farm let the territory of Capua. The review of the Senat and choice of new Senators was hindered and laid by, reason of a contention between the two Censors, who should be the president of the Senat. Now the choosing of him lay in Sempronius his hand. Howbeit Cornelius alleged, that the custome and tradition of fore-fathers should be followed, namely, to elect him for President, who of all them that were now living, had born first the office of Censor. And that was T. Manlius Torquatus. Sempronius replied again, and said, that as the gods had given him by lot the first place, so they had granted him free liberty to choose whom he would. And therefore he would elect Q. Fabius Max. whom at that time he was able to prove to be the principall man of all the City, without exception, and take Annibal himself for the Judge. After much variance and contending of words, at length Sempronius by relenting and permission of his Collegue elected Q. Fabius Max. the chief Senator. Then the Senat was charged, and new Senators chosen, and eight were overpassed and left out, among whom was L. Caelius Metellus, he that gave the infamous and shameful counsell, to abandon Italy after the defeat at Canna. In noting likewise and disgracing the Knights and Gentlemen, the same cause was considered of, and took effect, but very few there were of them that were touched with that infamy: but all those horsemen belonged to the Cannian legions who were in Sicily (and no small number there was of them) had their horses taken from them: And to aggravate this sharp punishment and note of disgrace, they were plagued also with time of long warfare: for so many of them as had served with horse allowed by the City, should not reckon upon the years passed already, but were to follow warfare ten years forward, and find themselves horses. Moreover, these Censors after diligent search and survey found out and met with a great number of those that ought to have served on horseback: and look how many of them were sixteen years old and upward at the beginning of the war, and had not been employed in the wars, those all they disfranchised, and made Atrii or contributaries. After this, they bargained by the great for the repairing and re-edifying again of the edifices which had been consumed by fire about the Forum, or market place, namely, the seven shops, the fish shambles, and the Kings Hall, or royall gallery.

Thus when all things were finished which were to be done at Rome, the Consuls set forward to the wars. And first Fulvius went before to Capua: and some few daies after Fabius followed, who brought both his own Collegue by word of mouth most earnestly, and also Marcellus by effectual letters, to make sharp war upon Annibal, and to keep him occupied, while he assailed Tarentum: which City, if it were once taken from the enemy, he were then driven out of all & having no place to put his head in, nor which he might make account to stand fast and truly unto him, he should have no reason at all once to stay in Italy. He dispatched also a messenger to Rhegium unto the Captain of the fort and garrison, which by Leanius the Consul was there placed against the Bruttis: and those were eight thousand men. The greatest part of them were of these good fellows, and that damned crew, wherof we spake before, who used to live by robbing and stealing, and were brought thither from Agrigina out of Sicily. Unto whom there were adjoynd many of the Bruttis also fugitives from thence, and as good as themselves every way, both for audaciousness, and also for needfulness to set upon any bold adventure whatsoever. This power of men he commended should be lead to waste and spoil the Brutians country first, and then to lie against the City Castellum, and to assault it. They having performed this service, not only willingly & cheerfully, but also with greediness: having all chased away and rifled the husbandmen and peasants of the country, assailed the City with all forcible means. Marcellus stirred up and provoked by those letters of the Consul: and having a good opinion of his own, that of all the Roman Captains there was not one so able to match Annibal as himself, left his wintering standing Camp, loosed every where was forage and graze in the country, took the field, and encountered Annibal at Cannas. Now was Annibal in hand with the Cannans, and solicited them to revolt. But he hearing once that Marcellus approached, he dilogged from thence. The country thereabout was plain and open, without any covert places to bestow an ambush, and to lay trains in, therefore he began to retire himself from thence into the woodland parts. Marcellus tracked him still, and followed him hard at heels, and encamped close unto him: and ever as he had fortified and entrenched himself, he brought forth his men into the field, ready for battle. Annibal entertaining small skirmishes with certain Cornets and troops of horsemen, and with light appointed footmen, that lanced darts and javelins, thought it not necessary yet to come unto a pight fight, and venture all upon one throw. Howbeit he was drawn to a fight, maugre his head, howsoever he laboured to avoid it. For being gone afore one night, Marcellus overtook him upon a plain and open ground: and as he was pitching his tents he kept him from fortifying, by charging his pioneers and labourers on every side. Whereupon they came to a very battle, and fought with all the forces they had on both sides: and when it grew toward night, they departed alunder on even hand: but before it was dark they had encamped not far one from another, and in great haste made shift to fortify themselves. The next morning by daylight Marcellus came forth into the field with all his power: neither refused Annibal the challenge, "having with many words comforted and encouraged his souldiers to remember Thrasymenus and Cannas, to cut the comb and beat down and tame this fell stomach and lusty courage of the enemy: who preseth still (quoth he) and seeketh upon us, not suffering us to march on quietly in our journey, nor to pitch our tents: giving us no leave to breath our selves, nor time to look about us. There is not a morning, but so soon as the sun is up in the horizon to give light to the world, the Roman army is out in the field to give us battle. If we could draw blood of him once, and set him out of the field with blood about his ears, he would for ever after fight more quietly, and take better leisure with him. With these and such like comfortable words and effectual remonstrances they were well animated: as also provoked seeing themselves thus molested by the enemy, who day by day never ceased to challenge and brave them still: whereupon they began a fierce and cruel battle. They had now continued fight above two hours, and then began the Roman Cavalry from the right wing, and the extraordinary souldiers that flanked the main battell, to give ground and dismarch. Which Marcel, perceiving, he brought forward the eighteen legion in the vanguard. And while some retreated back fearfully, others came forward but slowly, the whole battell was put out of order, and disarrayed: and so at length it was discomfited: and for that fear surmounted hance, they turned their backs and fled away again. Slain there were in the conflict and in the rout together some 7000 Citizens and Allies one with another: among whom, there were four Roman Centurions, and two Colonels, Marcus Licinius, and Marcus Fulvius. Of military engines, there were four lost of that right wing which first shrunk and lost ground: and two others of that legion which came to succour their fellows that gave back and retreated. Marcellus after that he was returned into the Camp, welcomed his souldiers with such a bitter and sharp Oration, that the very words of the General in his anger and wrath were more heavy and grievous unto them, than the conflict it self, which they had unfortunately endured all the day long before. "I yid praife yet, and render thanks to the immortal gods, (quoth he) as I may in such a case, that our enemies having vanquished and conquered you in the field, and driven you in so great fear to run headlong within your trenches & gates, came not with all at once to assail the camp. For surely in the same fearful fright that you forsook battell, you would likewise have abandoned your tents & pavilions. What fearfulness is this? Whence cometh this terror? What means this oblivion of yours? How cometh it to pass, that ye should so forget all on a sudden, both your own selves and them with whom ye have to fight? Why surely, they are the same enemies & no other, whom the summer past, you did nothing but either vanquish & overcome, or else pursue & follow in chase: whom for these certain daies past ye have been ready to tread on their heels as they fled and ran away before you both by day & night: whom in light skirmishes ye have discomfited: whom no longer ago than yesterday, you suffered neither to march forward, nor to pitch their camp. I forbear to speak, and I pass in silence those things which in good right ye may stand upon & make of your boast. I say nothing of that whereof ye ought to be ashamed & displeased with your selves, namely, how but even yesterday ye brake off the fight on even hand, and retired out of the field, when the enemy had got no advantage? What hath this one night, or what hath one day cut you off? Are either your forces in this meantime abridged & diminished, or your enemies augmented & increased? Now surely, me thinks, I speak not to mine own army, nor to Roman souldiers. Only ye carry about you the same bodies & armour that ye were wont. For if ye had born the same minds and hearts with you, should the enemies ever have seen your backs? Should they have taken either banner from any company, or engine from cohort and squadron? As yet the enemy never wanted and made boast of the defeat of our Roman legions. You are the very first that this day have given him the honour of discomfiting and putting to flight our army. Then they all cried out, and besought him to pardon that daies default, and to make trial once again of his souldiers courages when and wheresoever he would. Mary, and that I will (quoth he) my souldiers: I will put you to it: even to morrow I will bring you abroad in the field, and after ye have got the victory ye shall obtain that pardon which ye now crave. So he gave order, that those cohorts which had lost their engines should have the allowance of barley in stead of wheat: and as for those Centurions of the bands or companies, whose banners were

A were lost, them he degraded in this manner: He caused them to be disarmed, and their skins to be drawn naked and taken from them, and so let them go and shake their ears. And withal, he made proclamation, that the next day they should all present themselves in readines, as well footmen as horsemen. Which done, he dismissed the audience, and they all confessed and acknowledged, that they were justly and worthily thus checked and rebuked: and that there was not that day one man in the Roman army, setting aside the General himself only, but he was bound to make amends and satisfaction, either with spending heart-blood, or achieving a noble victory. The morrow after they all shewed themselves unto him in their armor, and wel appointed, according to his commandment. The General commended them for their forwardness: and gave them to understand, that he would let those in the forefront of the vanguard, which the day before began to run away, as also those cohort likewise that lost their engines. And now he gave them warning, and charged them all to fight it out lustily, to win the field: and to endeavour and strain themselves, both all and some, that the news of yesterdaies flight came not to Rome before, and prevented the fame of this dayes victory. Then he willed them to go to their meat, and to strengthen their bodies: that in case the fight should hold long, they might be able to endure to the end. Now when all was laid and done, that might encourage and stir up the hearts of souldiers, they went out & advanced their engines into the field, Annibal being advertised hereof, "Now believe me (qd. he) we have to deal with an enemy indeed, who is of that nature, that he can neither brook his good fortune, nor away with bad. If he hath won at any time, he pursueth those whom he hath vanquished, cruelly. Contrary-wise if he have lost, he beginneth to fight with the conquerors again right freshly. Then he commanded the trumpets to sound, and brought forth his power in battell array. A field was fought there on both hands more sharply a good deal, than the day before. The Carthaginians strived to keep the honor and reputation of yesterdaies service: the Romans strived to wipe away the ignominy and shame of that dayes toil. On the Romans side, the Cavalry of the left wing, and those cohorts which had lost their engines, fought in the vanguard, and the twentieth legion was marshalled and ranged in the right point of the battell. L. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Claudius Nero had the leading of both these wings, M. Marcellus himself commanded the main battell, and withal his personal presence encouraged them, as a witness of their valour and courage. Now, when as the fight had continued long, and the victory inclined no way, Annibal commanded the Elephants to be put forth upon the very forefront of the battell, to see if that object might possibly work some terror and confusion among the Romans. And at the first they disordered the engines, and troubled the ranks: so as partly by treading under foot, and partly by scattering them for fear, that were all about, they had laid naked and open the battell in one part, and in more places than so had the Romans fled, but that C. Decimius Flavinus, a Colonel, having from the first band of the Hastati, caught up the banner in his hand, commanded the company thereto belonging to follow him: and thither he led them where the forlaid Elephants were gathered round, and made foulest work, and charged them to fling their darts and javelins at them. All this shot light fire, and misfed them not, yea, and some stuck in them: and no marvel, for the beasts were neer at hand, the bodies great and standing thick in a plump together. But as they were not all wounded, so they that had the darts sett in their backs and sides, were as ready (such is their nature, dangerous to meddle withal) for to hurt their own matters, as the enemies: and all turned upon their fellows, that were unhurt, and drove them back. So as now, not that entire band only, but every souldier else for his own part, who was able to reach the herd (as it were) of the Elephants as they fled, did his best to lance javelins and short darts at them. And so much the more furiously ran the beasts upon their own, and made a far greater havoc there, than they had done among the enemies: by how much more fiercely fear and fright set them agate, and sent them forward, than the will of their masters that sate upon them, was able to rule and restrain them. The Roman footmen cyping this advantage, came forward with their engines and banners upon that battailon, which was put in disarray by the running to and fro of these unruly dumb creatures, and without much ado and farther skirmish, put them to flight, after they were once broken out of their ranks, and set in a fright. Then Marcellus sent his Cavalry after them, to pursue them as they fled, and to follow the chace, and never gave they over hunting and coursing them, until they had lodged them in great fear within their camp. For besides all other things, which made them thus scared and affrighted, there chanced two Elephants to fall down in the very gate & entrance thereof, so that the souldiers were forced to rush into it over the trench and rampier. In that place was the greatest slaughter made of the enemies. For there were slain eight thousand men, and five Elephants. Neither had the Romans a bloncles victory of it: for of the two legions, there died fast upon 1700, and of the Allies more than 1400. Besides many a citizen and confederate fore wounded, and Annibal the next night dilogged and departed. Marcellus although he was desirous to follow upon him, yet he could not for the multitude of his hurt men. The Elephals that were sent out to pursue him in his march, brought word back the next day, that Annibal took his way into the Brutians country.

Neer about the same time, the Hirpins, Lucans, and Volscians, after they had delivered up the portions of Annibal, which they had in their Cities, yielded themselves also to Q. Publilius the Consul, and were received to mercy with great clemency by the said Consul, after some rebuke given them in words only for their trespass and error past. The Brutians also had the like hope of pardon, when as Vibius & Publius, two brethren of the noblest house of that nation, came from them to sue for the same condition of yielding and surrendering themselves, which was granted them to the Lucans.

Q. Fabius the Consul, won by assault a Town in the Salentin countrey called Manduria. Prisoners were taken there 4000, and some good store of other pillage. From thence he went to Tarentum, and in the very mouth of the haven, lay against the City. Those ships which Livius had for to wait the convoy of victuals, he partly charged with engines, and other ordnance to assault Towns withal, and partly furnished with artillery, with Rones, and shot of all sorts: the ships of burden likewise, and not the Gallies only which were guided by oars; to the end, that some might bring Engines and Ladders unto the walls, and others aloof from out of the ships, wound and hurt those that defended the City. These ships were ordained and appointed from the open Sea to assault the City. And clear was the Sea of all danger from the Punick navy, which was sent unto Co-cyra, at what time as Phily minded to assail the Ætolians. In this mean while, the assaults of Caecilia, a little before the coming of Annibal, for fear lest they should be surprised betook themselves to a little hill: which as it was (for the present danger) a place of safety, so it wanted all things else. Fabius, as he lay at siege about Tarentum, was much helped to the achieving of a matter of great importance, by a trifling thing to speak of, and of small moment in itself. The Tarentins had a garrison of the Brutians, sent from Annibal to defend the City. The Captain of this garrison was greatly enamoured and ready to die for the love of a woman, who had a brother that served in the army of Fabius the Consul. He being certified by letters from his sister, of this new acquaintance that he had with that forrainer and stranger, so wealthy and so honorable a person among his country-men; conceived some hope by means of his sister, that her lover might be brought to any thing, and wrought as they would: and so acquainted the Consul with his conceived hope. And this seemed no vain imagination. Whereupon the young man was sent to Tarentum in habit and quality of a fugitive, and by the mediation of his sister, grew into some favour with the Captain aforesaid: and at first practised secretly to undermine and found his mind, and afterwards seeing the weakness and inconstancy of the man, he prevailed with him so much, through the flattering speeches and allurements of the woman, as to betray the keeping and guard of that place whereof he had the charge. After that the manner how, and the time when this plot should be put in execution, was agreed upon, the said soldier lay out of the City closely by night in a place between the corpi de guard, and informed the Consul what was done already, and in what sort every thing was to be done. Fabius at the first watch, after he had given a token and watchword to them in the Castle, and to those likewise that had the keeping of the haven, himself fer a compass about the said haven, and lay as closely as he could to that part of the City which lieth to the East. Then all at once the trumpets sounded from the Castle, from the haven and ships, which in the open Sea rid neerer at hand. Great shouting there was, and much ado on purpouse from all these quarters, whereas indeed there was least danger or none at all there. In the mean season the Consul kept his men in, whereupon Democritus, who had beforetime been Admiral of the Armado, and whose chance it was to have the guarding of that place, against which the Consul lay close, seeing all thereabout quiet enough, and no stirring at all, and hearing all other parts to ring again and resound with such alarms as otherwise it seemed the City was taken and won, and fearing lest if he sat still and beset him himself, the Consul would make some Camiada, and give the assay to enter the City with banner displayed: withdrew his guard toward the Castle, from whence was heard the greatest and most terrible noise. Fabius when he perceived once by guessing at the time, as also by the silence it self in that place (for where but a while before they kept much ado, raising up one another, and calling to arm, there now all was hush and not a word) that the guards were had away from thence, he commanded that the ladders should be brought to that side of the wall, where the brother & broker both of the treason, had brought word that the cohorts of the Brutians were quartered and kept their guard. Thus on that part was the wall won by the means of the Brutii, who were ready to help and take them up, and so they got over into the City. Then was the next gate broken open, that the army might come by companies under their several colours. Whereupon they set up a shout, and a little before break of day, they marched as far as into the market Read, and met with none to make head against them, and caused all them that sought at the Castle and the haven, to turn upon them. There, in the very entrance of the market place, began a great skirmish, rather fought hotly than maintained thoroughly. For the Tarentin soldiers were nothing comparable to the Romans, either in courage or heart, or goodness of armour: in skill and knowledge of war, or in humbleness and strength of body. And therefore when they had only shot their darts, even before they came to handstroke, they turned back and slunk away through the lanes of the City, where with they were well acquainted, come to their own home, and some to their friends houses. Two of their Captains, Nico and Democritus, fought manfully, and were slain. Philemenus, who was the principal head that wrought the revolt unto Annibal, fled out of the skirmish as fast as ever his horse would carry him: but a while after his empty horse was seen & known wandering a stray in the City, but his body could never be found. It was commonly believed, that hestling himself headlong from his horseback into a certain open pit, as for Carthago, Captain of the Punick garrison, he cast away his armour and weapon, and as he was coming to the Consul with a goodly tale, recounting and remembering his fathers friendship and intertainment to the Romans, there happened a soldier to meet him and strike off his head. Then by some or other in every place, the Carthaginians and Tarentins

A Tarentins both went to wrack, and were killed without mercy and regard, as well unarmed as armed. Yea, there were many of the Brutians also fell upon the edge of the sword, were it that they were mistaken, or for an old grudge and in-bred hatred; or to suppress and extinguish the bruit and rumor that went of betraying the Town: to the end that Tarentum might seem the rather won by assault and force of arms. Then from murder and slaughter, they fell to sack and spoil the City. There were taken prisoners by report thirty thousand head of slaves: a mighty mass of silver tried and coined: of gold 87000 pound weight. Images and painted tables or pictures, so many, as very neer amounted to the number of the ornaments of Syracusa. But Fabius of a braver mind, abstained from that kind of prize and pillage, which Marcellus forbore not. For when his Scribe or Secretary asked him, what his pleasure was, should be done with the images (and the Statues they were of the Gods, of a mighty bigness and proportion, portrayed every one in their own habit like warriors: Mary (qd. he) let the Tarentins have their angry Gods still among them for me. After this, the wall which divided the City from the Castle, was dismantled; railed down, and laid even with the ground.

While these things happened at Tarentum, Annibal (after they had yielded themselves unto him that befel Gaulonia) hearing of the siege and assault of Tarentum, went night and day and made all the haile he could, with a running march, to relieve & succour the City: but hearing by the way that it was forced and gone, "Ah, I see well, qd. he the Romans also are not without their Annibal." In good faith, so was Tarentum won, and so lost again, by treachery and treason. But because he would not be thought to turn back & flee, in the very lame place where he made it lay, he Cat down, and encamped almost five miles from the City: and after he had abode there some few daies, he retired himself to Metapontum. From thence he suborned two Metapontins, and sent them to Fabius at Tarentum, with letters devised from certain principal men of that City, wherein they promised to betray Metapontum and the Punick garrison into the Consul his hands, upon assurance made unto them, that all former trepsies & offences should be forgiven and forgotten. Fabius supposing all was truth and plain-dealing, appointed a certain day when he would come to Metapontum, and sent his letters also to those principal citizens, which letters were brought unto Annibal: whereat he was right glad and took great contentment that his fraud sped so well, and that Fabius also might be entrapped, caught, and overtaken by his wily fetches as well as others: and thereupon laid an ambush for him in the way not far from Metapontum. As Fabius (before he should go out of Tarentum) attended to know what the birds signified, he observed once or twice that they approved not his journey. And when he killed a sacrifice, thereby to know the will of the Gods, the Soothsayer, or bowl-prier gave him warning, to take heed of the deceit of his enemies, and beware of wait-laying. The Metapontins, seeing that he came not at the day appointed, were sent again to hasten him forward, and to encourage him to come: who were all suddenly at once apprehended, and for fear of farther torture, disclosed the practise of the ambush.

In the beginning of that summer wherein these occurrences happened, after that Scipio had bestowed the whole winter, in winning and reconciling the hearts of the barbarous people, partly with gifts and rewards, and partly with enlarging and sending back their hostages, and the prisoners: there came unto him one Edeco, a noble and famous Captain of the Spaniards. His wife and children were in custody with the Romans: but besides that occasion which brought him to Scipio, there was another cause, even a general inclination of all their minds, that chanced I wot not how, which withdrew and estranged whole Spain from the Carthaginian Empire, unto the Roman. The same reason moved Indibilis also and Mandonius, the greatest LL, and Princes no doubt of all Spain, to leave Asdrubal, and with all the power they could make of their followers and vassals, to depart into the mountains standing just over his camp, from whence they might from hill to hill continually retire themselves in safety to the Romans. Asdrubal perceiving the puissance of his enemies to grow and increase hill more and more by little and little, and his own to diminish: and fore-seeing, that unless he made some hardy adventure and prevailed that way, all would be sought and fall to the ground, as it was beginning already to reel, determined to put it to a battail with all speed possible. Scipio also was sharp set, and the more desirous of fight, as well for the good hope, which the success of his former affairs confirmed and increased: as also because, before the armies of his enemies should joyn together, he was more willing to fight with one General and one army, than with all them jointly at once: and yet he had well amended and increased his forces politically of purpose, against the worst, in case he should be driven to fight with many of them together. For, seeing there was no use of ships, because all the Rivers and Seas along Spain, were cleared of the Carthaginian navy, he withdrew his fleet up into the harbor at Taracena, and joyned his Sea-servitors to his Land-souldiers. For armour he had store enough, which was either taken in the pillage of Carthago, or newly made after the winning of the Town, by so many Artificers and Craftsmen that he kept there hard and close at work. With this power, Scipio in the beginning of spring departed from Taracena (for now by this time was Lutius returned from Rome, without whose company he was not willing to enterprise any service of great moment and importance) and led forward against the enemies. As he journeyed peaceably all over the country, and passed through the territories and confines of every City and State, his Allies were ready to entertain and accompany him. Indibilis also and Mandonius among the rest, with all their power met him. Then Indibilis in the name of them both, spake, not like a scottish barbarian foolishly & inconsiderately, but rather with a modest kind of gravity: more like one that exulted excused his revolt and running from the adverse part upon constraint and necessity, than made boast of catching and embracing the vantage thereof upon the first opportunity presented. "I knowfull well (quoth he) that the very name of a fugitive revolt, as it is odious and detestable to old Allies, so it is suspicious to new. And I cannot greatly blame the manner of men in so doing, in case it be not the bare name, but the double dealing that causeth the hatred. Then he reckoned up his own good turns and deserts done unto the Carthaginians on the one side: and recounted their covetousness and pride on the other side, together with their injurious dealings with himself and his people. And therefore, quoth he, this body of mine only hath conversed among them until this day, but my heart and affection hath long since been with them, where I believe verily, that right, justice and religion is regarded and maintained: for even so do we sit as suppliants in humble manner to the Gods also, when we can no longer endure the violence and wrongful outrages of men; Beseeching Scipio this one thing withal, that this histering from the enemy and ranging with him, he would neither blame and condemn presently as a transgression, nor honor and commend as a good desert of his: but as he should find both him and the rest, by good proof from that day forward, even so to make reckoning of them accordingly, and not otherwise. Scipio made answer again, That in truth he would do so: neither would he take them for fugitives and runaways, who judged that they were not bound in conscience to maintain the society and alliance with them as good and lawfull, who made no count at all to observe inviolable, any promise or duty to God or man. Then were their two wives and children brought forth into their fight, and delivered unto them, whom they received, and shed tears abundantly for joy, and so for that day they were had to their lodgings. The morrow after, faith was plight and contracted between them, and the same confirmed by covenant: and they were dismissed to bring their forces, and to shew them before him: and so they quartered and lodged in the same camp with the Romans, next unto their guidance and direction they came unto the enemy. The army of the Carthaginians next unto them was under the conduct of Marcus, near unto the City Rebula. Before his camp, he kept certain standing guards of horsemen. Upon them the light armed forlorn hope of archers and darters of the Roman host which went before the battail to skirmish, likewise they of the forefront and vanguard, charged forcibly with their shot yet so contemptuously, and in scornful wise, even presently upon their travail in journey, and before they had chosen a peece of ground to encamp in, that it was soon seen what heart there was in both parts. For, the Cavalry of the enemies fearfully fled, and were driven into the camp: but the Romans advanced with banners displayed hard to the very gates: and so forth that day their flocks were only up and provoked to a fight, and then the Romans pitched their tents. Asdrubal in the night retired his army to a mount, which in the top had a broad plain. Behind this hill thereto ran a river the fore-front thereof, and the fides all about the skirts were compassed as it were with a steep bank standing plumb upright. There lay order this hill top another plain lower than the other, which also was enclosed round about with the like bank, as difficult for ascent as the former. The next day Asdrubal, after he saw the enemies standing arranged before their camp, sent down his Numidian horsemen, the light armedlanders also of the Balaers, and likewise the Africans. "Then Scipio rode about all the regiments, ensignes, and ranks of his army, marshalled as they stood in battail wise, and shewed unto them their enemies, how they despaired afore-hand to fight on equal and even ground, how they taking the vantage of the hills, braved and shewed themselves, presuming and trusting upon the place, and not upon their own valour and strength of arms. Howbeit (quoth he) Carthage had higher walls, and yet the Roman soldiery were able to scale and get over: neither Hills nor Castle, nor, nor the very Sea, stood in their way then, nor stopped them of their entry. And as for these high places which the enemies are possessed of, they haply may serve their turns well; when they shall take their flight, and leap from off the steep banks, and run down-hill apace, and so get away. But I trow, I shall debar them there, and lay a block in their way on every side. Whereupon he commanded two squadrons, the one to keep the streights of the valley, through which the river runneth: the other to beset the passage that leadeth from the City into the fields, and crosseth overhwart the hill side above said. Himself led the light appointed vancurriers, who the day before had quartered the guards and wards of the enemies, to affront the light armed soldiery, that were not impeached nor hindered other wise than by the wellthought passages. But afterward, when they were come within shot, at the very first they were welcomed with a mighty volley of all sortspouring (as it were) like hail upon them. Himself answered them again, and recharged upon them, letting drive and discharging the stones which lay strewd all over the ground: and were such in manner all, as might be welded and flung from them with ease. And not only the soldiery, but lackies and horse-boyes, & such as followed the camp, were intermingled amongst the armed companies. And albeit the ascent up the hill was hard, and they were pelted and almost overwhelmed with darts and stones, yet being so injured as they were to clime wals, and refold the which, they mounted up fitt to the top: and so soon as they had got some even grounds, where they might have fute footing, they found the enemy, (who was light and nimble, and able to run to and fro, and to save himself, and shift well when he was far off, all the time that they skirmished aloof, and plaid upon one another with light shot) now that they came to close fight, and to hand-strokes, not able to stand his ground: and so they drove him from his place, and with great slaughter chased him and set him back to the very battel, that stood upon the higher hill. Then Scipio having given commandment to these, for to follow on the train of their victory, and to enter up still upon the main battel of the enemies, parted the rest of his forces, together with Laelius, willing him to coast along and wheel about on the right hand of the mount, until he found some way of easier ascent himself on the left hand, fetched no long circuit and compass, until he came crose overhwart the flank of the enemies. Hereupon first began their battel to be disordered, whilst they were desirous to turn their wings, and to oppose their ranks and squadrons against the noises and shouts which rang every where about them. In this tumultuous trouble, Laelius also was got up: and while the enemies drew backward and gave ground, because they would not be charged behind on their back, the vanguard of their part was displayed and lay open: and so the Romans even of the middle battel also, had a line and spacious room to get up and enter upon them: who never had been able to have gained the ground, and won the plain above, (considering the disadvantage of the steep bank) so long as the ranks had stood unbroken, and the Elephants were opposed against them before the Ensigns, in the forefront. Down went the enemies now on every side, and were pitcously killed: and Scipio, who with his left wing encountered the right, charged and plaid especially upon the naked sides of the enemies. And so by this means they had no way left them to flee and escape clear. For the Roman guards on both hands, as well on the left as the right, had beset all the passages. And as for the gate of the camp, the General himself, and the other Captains and officers of the Camp, had taken it up as they fled that way: besides the combesom trouble of the Elephants, whom being now affrighted, they feared no less then their enemies. So there died of them 8000. Asdrubal, who before the conflict had made sure work with all the money, and taken it with him, sent the Elephants before, and having rallied as many as he could, of them that fled and escaped out of the camp, he made haste along the river Tagus, toward the mountain Pyrenaeus. Scipio being now master of the enemies camp, after he had given to the soldiers all the pillage and spoil, but only the prisoners, such as were freemen: whom he came to take the number of the captives, found they were ten thousand footmen, and two thousand horse. Of which number, as many as were Spaniards he set at liberty and sent them home without ransom. But as for all the Africans, he commanded the Treasurer to make money of them. Then the whole multitude of the Spaniards, as well those that before had yielded themselves, as they that were taken prisoners the day before, saluted him with great content and general voice, by the name and title of King. Whereupon Scipio, after silence made by the cries, said, "That he took the name of * L. General or Commander, to be the greatest of all other names, by which his own soldiers used to call him. As for the title of King, howsoever in other places it was great and honorable, at Rome surely it was odious and intolerable. For his own part, the mind indeed he carried of a King, and if they deemed it to be the highest honour that can fall to the nature of man, let them judge so in their own hearts secretly, and please themselves with that title: only he wished them to forbear the word and term thereof. These very Spaniards, as barbarous as they were, perceived by this speech how haughty and magnanimous he was, who in all height of spirit contemned that as a base thing, whereas in admiration only of the very title, all mortal men besides are amazed and astounded. After all this, he bestowed upon the Princes and great Potentates of the Spaniards, sundry gifts. And of the hories, whereof he had taken in the field and camp great store, he gave Indibilis the choise of three hundred where he would. When the treasurer was telling the Africans, according to the General his commandment, he hapned upon a young sprigall and stripling, of rare and singular beauty: and hearing that he was of royal blood, he sent him to Scipio. And when Scipio demanded of him who he was, and what country-man, and wherefore at those years he was in camp among rude soldiery: "I am (saith he) a Numidian born, and with that his eyes stood full of water) and in my country they call me Masaniassa. Being left and orphan and fatherless, I was brought up with my grand-father by the mother side, Gala, the King of the Numidians. And with my uncle by the mother, Masaniassa, who was lately come with a power of horsemen to aid the Carthaginians, it was my hap to fall over into Spain. And never to this day have I been in any battel, by reason that Masaniassa would not in regard of my tender age, suffer me in any hand to go to the wars." Howbeit that very day when the battail was fought with the Romans, unawares to my said uncle, I secretly got an horse under me, and came upon my back, and went forth into the field: where my horse chanced to fall, and cast me down headlong on the ground: and so it was my fortune to be taken by the Romans. Scipio gave order that this Numidian youth should be kept safe, and so proceeded to finish matters that were brought before him, as he sat upon the Tribunal in martial court. And after he was come back from thence into his royal pavilion, he called the party again before him, and asked him, whether he were willing to return again to Masaniassa. Whereat the tears gushing out of his eyes for joy, yea full fain (qd. he) and with all my heart. Then after he had given the young gentleman a ring of gold, a coat embroidered with purple stud-wise, with a Spanish soldierys cape, a golden clasp or button, & a brave couler, with all the furniture & caparison thereto belonging, he sent him away, and commanded certain horsemen to safe-conduct and accompany him, so far as he would himself. Then Scipio fell to consult about the war. Some there were that advised him, presently to pursue Asdrubal: but he supposing that to be a dangerous course, for fear lest Asdrubal should joyntly their forces to his, he sent only a good guard to keep the passage of the hill Pyrenaeus, and imploied the rest of the summer, in receiving homage and fealty of other States of Spain.

Within few days after the battel at Baenla, when as Scipio in his return to Taracon, was gone past the chafe or forreil of Castulo: Asdrubal the son of Gisco and Mago, the two Generals, arrived out of the farther province of Spain unto Asdrubal the son of Amilcar. But they came a day after the fair, and too late to help an overthrow past already: yet in very good time, to give counsel for the managing and executing of the war behind. Thereas they conferred together, concerning the disposition of the Spaniards, and how they stood affected in the countries of each province, only Asdrubal the son of Gisco was of opinion, and perswaded, That the utmost tract and coast of Spain, which lieth upon the Ocean and Gades, was hitherto unacquainted with the Romans, and therefore fast enough and sure to the Carthaginians. But the other Asdrubal and Mago, were of another mind, and agreed in this, That Scipio with his favours and benefits had possessed the affections and hearts of all men already, both in general, and also in particular, and that there would never be an end of sliding from them, and siding to the Romans, before that all the Spanish souldiers were either removed into the farthest parts of Spain, or conveyed over into France. And therefore, albeit the Senat of the Carthaginians had not granted out any such aid and commission, yet there was no remedy, but that Asdrubal must go over into Italy, where Anibal was the head of the war, and in whom lay the main chance of all: by which means also he might withdraw out of Spain all the Spaniards, far enough from the naming and hearing of Scipio. For Asdrubal his army, as well by falling away and revolting to Scipio, as also by the late defeat much empairod, was to be replenished again with new souldiers. Moreover, that Mago should deliver his army to Asdrubal the son of Gisco, and himself in person cross over into the Baleares Islands, with a great sum of money, to wage new aids and succours from thence. And that Asdrubal the son of Gisco, with his army should retire farther up into Portugal, and not encounter the Romans at all in any hand. And that out of all the Cavalry there should be choien out the very flower and strength, to the full number of 3000, for Masaniassa, and that he should range and overrun all the hither Province of Spain, partly to help the distressed Allies, and partly to spoil the enemies towns, and forrage their lands. After these orders and directions laid down, the Generals departed asunder to the execution of these determined designments. Thus yeice what were the affairs and occurrences of Spain for that year.

At Rome the fame of Scipio grew greater every day then other, Fabius for the winning of Tarentum, albeit he gat it rather by craft and policy, then by force and vertue, was glorious therefore. The name of Fulvius began to age and decay. Marcellus grew also into an ill name and some obloquy, both for that at first he had a foil, and also because he suffered Anibal to range over Italy his pleasure, and himself at mid-summer had retired his souldiers to Venusia to take up there (as it were) their winter quarters. He had a fore adversary in the City, one C. Publius Bibo, a Tribun of the Commons: who from the very first time of that difcomfiture, with continual speeches and Orations brought Claudius into hatred and infamy with the common people, and now was in hand with them to deprive him of his government. However, the friends and kinsfolk of Claudius obtained thus much, That Marcellus leaving his Lieutenant at Venusia, should repair to Rome for to make his purgation, and acquit himself of such crimes as his adversaries objected and laid against him: and that during his absence, they should not treat nor debate about his deprivation.

It happened much about one time, that both Marcellus came to Rome to meet with the shamefull slander that ran on him, and to save his honour; and also Q. Fulvius the Consul, about the new election for the year following. The question touching the government of Marcellus, was debated and handled in the lists or Circus, called Flaminianus: and a great assembly there was, and much concourse of the Commons, and of people of all degrees and calling. The Tribun accused not Marcellus only, but all the nobility: by whose fraudulent practise, and by whose cold and delayful proceedings, it was come to pass, that Anibal now these ten years had remained in Italy (as it were) in his province continually, where he had had a greater part of his life, then at Carthage in his native country. And now (quoth he) the people of Rome taste the fruit, proceeding of proroguing and continuing of government still in one person. For since what is come of it: Marcellus his name hath been twice defeated and fallen upon the enemies sword, and now, forsooth, is hoisted in Venusia for burning. But Marcellus so confuted this accusatory speech of the Tribun, by recounting his own worthy noble acts; that not only the Bill preferred for the deposing him out of his room, was dismissed, and the neck of it broken, but also the next day after, all the Centuries with one general voice created him Consul. There was joined with him companion in government T. Quintius Crispinus, who then was Pretor. The morrow after were the Pretors chosen, to wit, P. Licinius Crassus Dives, who was at that time the Arch-bishop, P. Licinius Varus, Sec. Julius Caesar, and Q. Claudius Flamen.

During the time of this solemn Parliament or Session for the election of Magistrates, the City was much disquieted for the revolt of Herrania: C. Calpurnius who ruled that province as Pretor, had by his letters given notice, that the beginning thereof arose from the Aetrians: and therefore immediately M. Marcellus the Consul elect, was thither sent with commission to look into the matter, and (if he thought it requisite) to lead for his forces, and to translate the war out of Apulia into Umbria. For fear whereof, the Tuscan pulled on their heads, and were quiet.

The Aetrianque Embassadors made suit for peace, and that together with their freedom they might enjoy their own laws. And this answer was returned by the Senat, That they should come again when Fabius the Consul was returned to Rome. The Roman Games, and also the plays called

A called Plebeii, were exhibited that year, and renewed one day apeece more then ordinary. The Ediles of the chair were L. Cornelius Caudinus, and Servilius Sulpinus Galba: but those of the Commons were C. Servilius, and Q. Cecilius Metellus. As for Servilius, it was denied, that he had been Tribun of the Commons before, or now Edile by right and order of law, because it was now for certain known, that his father (of whom the opinion went current for ten years that he was slain by the Boians about Minucia, at what time as he was Triumvir for the division of lands) was now living, and in the hands of the enemies in slavery and bondage.

In the eleventh year of the Punick war, M. Marcellus entred his consulship the fifth time (so you reckon upon that Consulship which he never bare through, because there was an error committed in his creation) and with him T. Quintius Crispinus. To both Consuls the Province of Italy was assigned, and both armies of the Consuls the former year. There was a third army then at Venusia, whereof M. Marcellus had the conduct. Of these three, they were to chule two, which they would; and the third remaining, was to be committed unto him, who was by lot to have the government of Tarentum, and the Salentines. The rest of the Provinces were thus divided amongst the Pretors. P. Licinius Varus had the jurisdiction civil, and P. Licinius Crassus, (then Pompeius Magnus), that of the forraigners, and to go whither soever the Senat thought good to send him. Unto Sec. Julius Caesar befall Sicily, and to Q. Claudius Flamen the City of Tarentum. Q. Fulvius Flaccus had his commission renewed, to continue in government for one year longer: and he was appointed to govern (as was had been the charge of T. Quintius the Pretor, and to have under his hand the command of one legion. Likewise C. Hostilius Tubulus remained still in office, and that as Pro-pretor he should succeed C. Calpurnius, and have the conduct of two legions. Moreover L. Viturcius Philo had his authority & government confirmed to him anew, that as Pro-pretor he should sit Lord Deputy in the same province of France, and have the same two legions as before, when he was Pretor there. The like decree, that was granted for L. Viturcius, pulled also in the Senat for C. Aruentinus, and a bill was propounded unto the people for the proroguing and continuance of his office, who as Pretor ruled the Province of Sardinia with the strength of two Legions. And for the defence and guard of the said Province he had an addition of fifty ships of war, which P. Scipio had lent out of Spain. P. Scipio likewise and M. Sallustius, held still, by virtue of a decree, their provinces of Spain, and commanded the same armies for one year longer. As for Scipio, he had direction to lend over into Sardinia fifty ships; out of those heighly which he had under his hand, either taken with him out of Italy or won from the enemy at Carthage, because there ran a rumor, that there was great preparation at Carthage for a navy that year, and that the Carthaginians would take up, and fill all the sea coast of Italy, Sicily and Sardinia, with an Armado of two hundred sail. Invisibly the government was divided in this manner. Sec. Julius Caesar had the leading of the Cannian Army: M. Valerius Licinius (for his government also was confirmed for a year longer) the charge of that fleet of seventy ships, which rid about Sicily: with commission to add thereto, those thirty ships which the former year lay before Tarentum; and with this Armado consisting of one hundred sail, to put over into Africa, if he thought so good, and there to forrage and fetch booties. Over and besides, R. Sulpicius was for one year longer to continue in office, and to govern the provinces of Maechia and Greece, with the force of the said Navy which he had before. As touching the two legions which remained about the City of Rome, there was no alteration. Only the Consuls were permitted to levy and enrol a new supply as need should require. Thus the Empire and State of Rome for that year was maintained with the power of six legions. P. Licinius Varus the Pretor of the City, was charged to repair those thirty old ships, which lay at Hydruntum, and to furnish twenty new built, with sailers and mariners, that with this Armado of fifty sail he might be able to defend all the sea coast near unto the City of Rome. C. Calpurnius was forbidden to remove his forces from Arretium, before a successor came in his place. The same order was given to Tubulus, and to have especially a vigilant eye, that no commotion arose from thence. And then the Pretors went into their provinces.

As for the Consuls they were troubled and made some scruple of conscience to go to their provinces upon the report of some prodigious and ominous signs, and because also in their sanctities they found some gods for propitions and favourable unto them. For out of Campania news came, that in Capua two Temples, to wits of Fortune and Mars, and also some Tombs and Sepulchres, were smitten with lightning: and besides (see how vain and preposterous superstition, importeth even the least trifling things to the hand of God) that certain Mice, forsooth, in a Cuspe of Capua gnawed the holdy Altar in Capua, a great swarm of Bees settled in the very marketplace. Moreover, that the Wall and one of the Gates at Hydruntum was blasted and bricken with lightning: that in Carthage a Gripe fled into the Church of Asclepius. That at Polis, there was a Pool flowed with blood: in regard of these strange and wondrous tokens, there was a devout supplication for one day. And for certain days together, greater beasts were killed for sacrifices, without any good token: and for a long time the grace and favour of the gods could not be obtained. But yet the fortune of the Common-weal stood the higher, and all this anger and mischance, proceeded by those wonders, light upon the head of the Consuls alone, and their death executed all the rest. The Playes called Apollinarian, in the year of Q. Fulvius and Sec. Claud. Consuls, had been by P. Cornel. Sulla Pretor of the City, first exhibited: after whom all the Pretors ever after did the like. But they vowed them a year before, and performed them on a day uncertain. The same year happened a grievous plague both in the City and in the Countries about, which yet in the end turned rather to long and chronick diseases, then to sharp and deadly maladies. For this pestilence there was not only iolemn going in procession, in all the high streets, carrefours, and croses ways throughout the City: but also P. Licinius Varus Pretor of the City, was commanded to propound unto the people, that the Playes above said should be vowed for ever against a set and determinat day. Himselfe therefore was the first that vowed them, and exhibited them upon the third day before the Nones of July, and the same day ever after was observed and kept holiday for that purpose.

51 day of Iuly.

As the rumor of the Aretins revolt encreased daily greater, so the LL. of the Senat were careful about it every day more then other. Letters therefore were sent unto C. Hostilius, that he should without delay take pledges of the Aretines: and C. Terentius Varro was sent with commission, to receive the said hostages at his hands, and to bring them to Rome. He was no sooner come, but Hostilius presently commanded that one legion, which lay in camp before the town, should enter the City with banner displayed, and there he put sufficient guards in places convenient. Then having called and summoned the Senators to appear in the market place, he demanded of them hostages. And when the Senat requested but two days respite to consider of the matter, he made proclamation, that either they should deliver them presently, or else the next day he would seize upon all the Senators children every one. Then he commanded the Colonels, the Captains of the Allies, and the Centurions, to ward the Gates, that none might go forth of the City by night. But this was hickly and negligently executed, for seven principal Senators, before the warders were set at the gates, escaped forth with their children before night. The morning by break of day, when the Senat began to be cited into the Common Hall, these parties were killed, and their goods confiscated, and sold in port-sale. Of the rest of the Senators, their children were taken hostages to the number of 120. and were delivered to C. Terentius, for to be conveyed to Rome: who when he came into the Senat, made such relation of the matter, that the suspicion of their revolt was much more pregnant then before. And therefore, as if some insurrection had like presently to grow from Tuscan, C. Terentius himself was commanded to conduct one of the two legions about the City of Rome, unto Aretium, and there to lie in garrison whith for to keep the town in order. And it was thought meet that C. Hostilius with the army besides, should survey and visit the whole Province, and to be careful and circumspect, that no occasion nor opportunity might be given unto them, that were minded to seek alteration and to rebel. C. Terentius so soon as he was come to Aretium with the legion, when he called unto the Magistrates for the keys of the gates, and they made answer that they were but mislaid aside and could not be found: supposing that they were rather cautiously laid out of the way for the nonce, than lost by negligence, caused other keys and locks to be made, and set upon every gate: and took as great heed and care as he could, to have all under his own hand. He gave especial warning also to Hostilius as touching the Tuscans, and told him, that he should never hope to rest in security, that they would not rebel, unless he took order with them beforehand, that they possibly could not rebel.

After this, there was much debate and contention in the Senat about the Tarentines, even before Fabius, whilmes himself excused and defended them whom he had conquered and subdued by force and arms: but others were mightily offended with them, yea, and most of them gave out plainly, that they were full as faulty as the Campanians, and deserved no less punishment. And so there was an act of the Senat granted according to the opinion and advice of M. Acilius, that the town should be held with a garrison, and all the Tarentines kept from stirring out of the City: and that the matter should further be debated and decided afresh another time, when the state of Italy stood in better terms of peace and quietness. And the like contention and variance was among the LL. of the Senat touching M. Livius Consable and Captain of the Cattle of Tarentum, whilmes some were of mind to condemn him as in great fault, because through his carelessness and sloth, Tarentum the City was betrayed to the enemy: others again awarded him good consideration and reward, for that he kept the fort so well by the space of five years, and by his means especially and by none else Tarentum was recovered. But some were of opinion between these and said, that the discussing and determination of that matter pertained properly to the Censors and not to the Senat: of which judgement Fabius also himself was. And this moreover he said withal, that he must needs confess, that true it was, which Livius his friends in the Senat stood so much upon, and iterated to often, namely, that he was the only means that Tarentum was recovered: for in good faith, quoth he, it never could have been regained if it had not once been lost before.

T. Quintius Crispinus one of the Consuls, went to the army which Q. Fulvius Flaccus had, with a new supply into the Lucans colony. But Marcellus still was laid behind upon occasion of new scruples of conscience, and sundry objects that troubled his mind, and kept a hammering in his head one after another. Amongst which, this was one, that having toward in the Gauls war at Clasidium, a Temple to Honor and Virtues the dedication of the said Church was hindered by the Bishops, who said, that one Chapel, by sight and according to their ceremonies, served but for one Saint, and could not be consecrated unto more. For in case it should be blasted and smitten by fire from heaven, or otherwise some prodigious token hap therein, hardly could the right expiation and purging thereof be performed, because it might not be known, to which of the famous or gods the sacrifice should be done: for by order one sacrifice could not serve twain, unless there were some particular and especial gods named. So there was said to be another Chapel

A built for Virtues: and great hast there was made for the rearing thereof, and yet it was not his fortune ever to dedicate those chapels. So at length he set forward and put himself on his journey with a supply, unto the army which he had left the year before at Venusia.

When Crispinus minded to assault Locri in the country of the Brutians, because there went a great name of Fabius for the assailing and winning of Tarentum, he sent for all kind of artillery and engines out of Sicily, and ships also were brought from thence, for to batter that part of the City that lieth to the Sea side. But the enterprise went not forward, because Annibal had removed, with all his forces to Lacinium. And besides, the news went that his colleague had already brought out his forces from Venusia, with whom he was desirous to joyn. And therefore he returned out of the Brutians country into Apulia: and so between Venusia and Brutia, the Consuls encamped severally, within three miles one from the other. Annibal likewise was retired into the same country, considering that the war was turned from Locri. There the Consuls (hot men of nature both) almost every day led forth their men into the field, not doubting but if Annibal onemer them (having two Consular armies joyned together) to make a dispatch of the war once for all. Annibal because the year before, he had twice affronted Marcellus, and both given and taken the foil: like as he had great reason, as well to fear as to hope, if he were to encounter and fight with him alone: to he thought verily, that he was never able to make his part good with both the Consuls together. And therefore laying off his Lyons skin, he took himself wholly to his old Foxes coat and sought all means and opportunities to lay a train for to entrap them. Howbeit there passed some light skirmishes between both their camps, with variety of fortune and inter-bangeable success. By which, the Consuls thinking that they should hold out and keep the enemies play, during the summer season, and yet nevertheless be able to assault Locri, wrote unto L. Cincius, that he should take the Seas, and cross over with his fleet out of Sicily to the City of Locri. And to the end that the Town might be likewise assailed from the Land side, they commanded part of the army which lay in garrison at Tarentum, to be conducted thither. Annibal having intelligence afore-hand of these things, by certain Thurstins, sent forth certain of his forces to beter the ways from Tarentum. And there under the side of the Perellian mount, he bestowed secretly in ambush two thousand horse, and three thousand foot. Upon whom the Romans (marching without their espials sent afore them) chanced to light, and were slain to the number of two thousand, and upon twelve hundred taken alive: the rest were scattered and fled over the fields and forests back to Tarentum. Now there was a little hill between both the camps of the Cartaginians and Romans, and the same all overgrown with wood, which at first was possessed and kept, neither by one nor other: because the Romans knew not the situation of that side whith lay toward the enemies camp: and Annibal supposed verily that it was a place fitter for to lay an ambush than to encamp in: and therefore he sent by night for that purpose, certain troops of Numidians, and bestowed them closely in the mids of the wood, and not one of them stirred all the day long out of their standings, for fear lest either their armour or themselves might be espied a far off. In the Roman camp, every man generally was of mind, and let not to say, that the said hill was to be seized and fortified for their use, with a good fortress built upon it, for fear lest if it were first gained by Annibal, they should have the enemy as it were over their heads ready to annoy them. And Marcellus himself was of the same opinion: whereupon, Why go not we our selves in person (quoth he, to his colleague) with some few horsemen, to view and consider the place, where our eyes shall be our judges: and seeing the ground once, we shall resolve more certainly what course to take? Crispinus liked well of the motion: and so they went forward accompanied with two hundred and twenty horsemen of which forty were Fregellans, the rest all Tuscans. There followed after them, M. Marcellus, the Consul his son, and Aulus Manlius, two Colonels: also L. Arrenius and M. Aulus, two Captains of the allies. Some Authors have set down in writing, that Marcellus the Cos. sacrificed that day: and when the first beast was killed, the liver was found without an head: howbeit in the second, all things appeared that were wont to be seen. But in the head of that liver there shewed I wot not how, a kind of extraordinary excellence: which the Soothsayer had no liking to, because after those winds which seemed before short and unperfect, and milking: now those again were seen too well fed and overgrown. But the Consul Marcellus was so hot and desirous to fight with Annibal, that he thought himself never encamped neer enough unto him. And even then also as he went forth out of the camp, he gave order to his soldiers to be ready at a short warning, and have their eye upon the place: that presently he liked the hill, for which they went to view, they should dislodge, truss up bag and baggage, and follow presently. Now there was a little flat and plain ground before the camp, from whence the way that led unto the said hill, was on every side very open and evident to the eye: where there lay a scout or spie, set of purpose to discover any of the enemies gone far from the camp: and ranging abroad either for fowle or forage, that they might be intercepted: and not for any hope of great effect as fell out. This shew gave a sign unto the Numidians, that all at once they should arise out of their lurking & starting holes. And they that from the top & ridge of the hill, were to rise & shew themselves affront, never appeared & made head before that they had set a compass about, for to shut up the passage at the back of the Romans. And then from all parts they began to start up & with a main shout charged & ran upon them. The Consuls now were in that valley, from whence they neither could possibly get up to the pitch of the hill, possessed aforehand by the enemy: nor had any place of safe retreat behind, for that they were invironed & hemmed in in the affairs and state of Greece. As concerning a peace, the consultation was put off and referred to the general Council of the Acha: and for the said Diet or Council, was a place appointed, and a certain day set down and published. And in the mean space, a truce obtained for thirty days.

Then the King departed from thence, and through Thessaly and Boeotia, came to Chalcis in Euboea, for to put by Attalus (whom he heard say to be coming with a navy for Euboea) from arriving in any havens, or landing in any place on the sea coast. Then leaving a guard behind for to withstand Attalus, (if haply in the mean season he should chance to pass over) he marched him forward with some few horsemen and light armed footmen, and came to Argos. There by the suffrages and voices of the people, the honour of exhibiting and celebrating the solemn games, called Hera and Nemea, was recommended unto him, because the Macedonian Kings give out & I say, that they are defended from the very games and palmities, to the Council of his allies long before proclaimed, as is above said. Much debate there was for a small end of the Attolians that neither the Romans nor Attalus might have any occasion to come into Greece. But the Attolians merrily all this before the time of the truce was well expired: by occasion that they heard, that Attalus both: was come to Egina, and the Roman navy anchored at Naupactum. For being called into the Council of the Acha, in which the same Embassies were, who before at Phaleria had treated for peace, first they complained, that some things had been done, during the time of the truce, against the faith of the covenant and accord. But at last they flatly denied and said, That there could not possibly be an end of wars, unless the Acha rendered Pylos unto the Messenians; and peace were granted and returned to the Romans, and likewise to the Athamans, to Scardelus, Plenatus, and Archidai. Whereat Philip was very wroth, and thought it a foul indignity, that conquered persons should take upon them to article and capitulate with him their conqueror. "But neither heretofore (quoth he) gave I audience to the treaty of peace, nor yielded consent to truce upon any hope I had that the Attolians would ever be quiet: but to this end, that all confederate friends might bear witness that I sought means of peace, and they sought occasions and pick quarrels for war. So without conclusion of any peace, he dissolved the Diet: leaving four thousand soldiers for the defence and guard of the Achaans, and receiving of them five ships of war, (which if he had joynted to the armada of the Carthaginians, lately sent unto him, and also all those ships which were coming out of Bithynia from King Prusias, he determined to allot the Romans with ship-fight, who had a long time been mighty masters of the Seas) himself presently from that Council departed back to Argos: for now the time drew neerer of the games Nemea, which he was desirous to celebrate and honour with his presence. Whiles the King was occupied in the preparation of these games and palmities, and solaced himself during their festival holidays, with more liberty of mind and repose, than he should in time of war: P. Sulpitius having looked from Naupactum, arrived with his fleet between Sicyone and Corinth, and waited that goodly territory, most renowned of all other for fruitfulness of all things. The noise and rumor of this occurrence awakened Philip, and caused him to leave his disports: and so he took his Cavalry with him in halt and fetterward, having given order that the Infantry should follow freight after: where he found the Romans straggling here and there all over the country, laden with booty and prizes; (as who feared nothing in the World less) let upon them, and drove them to their ships. Thus the Roman fleet nothing well apprised for the booty they had gotten, returned to Naupactum. And Philip greatly augmented the solemnity and magnificence of the games that were behind by the fame of a victory over the Romans at that time, how much or little soever it was. And with great joy and mirth were those holy-days kept: and so much the more, because the King for to please the people withal, laid aside the diadem of his head, put off his purple robes and other princely and royal habit, and in outward port bare himself equal to others, and no better: a thing right acceptable and pleasing to free States, as nothing can be more. By which deed of his, he had given great and undoubted hope unto all men, of liberty and freedom: but that he flained and marred all again with his intolerable lust and looseness of life. For he used to go ranging up and down with one or two of his favourites in company, and did nothing else but haunt the meanest of the Sea side day and night in disguised manner: and thus by debasing himself to the meanest estate of a private person, the less he was suspected and known, the more dissolute he was: and while he pretended unto others a vain show of freedom, he abused all to his own licentiousness. Neither paid his purse for all his pleasures, nor with flattering persuasions and fair speeches obtained he his desires: but to accomplish his wickedness, he used oftentimes forcible violence: and dangerous it was both to husbands and parents, to be any thing straight-laced and made goodly by tedious delay and unreasonable severity, to seem but to stay the unbridled lust and appetite of the King. From one of the Princes also of the Acha named Aratus, he took his wife away called Polyxaria, and upon hope and colour of marriage with the King, drew her away with him into Macedon. Having thus with these lewd and wicked pranks passed the time of the solemnity of the Nemean games, and some few dayes over and above: he went to Dyma for to dislodge the garrison of the Attolians, which they had sent for and received into the City (of Dyma) from the Eleans, Cycliades (who was the sovereign or chief magistrat of that state) and the Acha met the King at Dyma: who as they hated the Eleans, because they differed from the rest of the Achaans, so they were maliciously bent against the Attolians, whom they were perswaded, to have stirred the Romans to levy war upon them. So from Dyma they departed, and with joint armies passed over the river Larissa, which divideth the country of the Eleans from the territory of Dyma. The fifth day after they were entered the confines of their enemies, they spent in foraging. The morrow after, in battail array, they presented themselves before the City, having sent out their Horsemen before them to make bravado's before their gates, and all to provoke the Attolians; a kind of people fall of stomack, and ready enough to rally forth and make excursions. Now were they not wate all this while, that sulpitius with fifteen ships had crossed over from Naupactum to Cydon: nor that he had landed four thousand souldiers in the still time of the night (because they might not be seen to march) and entered Elis. And therefore, this sudden and unexpected object put them in a terrible fear, when they saw and knew once again the Attolians and the Eleans, the Roman ensigns and their armor. At the first, the King would have had his men to retire: but afterwards seeing the skirmish was begun already between the Attolians and Tribally, (a kind of Illyrians) and perceiving that his souldiers also were put to it and charged, then the King also himself with his Horsemen assailed the Cohort or Squadron of the Romans. There his Horse was with a dart shot through: and when he had once flung and cast the King forward over his head, there was a cruel and deadly fight on both sides, whilest the Romans laid hard at the Kings, and the Kings men protected and guarded his person. Himself fought right manfully above the rest, considering he was forced on foot, to maintain skirmish among the Horsemen. But afterwards, by reason of the great disadvantage, and seeing many about him stricken down and wounded, he was caught away by his guard, mounted upon another Horse, and so he fled and escaped. And the same day he encamped 5 miles from the City of the Eleans. The next morrow he led all his whole power to a Castle of the Eleans situate near at hand, called Pyrgos: into which he had intelligence that a multitude of the country peasants for fear of being spoiled, were with their cattle driven and retired. This confused, disordered, and naked company he took captive at his coming, presently upon the first charge and onset that he gave: and with that booty helicked himself whole again, and salved the shameful defeat that he had received at Elis. As he was busy in sharing the prizes, and dealing abroad the prisoners, and there were of men some four thousand, and of cattle of all kinds one with another twenty thousand head) there came a post out of Macedon with news, that one Erepus had surprised Lychnidum, by corrupting for a piece of money the Countable of the Castle, and Captain of the garrison there: and that he held in possession certain borough Towns of the Dassaretians, and still raised the Dardanians to Rebellion. The King therefore gave over the Acha and the Attolians war: yet leaving two thousand five hundred armed souldiers of all forts, under the leading of Menippus and Polysphaces for to defend his Allies, he went from Dyma through Achaia, Boeotia, and Beotia; and upon the tenth day came to Demetrius in Thessalia. Where other messengers also encountered him, bringing tidings of a greater insurrection: namely, that the Dardanians had invaded Macedon, and were masters of Orestis, and came down into the plains of Aethrem: and that the rumor was ripe and went current among the barbarous people that Philip was slain. The truth is, in that expedition where-in he fought at Sicyon with those that preyed and made spoil in the country, he was carried by his hot and stomack-full Horse under a Tree, and there against a bough or arm thereof that stood out, he chanced to break a corner of the crest of his helmet at one end. That piece chanced to be found by a certain Attolian, and was brought into Attolia unto Scardelus, who knew by the mark that it was the Kings helmet: whereupon the fame of the Kings death was divulged commonly abroad. After the departure of Philip out of Achaia, Sulpitius who was arrived with his navy at Egina, went forward, and joynted with Attalus. The Acha not far from Messena flock a fortuitous battail with the Attolians and the Eleans. Attalus the King, and P. Sulpitius wintered in Egina.

In the end of this year, T. Quintius Crispinus the Consul, when he had nominated for Dictator, L. Marcianus Tergemnus, for to hold the solemn election of Magistrates, and to let out the games, died of his hurt afore said. Some say he left his life at Tarentum: others in Campane. Thus north of Colbeck slain with at any memorable battail, (a thing never seen afore in any other way) left the Common-wealth desolate, and as it were clean fatherless. Marcianus the Dictator chose for his General of the Horse, C. Servilius, at that time Edile curule. The Senate upon the very fifth day that the L. L. were assembled, gave order to the Dictator, to exhibit the great Roman games, which M. Aemilius the Pretor of the City, whiles C. Flaminius and Cn. Servilius were, had reprinted and vowed for 5 years. Then the Dictator, both let them forth and allowed them for the next five years. But considering there were two Consular armies without their Generals, so neerer unto the enemies: the L. L. of the Senate and the people let all other matters slide, and had a principal care above all things, to create Consuls as soon as possibly they could: and especially, who of virtue and valour should be thought feared and safe enough, from Punic craftiness and deceitful trains. For whereas during the time of all these wars, the over-ably heads and hot spirits of the Leaders, had been ever dangerous and burthful to the state: so in this very year, the Consuls upon immoderate desire to fight with the enemy, was fallen and plunged into a Jeopardy and mischief ere they were aware. Howbeit the immortal Gods had mercy and pity upon the Roman name, in sparing the guileless armies, and punishing the inconsiderate rashness of the Consuls, with the loss only of their own lives. And when the L. L. of the Senate looked about every way, to see if they could spie out any to make Consuls of a

above all others by many degrees, C. Claudius Nero excelled and was the only Paragon. But his comparison with him in the government they were likewise to seek for. As for him, no doubt, they deemed him a singular man and a brave Captain: but yet more forward and eager, than the quality and occasions of this war required, or to be matched with such an enemy as Annibal was. And therefore they thought good to join with him for his colleague, a sober, wise, and prudent man, who might temper and qualify that fierce nature and disposition of his. Now M. Livius, many years ago had been upon his Consulship condemned by the judgement of the people. Which ignominy and reproach he took so grievously to the heart, that he departed into the country, and for many years together, forbore not only the City, but to converse and keep company with men. And almost eight years after his condemnation aforesaid, M. Claudius Marcellus, and M. Valerius Maximus the Consuls, reduced him again into the City. But he ailed to go in old and worn apparel, letting the hair of his head and beard grow long, carrying in his very countenance and air, the fresh and notable remembrance of the disgrace before received. But L. Volumnius and P. Licinius the Censors, compelled him to cut his hair, and lay away his vile and unbecomingly weed, to come into the Senate, and to meddle again in civil matters and affairs of State. And yet in so doing, he would never proceed farther, than to say Amen to other men's opinions, and speak but one word, yea and nay: or else nothing at all, but shew his mind by passing on his seat to one side or other. Until such time as a kinsman of his own, M. Livius Mœnator, being in trouble, and his name and honour called in question, caused him to stand up in the Council-house and deliver his opinion. And when after to long discontinuance, he was seen and heard once to speak, he turned every man his eye upon him, and ministered occasion also of speech in these terms, namely, "That the people had done the man exceeding great wrong, yea, and hurt the common-wealth much, in that during the time of so dangerous a war, there had been no employment of it worth a pence, either for his travail and pains, of his advice and counsel. But to return again to the Lords of the Senate: they knew well, that neither Q. Fabius, nor M. Valerius Livius, could possibly be joined as companion in government to C. Nero: forasmuch as it was not lawful that both should be chosen out of the Nobles or Patritii. And the same was T. Manlius his case also. Besides that, as he once refused the Consulship when it was offered unto him, so should he would not accept thereof the second time if it were tendered unto him. But if they should fort Manlius and C. Claudius together, there would be an excellent couple of Consuls in deed. Neither should the people against this overture, thus moved forth by the Lords of the Senate. The only man in the whole City, that denied it, was the very party himself, unto whom this dignity and honourable place was presented: Who much blamed the levity and inconsistency of the City: saying, "That they had no pity of him, when it was: namely, whilst he was in question and scutled, and during the time of his trouble were poor and simple garments: but now against his will, they clothed him a glittering white robe to stand for a Consulship. Thus (quoth he) they punish and deprecate, thus they honour and advance the same persons. If they took me for a good and honest man, why condemned they me as they did for a wicked one and a knave? If they found me naughty and faulty, what cause have they to trust me with a second Consulship? who used the former so badly, which was committed unto me? As he argued and made complaints in this wise, the Lords of the Senate reproved him, and replied again: setting before his eyes the example of M. Furius, who in times past was called home out of exile: and when the State was decayed and lying along, set it upright again in her former place and pristine glory. And like as the civilities and rigor of parents, is to be mollified by patience, even so the hard and shrewd dealings of a mans country, is to be dulced and mitigated by bearing and sufferance. So they all stuck close together, and chose M. Livius Consul, with C. Claudius. Three days after, they went to the election of the Pretors. And there were created Pretors, L. Porcius Licinius, Caius Manlius, A. Hostilius, and C. Hostilius, both Cato's. When the election was finished, and the games celebrated, the Dictator and General of the Cavalry surrendered their places, C. Terentius Varro was sent into Hetruria as Pro-pretor, to the end that out of that province, C. Hostilius should go to Tarentum, unto that army which T. Quintus the Coll. had. That L. Manlius should go beyond Seas as Ambassador, to see how the world went there: And whilst, considering that in summer, there were to be solemnized the famous games at Olympia, which were celebrated with a most frequent resort and meeting of all Greece, in case he might safely and without impeachment of the enemy, he should visit that great assembly: to the end that if he could light upon any Scythians, who were fled and banished their country, or any citizens of Tarentum, confined thither and sent away by Annibal, they should repair home again into their own countries, and know, that whatsoever they were possessed of, before the war was began, the people of Rome would restore the same, and make good again unto them.

Because it was like to be a right dangerous year, and no Consuls were invested fully into the Common-wealth, all men depended upon the Consuls elect, and were desirous that they should with all speed, cast lots for their Provinces: and every man was willing to know beforehand, what Province each one should rule, and what enemy he was to deal withal. Moreover, a motion and speech there was in the Senat-house, that the Consuls should be reconciled and made friends, and Q. Fabius Max. propounded that first. For there had been notorious enmity and variance between them at one time: and the calamity of Livius made the same more grievous and unportable unto himself: in regard that he was persuaded, how in that misery of his, he was despised

A despised of his adversary. Whereupon he grew to be more implacable of the twain; and worse to be treated. "There needs (quoth he) no reconciliation; neither is it material and to any purpose. For they will do all with more diligence and better spirit, who ever stand in fear that their adversary and concurrent shall grow great and be advanced by their default. Yet the authority of the Senat bare such a stroke with them, that they laid aside all malice and old grudge, and with one mind, consent, and counsel, admitted the affairs of the common-wealth. Their provinces were not intermingled, nor their government extended into one anothers country, as in former years, but distant alunder and divided by the remote frontiers and farthest marches of Italy. For unto one of them were assigned the Brutians and Lucans country against Annibal: unto the other, Gallia against Ashurbanus: who as the rumour and bruit went, was come forward neer unto the Alpes. Of those two armies which were in Gallia and in Hetruria, he whose fortune was to go into Gallia, was to chuse which army he would, and have besides that other of the City. And he whose lot should be to go into the Brutians country, besides the new legions enrolled of citizens, was to take unto him, the army of whether Consul he litt, of the former year. Allo Quinctius Fabius the Pro-consul, had the charge of that army which the Consul refused: and his authority was renewed for one year longer. As for C. Hostilius, whose Province Tarentum they exchanged for Hetruria, they altered his Province again, to wit, Capua instead of Tarentum. Unto him was allowed that one legion which Scipio the last year commanded.

Now increased their care every day more than other, concerning the coming of Ashurbanus into Italy. And the Embassadors of the Massilians had brought newshirts, that he was passed over into Gallia: and that the minds of the Gauls were mightily cheered up by his coming, because the speech went that he had brought a huge deal of gold with him, for to hire and wage soldiers for aid in the wars. Then afterwards, Sex. Amphilus, and M. Relius, who were sent Embassadors back with them from Rome, for to see whether it were to induce, had made relation unto the Senate, that they had lent certain of purpose, guided by the Massilians, who by means of their excellent friends, the Princes and Lords of the Gauls, might learn the truth, and bring word back accordingly. By whose report it was for certain known, that Ashurbanus having loved already a pulsing fame, was minded the next spring to pass over to the Alpes: and that there was nothing else said him, but that it had been done already, saving only the passages of the Alps: which were closed up with the winter snow.

In the room of M. Marcellus, L. Aquilius Pavius was created Augur, and so consecrated, And likewise Cn. Cornelius Dolabella was inaugurated or installed King of the sacrifices, instead of Marcus Minius, who died two years before. In this very time, the City was purged, and there was ageneral survey and numbering of the people, by the Censors taken, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. There were reckoned and entered into the Censors books of Citizens, 137108. A smaller number by much odds, than before the war. It is recorded in the Annals, that this year first after that Annibal came into Italy, the Comitium was built over head and covered. And that the Roman Games were once renewed by the Ediles of the chair, Q. Metellus, and C. Servilius: and that the other Games called Plautii, were renewed two dayes by Q. Manlius, and M. Cæcilius Metellus, Ediles of the Commons: who also offered three images and set them up in the Chappel of Ceres. And the solemn feastival dinner of Jupiter was celebrated by occasion of those Games.

Then C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the second time, entered their Consulship: who (because whilst they were but Coll. elect, they had cast lots for their Provinces) commanded the Pretors to do the like. And to C. Hostilius fell the jurisdiction over the citizens, who had that likewise over strangers and forrainers: to the end, that the other three might go forth into their Provinces. To A. Hostilius, was allotted Sardinia: to C. Manlius, Sicily: and to L. Porcius Pancer. In sum, the legions were in number three and twenty divided into the Provinces in this sort: to wit, and Consuls had two apiece, Spain four. The three Pretors for Sicily, Sardinia, and France each of them twain, C. Terentius in Hetruria commanded two, Q. Fulvius in the Brutians country, other two, Q. Claudius about Tarentum, and the Salentins conducted twain: and Caius Hostilius Tullus at Capua, one. Last of all, two were enrolled for the City. In the four first legions, the people chose all the Colonels or Marshals, but to all the rest the Consuls sent men to make up the defect.

Before the Consuls went forth there was a Novendial sacrifice celebrated because at Vesii it had rained stones from heaven. And after one prodigious sight was once minded and spoken of, there were (as it is commonly seen) others also reported: namely, that in Minerva the temple of Jupiter, and the sacred grove of Marica was smitten with lightning: and at Avella the wall and gate likewise, was blighted with fire from Heaven. The men of Arminia a spike also of a more fearful and terrible thing than that, to wit, that there ran a river of blood in their very gate. Last of all, Gæ Capua was beset the gate at night, and worried and dimembered one of the watchmen. These wonderful signs were expiate with sacrificing of greater beasts, and a supplication was holden for one day, by virtue of a decree from the Prelats. Then was the Novendial sacrifice once again named: because it was seen, that in Arministrum it rained stones. And mens minds were no sooner freed of one religious scruple, but they were troubled again with another. For word was brought, that at Frusino there was an infant born, as big as ordinary a child is at four years of age: And the thing was not to be strange for the bigness of the body, as for that it was both doubtful, whether it were male or female, like as two years before, at Siniffi. The wizards that were sent for out of Herrus, said, that this of all other was a foul and filthy monster, and that it should be had forth of the Dominion of Rome, and drowned in the deep, so as it might touch no ground. Whereupon they put it alive into a coffer, and when they had carried it a good way into the Sea, they flung it in. Moreover the Prelats made a decree, that certain Virgins in three companies, having nine apiece, should go through the City, and sing certain Canticles. And whiles in the Temple of Jupiter Stator, the Maidens were a learning their song by heart, devised and framed in verse by Livius the Poet, the Temple of Queen Juno in the Aventine hill, was stricken with lightning from Heaven. And when the Aruspices had declared that this prodigious token touched the matrons and dames of the City, and that the goddess was to be pacified with an oblation: they were (by virtue of an edict granted out by the Ædiles of the chair) called all into the Capitol, as many as had any house, either in the City of Rome, or within ten miles every way. And they among themselves chose five and twenty into whose hands all the rest should put some small portion of their dowry. Of which there was made a fair and large golden basin, for to be presented unto Juno: and it was brought into the Aventine; and withal, the dames offered unto her purely and chafely their sacrifices. And straight after the Decemvirs proclaimed a day for another sacrifice of the same goddess, the manner and order whereof was this: There were two white heifers led from the Temple of Apollo into the City, through the gate Carmentalis: after them were carried two Images, representing Juno, made of Cyprus wood: then went seven and twenty Virgins in long dress garments, chanting hymns and songs to the honour of Juno. These songs in verse were peradventure commendable, and passed for good with those rude and gross wits then living: but it they should be rehearsed now adays to our fine heads, they would seem but simple stuff, and composed without rime or reason. After this row of Maidens, followed the Decemvirs deputed for sacred Ceremonies, with chaplets and garlands of Baies, clothed in vesture and robes embroidered with purple. From the gate above named, they passed by the street Jugurina into the Grand-place, and there rested this solemn pomp and train. Then these Virgins taking hold of a cord, which went through all their hands, sung a song, and danced the measures, footing it artificially according to the note. From thence they went by the Tufcan street and Velabrum through the beasts market, and so forward into the Circus Publicus, until they came to the Temple of Juno. There the Decemvirs sacrificed two beasts, and the Images of Cyprus wood were offered and set up in the Temple. When the Gods and Goddesses were duly pacified the Consuls took matters more strictly and with greater preciseness, than any man could remember in former years: For both the fear of the war was two-fold, by reason of a new-come enemy into Italy, and also there was less store of youth, out of which the soldiers should be enrolled. Whereupon they compelled the inhabitants of the Colonies by the Sea side, who were said to have an especial immunity of warfare (by a sacred law) to set them down a certain day upon which every man should repair into the Senate, and shew what cards they had for their immunity and vacation. Upon the day appointed there presented themselves before the Senat these Commonalties following, to wit, of Hofia, Alfia, Antium, Anxur, Minerva Siniffi, and Sena from the upper Sea. When every one of these States exhibited and read their charter of immunity, there was none of all them dispensed with, but they of Antium and Hofia in regard the enemy abode in Italy: and to the young and servicable men of those Colonies, were put to their oath and iware, that not above forty of them should lie one night forth of the walls of their Colony, so long as the enemy continued in Italy.

When all the LL. of the Senat were of opinion, that the Consuls were to go forth to the wars with all speed possible (for that both Afrubal was to be encountered coming down the Alps, for fear he should solicit the Gauls on this side the Alps; and the Tufcans likewise who hoped and looked every day for a change and alteration: and also Annibal was to be kept occupied in his own war, that he might not go forth of the Brutians country, and meet with his brother) only Livius made some ray and drew back, as reporting but small trust in the armies belonging to his own Provinces. And as for his Colleague, well he wist, that he had the choice of two notable Consular armies, and of a third, whereof Q. Claudius had the charge at Tarentum. Whereupon he had made some motion of calling the Volones (or volunteers) again to their colours, and to serve in the wars. The Senat granted the Consuls alarge and free commission, both to make supply from whence soever they would, by chusing out of all the armies whom they pleased, and to make exchange with whom they would, yea, and to draw out of the Provinces whomsoever, according as they should think it good for the Common-weal. And all this was executed with the exceeding concord and unity of the Consuls. The Volones were enrolled into the nineteenth and twentieth legions. Some Authors have written, that Scipio sent unto Livius from out of Spain a strong power of auxiliaries for that war, to wit, eight thousand of Spaniards and Frenchmen, two thousand legionary footmen, and eighteen hundred men of arms, partly Numidians, and partly Spaniards; and that Marcus Lucretius brought these forces by Sea: also that C. Marcius sent out of Sicily four thousand archers and slingers.

The fear and troubles in Rome were much increased, by occasion of letters sent out of Gallia from L. Porcius the Pretor: purporting thus much, That Afrubal was removed out of his winning harbours, and was passing over the Alps: that there were eight thousand Ligurians levied and ready in arms, to joyn with him to soon as ever he was come into Italy, unless some one were sent against the Ligurians, to prevent and keep them otherwise busied with war. As for himself, he would with that weak army that he had, go forward, as far as he thought he might with safety. These letters came the Consuls to dispatch the matters in great haste, and to go forth into their Provinces, sooner than they had purposed: with this intent, that both of them as well the one as the other might in his several province keep the enemies occupied, and suffer them not to joyn, and lay their forces together. And verily the thing that helped them most in this their designment, was an opinion and persuasion that Annibal had: For albeit he was assured that his brother would that summer pass over into Italy, yet when he called to remembrance what a toil he had himself, and how much trouble and travail he endured in the passage, one while of the river Rhodanus, and another while of the mountains of the Alps, and how for the space of five months together, he was forced not only to fight with the people, but struggle also with the difficulties of the places; he never looked that Afrubal could so easily and so speedily pass over as he did: which was the cause that he dislodged out of his winning places so much the later. But Afrubal found better expectation, and all things more easy and speedy than either himself hoped for, or other expected. For the Averni, and other nations (by their example) both of France and also about the Alps, not only received and entertained him, but also accompanied him to the war. Over and besides, as he only conducted his army by those passages which were prepared and made open by his brothers journey, and had been sometime unpassable wilds and craggy rags: so against his coming, the Alps were much more easy, by reason of twelve years continual passage to and fro those ways: and the nature of the peasants more civil and tractable. For the people before, being not used to any strangers and aliens, not accustomed to see passengers or travellers coming into those parts, were in manner unociable, savage and wild, and could not away with the society of men. And at the first not knowing whether Annibal intended to go, they supposed that he came for to surprise their holds in caves and rocks, to take their fortresses, and to drive away their people and cattail as booties. But afterwards, the fame that went of the Punick war (where-with now twelve years Italy was plagued and vexed) had taught them sufficiently, that the Alps were nothing but the way for the Carthaginians to travel through. And by this time well they knew, that two most puissant Cities and States, divided and removed one from another by a great space of Land and Sea between, thrived together and warred for their greatness and Sovereignty. Upon these occasions, I say, the Alps were open and passable to Afrubal with ease. But look what time he gained by speedy journeys, the same he lost again by stay about Placentia, whiles he lay there in vain, rather besieging than assaulting it. He was carried away with a persuasion, that the Town leant upon a plain and champion country, might soon be forced and won: and the great name that went of that noble Colony, induced him to believe, that by the overthrow and raising of that City, he should strike a terror to all the rest. But in lying against that Town, he not only hindered himself much, but also staid Annibal: who having heard that he was passed over the Alps, and come down into Italy, so much sooner than he looked for, was upon the point to dislodge out of his standing winning camp. For he considered and cast in his mind, not only what a long and tedious piece of work it is to besiege and assault Cities, but also well remembered how himself after his victory at Trebia, assailed to force that colony in his return from thence, but might not prevail.

The Consuls being departed from the City, and gone divers wayes as it were for two sundry wars at once, distracted mens minds with many cares and troublous imaginations, as well in remembrance of those losses and overthrowes, which they had received at Annibal his first coming: as also in thinking, what gods should be so propitious and favourable to the City and empire of Rome, as to prosper the affairs of the State and Common-weal, at onetime in both. For until then, their success had been variable and alternative: and their prosperity all wayes delayed with flemable adversity: and again, their losses were recompensed with equal gains. For when in Italy the Common-weal of Rome went one way downward heading to the ground at Trasymenus and Canna: the fortune was another way in Spain, set it upright again. Afterwards, when in Spain one overthrow and defeat hapned in the neck of another, at what time as two noble Captains were slain, and two valiant armies in part destroyed: the happy and lucky hand in Sicily and Italy, made up those breaches, and set the reeling State on foot again. For why? the very distance of the place so far remote (because one of the wars was maintained in the farthest part of the World) yielded time and respite to breath themselves and gather new strength. But now, two wars at once are entertained within Italy, two most brave warriors and renowned Captains enclose between them the City of Rome: all dangers come huddle together: all the heavy load and whole burden beareth upon one and the self-same place: and no doubt, but whether of those two Captains first shall get a victory, he will within few days after joyn his forces to the other. The fresh and lamentable remembrance also of the very last year, wherein two Consuls lost their lives, mightily affrighted the hearts of the people. So as, in these perplexities and troubles of minde, they accompanied the Consuls as they departed and went into their several Provinces. It is more over in some records found, that when Q. Fabius advised and warned M. Livinius being upon his journey to ward the war, not rashly and hand over head to give battail to the enemy, before he knew his nature and qualities, he full of anger still and discontentments with his fellow citizens, made this answer, That so soon as ever he could have a sight of his enemies army, he would fight: and being asked again, why he would make such haste? Mary (quoth he) either shall I by victory of mine enemies win singular honor and renown: or by the overthrow of my fellow Citizens gain some hearts safe and contentment, if not honest in all respects, yet at least-wise such as they have deserved.

Before that Claudius the Consul was come into his Province, C. Hostilius Tubulus accompanied with certain cohorts lightly appointed, encountered Annibal as he led his army and marched by the utter confines and marches of the territory of Lavinium, which leadeth to the Salentines; and charging upon his disordered army, put them to great trouble, slew four thousand of his men, and carried away nine Ensigns. Q. Claudius who had certain garrisons planted in all the Cities of the Salentins country, hearing of the enemies coming, had removed out of his wintering camp; and therefore Annibal, because he would not fight with two armies at once, by night dislodged out of the territory of Tarentum, and withdrew himself into the Brutians country: and Claudius turned with his army to the Salentins again. Hostilius in the way to Capua, met with the Consul Claudius at Venusia. There, out of both armies, the Consul picked forth forty thousand choice Footmen, and 2500 Horsemen, for to war with Annibal. The rest of the forces Hostilius was commanded to lead unto Capua, and to deliver them to Q. Fabius the Pro-consul.

Annibal having assembled his forces from all parts, as well those which he had in campaigning winter time, as those that lay in garrison in the Brutians country, came as fast as Grumentum in the territory of the Lucans, upon hope to recover the Towns, which for fear, had revolted to the Romans. Upon the same place the Roman Consil. making out his espials before to discover and clear the ways, marched from Venusia, and about a mile and half from the enemy, encamped himself. The Carthaginians had fortified themselves, and cast a trench close in manner to the walls of Grumentum; and between the camp and the Romans was some half mile. A plain lay in the midst: and on the left hand of the Carthaginians, and the right hand of the Romans all along between, the hills overlooked them, bare and naked, and of neither part suspected, by reason that they had no wood growing upon them, nor any lurking places to hide an ambush in. Into the plain between they used to put out certain bands and companies from the Corpi de guard of both sides, and made light skirmishes not worth the talking of. And it seemed that the duty of the Roman Consul was to keep the enemy in, and not to suffer him to go his ways. But Annibal desirous to be gone, entered the field with all his power in order of battle.

Then the Consul borrowing a little of his enemies cunning, for that in to open hills there was less fear and suspicion of ambush, gave order that five Cohorts and Horsemen, reinforced with as many bands of footmen, should by night get over those hills, and in the Vallies behind, sit down closely: with direction to T. Claudius Asellus a Colonel of footmen, and P. Clandius a Captain of allies whom he sent to conduct them, at a certain time to arise out of ambush, and to charge the enemy: himself by day light led forth all his whole power as well foot as Horse into the field. Within a while after, Annibal likewise put forth the signal of battail: and all the camp over they set up a cry, running all about to their armour and weapons. Then Footmen and Horsemen both rushed space one of the gates who could be soonest forth; and scattered as they were all over the plain, made haste to the enemies. Whom when the Consul saw thus disordered, he commanded C. Antromachus a Tribune or Colonel of the third legion, to put out the Cavalry belonging to that legion, for to charge the enemy with all the violence he could: for that like sheep they were to spread over the plain without all form and fashion, and might be surprised, discomfited, and beaten down, before they could be brought into array and set in order of battail. Annibal himself was not come forth of the camp, when he might hear the noise of them fighting together and hard at it: and excited with this tumult, he led in great haste all the rest of his forces against the enemy. By this, the vanguard and forefront of his battail was fringed with the Horsemen of the enemies: yea, and the first legion of the Infantry and the Cavalry of the right wing began to charge. The Carthaginians disordered as they were, fought at a venture, as they chanced to meet either with Footmen or Horsemen. The conflict grew hotter, by reason of new supplies and fresh succours, and increased still by the number of trouble continually ran out to the fight. And surely Annibal, notwithstanding this tumult and troublesome fear, had set and marshalled his men in good order as they were fighting (which had been no easy thing to do, but that the army was of old soldiers, and their Captain well experienced and beaten to it) if it had not been for the shout of the cohorts and bands above-said, which they heard at their backs, as they from the hills behind ran down upon them; and set them in great fear, lest that they would thrust in between them and home, and so shut them out of their camp. Hereupon I say they were affrighted, and began to flee here and there. But the slaughter was the less, because the camp was near, and far they had not to run thither and save themselves in this their fearful flight. For the Horsemen plaid upon their backs still, and gave not over: the cohorts from the open Mountains ran easily down the hill, and charged crose upon their sides and flanks. Howbeit, there were slain more than eight thousand men, and above 600 taken Prisoners: nine Ensigns won and carried away: of Elephants also (whereof there was little or no use) in a sudden and tumultuary skirmish four were killed, and two gotten alive. Of Romans and Allies, there died two hundred. The next day after, Annibal fitted nor. The Roman Consul having brought his army forth into the field, and seeing none to come abroad: and make head against him, commanded the slain enemies to be disarmed and depolled,

At the spoils to be gathered up, and the bodies of his own men to be brought together into a place and buried. For certain dayes after continually, he pressed to hard at the camp gates, that he wanted but little of entering thither with banner displayed. In to much as Annibal at the third watch of the night, leaving behind him many fires burning, and divers tents standing, on that side especially which looked toward the enemies, and some few Numidians, to make a shew upon the Rampier and at the gates; dislodged, and purposed to go into Apulia. The next morning by day light, the Roman army embattailed, approached the trench and rampier. The Numidians of set purpose shewed themselves in the gates and upon the rampier: and when they had a good while dallied thus and played with the enemy, they mounted on Horseback, and spared no Horie-flesh until they had overtook their fellows. The Consul perceiving that all was quiet within the camp, and seeing not so much as those few appear any where, who in the morning betimes had walked their stations, sent forth two Horsemen into the camp as espials. After he understood for certain that all was safe, and the coasts clear, he commanded his ensigns to make an entry. And staying no longer there, than whilst his soldiers ran up and down to pill and spoil, he founded the retreat: and long before night, brought his army back again. The next morning after, he set forward by the dawning of the day, and with long journey, following his enemies by the voice of the country, and tracing them by their footprints, he overtook them not far from Venusia. There also was a scuffling skirmish between them, and not so few as two thousand Carthaginians slain. From thence Annibal ever marched by night, and journeyed through the mountains, because he would give his enemy no vantage of sight, until he came to Metapontum. From whence Hanno (for he was Captain of the garrison there) was sent with some few in his train into the Brutians country, to levy a new army. And Annibal after he had joyined those forces to his own, returned again to Venusia, by the same way that he came from thence; and so toward he marched to Canusium. Nero never left the enemy, but was ready to tread on his heels, and as he marched himself toward Metapontum, he had sent for Q. Fulvius to repair into the Lucans country, because those parts should not be disarmed of defence.

In this mean space, there were four French Horsemen, and two Numidians, sent to Annibal with letters from Ajdubal, after he was removed from the siege of Placentia: who having travelled in manner all the length of Italy, through the mids of the enemies, whilst they follow after Annibal in his retire unto Metapontum, missed of their way, and light upon Tarentum: where they were encountered by the foragers of the Romans that ranged about the fields, and by them were brought before Q. Claudius the Propretor. At the first they entertained him with flimsy flims, with doubtful and intricate answers: but when the fear of the rack and other tortures, had forced them to tell a truth, they confessed, that they had letters about them to deliver from Ajdubal to Annibal. With those letters sealed as they were, they were committed unto L. Virginius a Colonel, for to be conveyed unto Claudius the Consul. And two troops or Cornets besides of Samnit Horsemen were sent to guard them. So soon as they were come unto the Consul, and the letters read by an interpreter, and some examination taken of these captives: then Claudius considering that the common-weal was not now in that good case, nor the occasion such, that each Governor needed no more, but to make war by the ordinary course of commission, and within the compass and limits of his own Province, with the help of his own army alone, and against an enemy assigned unto him by the Senate: but that some unlooked for adventures must be enterprised, some new designments and unexpected put in execution, which when they are begun and attempted, might make no less wonder and fear among their own friends, that terror among the enemies: and being once performed and done, might turn the former fear into as great joy and gladness; sent the letters of Ajdubal to the Senat at Rome: and withal, himself acquainted the Lords of the Senat what he intended to do. And for as much as Ajdubal wrote unto his brother to meet him in Umbria, he advised them to fend for the legion at Capua to Rome, to take musters also at Rome, and to oppose that army of the City, against the enemy at Narnia. For these were the contents of his letters to the Senat. He dispatched likewise messengers before, through the territories of the Latins, Marucins, Ferentines, and Pretutians, (by whom he meant to lead his army) for to give notice, that all the inhabitants of those parts, should out of their Villages and good Towns, provide and bring forth victuals into the high ways, for to refresh his soldiers: also to come with their Cart-horses, draught-oxen, and other beasts for carriage, together with wains and carts, that the wearied soldiers might ease themselves thereby. Himself out of his whole army, as well of citizens as allies, chose forth the flower and most picked men of all, to the number of six thousand foot, and one thousand horse, and gave it out openly, that he minded to surprise the first City that he came next unto in the Lucans country, and withal, the garrison of Carthaginians that lay there: and therefore commanded them to be ready for the journey and expedition. Thus when he had set forward in the night, he turned his way into Picenum. And the Consul made no more ado, but with long journeys highed him as fast as he could, and led his army directly to his colleague, leaving Q. Titinius his Lieutenant, to guard and command the camp.

At Rome, they were no less terrified and troubled, than they were two years before, at what time as the Carthaginians were encamped before the walls and gates of the City. And men wish not well, what to make of this adventurous and audacious journey of the Consul, whether they should should praise or dilpraise it. And it seemed that they would measure it and report thereof according to the event, than which surely, there is nothing more unjust and unequal. But thus they whispered, "That the camp was left with an army, and without their General, near unto the enemy Annibal yes, and the same guided of all the strength and flour thereof: that the Consul pretended an expedition into the Lucans country, when indeed he went toward Pecum and Gallia, leaving the camp by no one thing more safe and secure, than by the error and mistaking of the enemy, who is altogether ignorant, that the General is gone from thence, and part of the forces with him. But where would they be then, and in what taking should the camp be in case that were known abroad; or if Annibal would either with his whole army follow after Nero, being gone with no more than six thousand? or assault the camp, left as it were for a prey unto him, without forces, without conduct, and without the fortune and good luck of the General to protect it? The old defects received in this war, the fresh remembrance of two Consulships but the last year, increased mens fear. All which misfortunes hapned, when there was in Italy but one Captain General, and one single army of the enemies. Now, of one war of the Carthaginians there are made twain: and two Annibals (as a man would say) be both at once in Italy, right valorous and renowned warriors. For even Asdrubal also, was Annibal his son as well as Annibal, as valiant and redoubted a Captain every way: as who for to many years together in Spain, hath been exercised in the Roman wars, and born the name of achieving a twofold victory, and defeating two armies, with two most noble and famous commanders: and as for expedition and speed in his voyage out of Spain, and for raising the Nations of France up in arms, he may make his boast much more truly than Annibal himself. For even in those very places, where Annibal had lost the greater part of his soldiers, with hunger and cold, (which kind of death of all others is most miserable) this Asdrubal hath levied a power of armed men. Moreover, they that knew Spain well, and the affairs which had passed there, said besides, That he had not to deal with Nero, as with a warrior whom he knew not already; for why? he had when it was, made a Child of Nero, by a good token. That when Asdrubal was by chance in a wood, and could not get out, was put to his shifts; but whiles he trifled out the time with Nero in booking deceitful conditions and capitulations of peace, he shewed him a confounding Carthaginian call, gave him the fair slip, and escaped out of his hands. And to conclude, in all their differences at Rome, they magnified every thing on the enemies part above all truth, and debated all their own means of help beneath all reason: such was their fear, which interpreteth and construeth all to the worst.

Nero to his soldiers.

Nero, when he had now gained to much ground, and was gone so far from the enemy, as it had not mattered much if his designs had been revealed and made known unto him for any danger that might ensue thereof: called his soldiers before him, and spake some few words to this or the like effect. "Never was there deignment (sqd. he) of any General in the field, in outward show more dangerous, in deed and truth more safe and secure, than this of mine. I lead you to a certain and assured victory, even to that war, unto which my colleague would not go before the Senate had allowed him to his full contentment, greater power both of foot and Horse, and the same better set out and more furnished, than if he should have gone against Annibal himself: and therefore whatsoever small posse and adition of forces you bring thereto, you shall (I say thereby) the whole, and as it were weigh down the balance. For when the enemies ready embattailed to fight, shall hear (and before that time, I will tell order I row, that they shall not hear) that another Consul and another army is come, no doubt the day will be ours, and they shall yield us the victory. For it is a fame & name only, that fighteth the field & determineth battails. And small matters many times carry away the game, and cause mens minds both to stoop for fear, and to rise with hope. And verily, of a well fought field you are they that shall reap the fruit & gain the glory. For alwayes it is seen, that a little help that cometh last, is more than all besides & seemeth to effect the whole. And you see yourselves, with what concourse, with what admiration, with what affectionat favour all men do entertain & regard you by the way. And in every truth, as they marched along in their journey, it was a world to see, how both men & women flocked out of all the villages of the country to see them, how they forced themselves into companies & degrees to welcome them; and how as they passed as it were in a lane through them, they made vows in their name, they poured out their prayers in their behalf: & dealt praises among them: calling them the very guard & defence of the Common weal, the saviours & redeemers of Rome: & the Roman Empire: acknowledging that the lives and liberties of themselves and their children, lay in their right hands, and depended upon the force of their arms: praying to all the gods and goddesses, and to all the holy halows of heaven, to vouchsafe them a lucky journey, a fortunate fight, and a speedy victory over their enemies: wishing heartily, that they might be bound and condemned (as it were) to pay and perform their vows, which in their name they had undertaken & promised: desiring earnestly, that as now they went along, & accompanied them with careful minds for fear of the peril which they went unto, so after few days they might meet with them upon the way with joyful hearts, as they return with triumph for their victory. Every man for himself in particular invited them friendly, offered them frankly, entreated and besought them importunately, that all things whatsoever they stood in need of, either for themselves or their beasts, they would receive at his hands gratis: as being ready to afford them all most liberally, helpful, and with the better. The soldiers again, for very modestly to take no more than was very needful and necessary, no no stay they would make with any, nor one jot depart from their colours. Their meat they took by the way as they went, journeying night and day, and scarce allowing their bodies rest and sleep to content their weak nature that looked for it. Now had Nero sent afore-hand to his brother Consul certain Courriers, to give him advertisement of his coming, and to know again from him his mind, whether he should come openly or secretly, by day time or by night, and lodge in him camp with him, or in another apart by himself. Annibal his advice was, and he thought it the better of the twain, to enter into his camp, closely in the night season, and had given a watch-word, and made it known throughout all the camp, that every Marhal and Colonel should lodge a Marhal or Colonel, every Centurion entertain a Centurion, every knight of man of arms receive a knight or horseman, and every footman take unto him a footman into his pavilion and cabin. For it was not expedient that the camp should be enlarged and set out wider, for fear that the enemy might take knowledge of another Consul coming: and so much the more easily might many of them be bestowed in the freight room of their pavilions, because the army of Claudius had brought in manner nothing with them in this expedition, save their armour only. Moreover, in the very way as they came, the company was well minded and much increased, by many voluntaries that offered themselves willingly of their own accord, as well old soldiers, such as had served out their years, as young and lusty men: whom Claudius perceiving lo to strive forth to have their names entered if he saw them personable and strong of body and like to do good service, had enrolled into the muster book. The other Consul lay encamped before Sena, and Asdrubal some half mile from him. And therefore Nero, being now approached and came near, set him down close among the mountains, because he would not put himself within camp before night. And when they were come thither, they were welcomed every man according to his degree by them of their own place and calling, and brought into their tents and pavilions, and with general joy all friendly entertained as their loving guests. The next day following they assembled together to counsel: at which meeting, L. Porcius Licinius the Pretor was present: who was himself encamped close unto the Consul's leaguer. He before their coming, by leading his army over the high places, and one while keeping the narrow freights of the forest to impeach and stop the passages, another while charging upon the flanks and sides, or else upon the back and tail of the enemy had by all the devices and policies of war, mocked him and kept him play. This man, I say, was at the foresaid council. Many men there were of opinion, that the day of battle should be deferred to a time, whiles Nero might have some few days respite, both to refresh his soldiers, wearied with long travail and much watching, and also to know the quality somewhat better of his enemy. Nero not only persifled still to persevere, but also began most earnestly to intreat. That they would not by long delay make that design of his to seem rash and dangerous, which speediness in execution had made safe and secure. Considering, that whiles Annibal, upon ignorance and error (which is not like to continue long with him) lay still asleep and benumbed, neither once thought upon it, to assail the camp left without a General, nor put himself upon the way, to make pirrute after me; now before he could stir, I may (quoth he) defeat the army of Asdrubal, and return again into Asia. But he that by deferring still, giveth the enemy time and respite, betrayeth himself as lieh in him, that he camp unto Annibal, and laeth the way open for him into Gallia, to joyn with Asdrubal at his good leisure and pleasure. Nay (quoth he) the signal of batrel must be given forthwith, and we must into the field. We must, I say, take the vantage, and make the best of the error and ignorance of our enemies, both absent there, and present here: that neither they with Annibal may know that they are to deal with fewer: nor the enemy beware, that they are to fight with more in number, and stronger in power. Thus the counsel brake up, and the signal of batrel was put forth, and presently they went into the field. The enemies were already advanced in batrel array, and stood with displayed ensigns. The only stay of joyning in fight was this, That Asdrubal riding out with some few Horsemen before the ensigns, chanced to mark some old targets of his enemies which he had not as yet seen, and their Horses more lank and lean, than can be foretold. And (as he guessed) the number also was greater than ordinary and usual. Suspecting therefore, that which was indeed, he sounded the retreat in all haste: and sent out presently to the river where they used to water, to see if they might either light upon some & catch them prisoners, or at least-wise take good marks by their eye, whether any of them haply were higher coloured, or laden with burnment, presently upon their late travel. Also he gave them commandment to ride aloof about their camp, and to spie whether the rampier were enlarged or set out farther in any place, and to listen attentively whether the trumpet sounded single or double within the camp. When all other circumstances besides were related in order affirmatively, only the not enlarging of the camp, put them by their hint, and gave the occasion that they were beguiled. Two several camps they were, like as before the coming of the Consul: the one belonging to M. Livius, the other to L. Porcius. And in neither of them were the rampiers and trenches let out any jot, whereby they might put up more tents and quarter themselves in larger room. But this one thing troubled this old experienced Captain, and acquainted so well as he was with the Roman enemies, that his epiahs brought word how in the Pretor's camp they sounded the trumpet on, and in the Consul's twice. For surely that was an evident argument that two Consul were there. And in this time how the other Consul had departed from Annibal & given him the slip, he mightily tormented himself. And he could not suspect & imagine that, which was indeed the truth, namely, that that Annib. was deluded and mocked in a matter of so great moment, as to be ignorant what it was: he one of the General, or of the army, to which he lay so close and near encamped. Surely (thought he) and without all question, he hath received no small foil and overthrow, and in this fright dareth not make after and follow the enemy. Nay, he feared much, lest all were lost and gone, and that he should not come time enough to help and succour him: and that the Romans had gotten already the same good hand in Italy, which they had before in Spain. Otherwhiles he was perswaded, that his letters never came to Annib. his hands, that they were intercepted, and so the Consul made haste to prevent him, and give him the foil by the way. Being perswaded with these carnal cogitations, he caused the fires to be put out, and at the signal given at the first watch, to truss up bag and baggage, and to dislodge, and be gone. In this fearful haste, and mighty tumult, the guides whiles they were slenderly looked unto, and small heed was taken of them, one of them fell down and rested close in a secret lurking hole which he had before defined in his mind: the other waded over the river Metaurus, through the fords that he was well acquainted with, and so got away and made an escape. So the army left at random without their guides, first wandered over the fields, and then diverse of them being weary and sleepy with overwatching, laid them down along here and there, and left their colours with few about them. Annib. commanded them to march along the bank of the River, and to follow it, until the day-light might direct them the right way: and so going a compass in and out according to the winding reaches and cranks of the River, wandered a great while, and gained but a small ground forward. Now when day light once appeared, he purposed to spie out the first place for convenient place and there to get over. But finding no fords, by reason that the farther it was from the Sea, the higher were the banks from the water that kept in the River, he spent all the live-long day, and gave the enemy time to follow after him. And first Claudius Nero came with all the Horsemen, then Porcius followed hard after with the van-couriers, and light armed footmen. Whiles they made effort to charge their enemies in their march, every way, and plaid it upon them, in so much as now Annib. leaving to journey forward (wherein he seemed rather to flee than march) was desirous to take a little hill along the river side, and there to encamp and fortify: Livius was come also with all the main power of footmen, so armed and so orderly appointed and marshalled, as they were not only provided to march in journey, but ready also presently to give battail. But when they were all joyned together, and arranged in battail array, Claudius had the leading of the right wing, Livius commanded the left, and the Pretor took the charge and conduct of the main battail. Annib. seeing no other remedy but to fight, nevertheless fortified his camp; but in the fore-front before the vanguard, and in the very mids, placed his Elephants: about them in the left wing he opposeth the French against Claudius: not so much trusting upon them, as supposing verily that the enemy was afraid of them: and in proper person he took up the right wing against Livius for himself and the Spaniards, in whom (being old beaten soldiers) he reposed his most hope. The Ligurians in the mids were bellowed behind the Elephants. But the battail was rather drawn out in length, than stretched forth in breadth. The Frenchmen were defended with the hill that bare out over them. That front which the Spaniards kept, encountered with the left wing of the Romans. And all the battail of the right side, which bare out from the conflict, stood still and fought not. The hill that was opposite against them, was the cause that neither front, nor flank they could charge upon the enemy. But between Livius and Annib. there was an hot fight begun already, and cruel bloodshed on both sides. There were both the General Captains: there was the greater part of the Romans, as well foot as Horse: there were the Spaniards, old and experienced soldiers, skillful also in the Roman manner of fight: there were the Ligurians, a tough nation, and hardy in fight. Against this battail were the Elephants turned, who at the first shock and onsets troubled and disordered the vanguard, yea, and began to force the engines to give ground. But after upon the noise that grew greater, and the battail that waxed hotter, they began to be unruly, and travers between both battails, as it were doubtful to whether side they belonged, much like to ships left hulling and floating without their pilots and steers men. Then Claudius cried out unto his soldiers: To what end, quoth he, made we such post haste, and took so long a journey? But seeing that he laboured in vain to advance his banners and mount up against the hill opposite unto him, and perceiving that way how it was impossible to come unto the enemy and to enter upon him, he drew forth certain cohorts out of the right wing where he saw they were liker to stand still than to fight, and wheeled about behind the enemies battail, and so now wayes not only to the enemies, but also to his own men, he charged upon the left flank of the enemies: and he belittled himself so nimble, that when he had shewed himself on the sides, presently he plaid upon their backs: in such sort, that now on all hands, affront, behind, and on their flanks, down went the Spaniards and Ligurians and were hewn in pieces, yea, and the execution reached to the very French. There, with them was least aid, and smallest fight of all: for a great many of their fellows had abandoned their colours, and being flit away in the night lay asleep all over the fields: and such as were there, weary with travail and watching (as having bodies that of all things cannot away with labour and pains taking) were scarce able to bear their coticles on their backs. Besides, now it was high noon: and what with drought & heat together, they stood gaping for air & yielded their bodies either to be massacred, or taken captive. As for the Elephants, there were more of them killed by the hands of the governors and guides that sat upon them, than by the enemy that fought against them. For

A their manner was to have about them a Carpenters chissel and a mallet, and when the beasts began once to rage and to run upon their own fellows, their matters would let the said chissel between their ears, even in the very joynt where the nape of the neck and the head meet together, and with his mallet to drive it as hard as he could: this was found to be the readiest and most speedy way to kill so mighty and huge a beast, when they were past all hope to rule them and keep them in order. And the first inventor and practiser of this feat was Annib., a famous and memorable Captain, as in many other respects, so especially for this battail. He it was that held out to the end, exhorting his soldiers to fight, fighting also himself, and adventuring all dangers: he it was, that when his men were weary and drew back (by reason of long toil and labour) incited them again, one while by fair words and intreaty, another while by sharp checks and rebukes: he reclaimed them again when they were running away; he renewed the fight in divers places when it flaked and gave over. And at the very last, when he saw evidently that the enemy had the honor of the day, because he would not remain alive after so great an army defeated that followed his standard, and were induced by the reputation and name that went of him, he set spurs to his Horse, and rode among the Squadrons of the Roman Horsemen: and there, as beset with Amilcars son, and Annib. brother, fighting fight manfully, was slain. Never during the time of this war in one field were there so many enemies killed: and it seemed now that for loss of Captain and overthrow of army, they might well cry quittance with them for the defeat at Canna. Slain there were 50000 enemies, 6400 taken prisoners: and a rich booty and pilage gained of all sorts, besides gold and silver. Moreover, there were recovered of Roman Citizens above four thousand, who had been taken prisoners, and were among the enemies. That comfort they had to make amends for the soldiers that died in this battail: for they won not the victory without bloodshed in this field, wherein to the number almost of eight thousand Romans and allies together, lost their lives. And the Conquerors themselves had to much their fill of blood and slaughter, that the next morning, when word was brought unto Livius the Consul, that divers Cisalpine Gauls, and Ligurians, which either were not at the battail, or escaped out of the execution, and were going away in one company all together, without a certain Leader, without Esquires, without any order or command, and might all be put to the sword and utterly destroyed, if there were but one cornet of Horsemen sent out after them, "Nay, quoth he, let some remain alive to tell the news both of our enemies loss and ruin, and of our own vertue and valour. And Nero the very next night after the battail, marched with more speed backward, than he came thither, and within six dayes returned again so far as to his flanking leaguer, and the enemies. All the way as he marched, he was not indeed to relented unto and frequented by so many men, by reason that there went no harbingers or messengers before: but his coming was welcomed, with so great gladness and mirth, that for very joy, the people were welcme besides themselves. As for Rome, it cannot be uttered and expressed in words sufficiently, how men were affected the one way or the other: neither how pensive the City was in doubtful expectation of the event, nor how joyous and jocund again, upon the news and tidings of the victory. For never one day (after the rumour once was blown thither, that Claudius the Consul was gone forth in his expedition) from the sun rising unto the setting, departed either Senators out of the Council-chamber, from attendance upon the Magistrates, or the people out of the Common-hall. The dames of the City, because other help they could yield none, betook themselves to their beads and devotions, and in every Church went up and down, and plied all the Gods with prayers, with vows, and humble supplications. As the City was thus perplexed and in suspense; first there came some flying news, that two Horsemen of Nannia were come out of the battail, and returned to the camp which lay to guard and keep the heights and passages of Umbria, who had brought word thither, that the enemies were defeated. At the first, they rather lent their ears to hear these tidings, than bent their minds to entertain the tales, as being greater than they might in heart conceive, and more joyful than they could assuredly believe: and the exceeding twittes of the rumor hundred the credit thereof, because it was reported without, that the battail was fought but two dayes before. Then were letters brought from L. Manlius Acidivus, sent out of the camp, which confirmed the arrival of those Horsemen of Nannia. Those letters were brought through the common place, unto the Tribunal of the Pretor: whereupon the Lords of the Senat were sent forth out of the Council-house. But the people kept such a thrusting and thronging about the door of the Senat, that the messenger could not pass: thither, but was halled and pulled by the people, questioning with him, and calling hard upon him, that the letters should be read at the market cross, and in the Koltra, before they were opened in the Senate. But at the last, they were restrained by the Magistrates and caused to void, and hardly could the joy be contained among so unruly people, who had no measure nor rule of their affections. Well, the letters were first read in the Senat, and then in the assembly of the people: and then, according to the divers dispositions of men, some took joy and contentment of mind, as upon a certainty: others would give no credit, before they either heard the messengers speak directly from the Consuls, or saw their letters. After this, word came, that there were Embassadors themselves at hand. And then indeed, there ran to meet tidings of all sorts, young and old, every one desirous to be the first, to see and to hear these to glad tidings. And they went out so far as the bridge Milvius, and all the way along, was full of people. These Embassadors or messengers, were L. Fannius Phileas, P. Lucinius Varus, Q. Cestius Mercator. Who being accompanied with people of all degrees and qualities, that flocked about them, came as far as to the common place: some questioned with themselves, others enquired of their train and retinue, what news, and how the World went. And as any one had caught an end from them, that the army and Captain General of the enemies was slain, or the Roman legions safe, and the Consuls alive and well, he would immediately impart his joy unto others. Much ado had they to come into the Curia, and more ado there was, to keep out the multitude, that they were not mingled among the Lords of the Senate. But at last the letters were read in the Senat. From thence were the Embassadors brought into the general assembly of the people. And L. Furium after he had read the letters, explained himself from point to point in order, how every thing was done, with great applause; and afterwards, with a general shout of all the assembly, who hardly could conceive in their minds for great joy. Then they ran divers ways, some to the Temples of the Gods to render thanks, others to their own houses, to communicate with their wives and children to lucky and fortunate tidings. And the Senat decreed a solemn procession for three days together, forasmuch as M. Livius and C. Claudius the Consuls, with the safety of the legions had vanquished the enemies, killed their General, and put their army to the sword. This procession C. Hostilius the Pretor, published in the open assembly of the people: and it was celebrated and solemnized both by men and women. All the Temples for three days fully, were likewise replenished with the one sex and the other. For the Matrons and Dames of the City, in their best apparel, together with their children, yielded praise and thanks to the immortal Gods, as if now they had been freed from all fear, and the war come to a final and for ever. This victory altered the very fate and course of the commonwealth, so as from that time forward, as in time of settled peace, men durst make contracts, buy and sell, borrow and lend, yes, and pay debts to their creditors.

C. Claudius the Consul, so soon as he was entered into the camp again, caused the head of Asdrubal (which he had preserved with great care and brought with him) to be thrown out before the Corps de guard and stations of the enemies, and that the African captives, should be shewed bound as they were in chains: and two of them to be sent loose unto Annibal, to declare and recount in order, how every thing hapned. Annibal having at once received this double blow, mourning as well for the publick losse of the state, as for the calamity hapned in his own house, fetched a deep sigh (by report) and said: Ah, I see well the hard fortune of Carthage. And slogging from thence, because he would bring together all his forces (which being disperited slaughter, he was not able to hold and maintain) into the utmost angle of Italy, (the Brutians country), he brought thither as well the Metapontins, even the whole state of them, who abandoned their own Towns and Cities, as also the Locans, as many as were subject unto him; and under his obedience.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the eight and twentieth Book.

THE prosperous affairs in Spain, under the conduct of Syllanus the Lieutenant of Scipio, and L. Scipio his brother, achieved against the Carthaginians: as also the acts performed by Sulpitius the Pre-consul, and Attalus the King of Asia (the last) in the quarrel and behalf of the Ælians, against Philip King of the Macedonians, are reported and set down [in this book.] When there was a triumph decreed and granted unto M. Livius and C. Claudius Nero the Consuls: Livius, because he had performed the exploit in his own Province, rode in a chariot drawn with four steeds: and Nero, because he came into the Province of his colleague, to help forward the victory, rode after him mounted on horseback. Howbeit even then, in this habit and manner of triumph, he carried the more glory, piety, and reverence: for to say a truth, in this war he had done more good service than his brother Consul. The fire went out in the chapel of Vesta, by negligence of a Virgin, that had the keeping and tending thereof, and looked no better unto it. The said Virgin was well whipped. P. Scipio finished the war in Spain against the Carthaginians, when it had continued fourteen years: and in the fifth year after that he went from the City of Rome. And having discomfited the enemies quite of the possession of Spain, he recovered it wholly for the Romans. From Tarcon he loosed, with two barks, and sailed into Africk unto Syphax King of the Numidians, with whom he concluded a League. Asdrubal the son of O Celiber, for there with him at one table, and they supped together. He exhibited a game and pastime of sword-playing at new Carthage, in the house of his father and uncle: and the same was not performed by common sencers: and sword-players hired thence, but by such as either for the honour of their Captain, or to determine some controversy, gave defiance one to the other, and endured the lists in combat. Among whom, two great L.L. of the country, who were brethren, fought as they for the sovereignty of the Kingdom. When the City Arapa was besieged and assailed by the Romans, the Townsmen caused

A caused a mighty pile of wood to be made, and set on fire, and when they had killed their wives and children, they threw themselves headlong into the fire after them. Scipio himself, whilst he lay grievously sick, and there hapned by occasion thereof a murther to himself in one part of his army, when he was attended, made an end thereof: and compelled the Senates of Spain (that were invited) to come in and yield obedience again. There was likewise an amity and society concluded with Matalia, King of the Numidians: who also promised him his aids, in case he would come over into Africk. With the Gaditanians, after the departure of Mago from thence: who had received letters from Carthage, that he should pass the sea into Italy. Scipio, after he was returned to Rome, was created Consul, and when he made suite to have the Province of Africk, Q. Fabius Maximus withheld him: as if he had the government of Sicily: but with commission to sail over into Africk, in case he thought it good for the Commonwealth. Mago the son of Amilcar from the lesser Baliari Island, where he had wintered, took the ship and sailed over into Italy.

When it seemed that Spain was eased as much of war, as Italy charged therewith, by the voyage of Asdrubal thither: behold, all of a sudden there arose other troubles there, equal to the former. And as for the Provinces of Spain at that time, they were possessed between Romans and Carthaginians in this manner. Asdrubal the son of Gilgo, was retired with his power far within the country, even to the Ocean and Gades: But the coasts bordering upon our sea, and in manner all Spain bending toward the East, was held by Scipio and subject to the Roman Empire. Having the new General, being passed out of Africk with a fresh army, and entered into the room of Asdrubal the Barchine, joyined with Mago: and when he had put in arms within a short time, a great number of men in Celiberia, which lieth in the midst between the two seas: Scipio sent forth against him: M. Syllanus made ten thousand foot, and five hundred horsemen. This Syllanus made such speed by taking as long journeys as possibly he could (considering how much hindered and troubled he was, both by the roughness of the water, and also by the straits, environed with thick woods, and forests, as most parts of Spain are) that notwithstanding all those difficulties, he prevented not only the messengers, but also the very fame and rumour of his coming, and by the guidance of certain fugitive revolts out of Celiberia, he passed forward from thence to the enemy. By the same guides he had intelligence, and was for certain advertised (being now some ten miles from the enemy) that about the very way where he should march there were two camps: namely, on the left hand the new army abode of Celiberians, to the number of more than nine thousand lay encamped, and the Carthaginians on the right. As for this League, it was well defended and fortified with corps de guards, which watch and ward both night and day, according to the good order and discipline of war. But the other was as much neglected, disordered, loose, and out of order, like as commonly barbarous people and raw soldiers are, and such as fear the less; by reason they are at home within their own country. Syllanus thinking it good policy to set upon them first, gave commandment to march under their ensigns, and colours and bear toward their left hand as much as they could, for fear of being discovered in some place or before certain vantage-hill, buriers and epials, with his army advanced space directly toward his enemy. Now was he approached within three miles of them encamped, and not detected at all. For why? a mountain country it was full of roughs and crags, overpeaked and covered with woods and thickets. There in a hollow valley between, and therefore secret for the purpose, he commanded his soldiers to sit them down and take their refreshment. In this mean time the epials came back and verified the words of the fugitives aforesaid. Then the Romans, after they had piled their packs, their trunks and baggage in the midst, armed themselves, and in order of battell set forward to fight. When they were come within a mile of the enemies, they were discovered by them, who began suddenly to be afraid. Mago at the first outcry and alarm, set forth to his horse, and rode a gallop out of his Camp to succour. Now there were in the army of the Celiberians four thousand footmen targeteers, and two hundred horse. This Troop being in manner the flower and very strength of the whole army, and as it were, a full and complete legion he placed in the vanguard: all the rest, which were lightly armed, he bestowed in the rearguard for to succour and rescue. As he led them forth thus ordered and arranged, they were not well issued without the trench, but the Romans began to lance their javelins and darts against them. The Spaniards to avoid this volley of shot from the enemies, couched close under their shields, and defended themselves, and afterwards they rose up at once to charge again upon them. But the Romans standing thick, as their manner is, received all their darts in their targets, and then they closed man to man, and foot to foot, and began to fight at hand with their swords. Howbeit, the ruggedness of the ground, as it nothing availed the swiftness of the Celiberians (whose guise is to run to and fro in skirmish and keep no ground) for the fight was not hurtful at all to the Romans who were used to a set battell, and to stand to their target: only the straight room, and the trees and shrubs growing between parted their ranks and files asunder, so as they were forced to maintain skirmish, either singly one to one, two to two, or three at the most, as if they had been marched to cope together even; And look what thing hindered the enemies in their their flight, the same yielded them as it were, bound hand and foot unto the Romans, for that he killed. Now when all these targetteers well-near of the Celeribians were slain; these light armed souldiers, and the Carthaginians also, who from the other camp ran to succour, were likewise discomfited, and hewn in pieces. So there were two thousand footmen, and not above, and all the horsemen (who scarce began battell) fled with Mago and escaped. As for Hannibal the other General, together with them who came last, and to the very end of the day, was taken alive. But Mago fled still; and all the Cavalry, with as many as remained of the old footmen followed after, and by the tenth day arrived in the Province of Gades, and came unto Alphubul. The Celeribians, that were but new souldiers, slipped the next woods out of the way, and so from thence fled home.

This fortunate victory happened in so good a time, not so much sifted the present war in a heavy birth, as it cut off the matter and maintenance of future troubles in case the enemies had been left alone, and suffered to solicit and stir other nations to take arms, like as they railed the Celeribians already. Whereupon, Scipio having highly commended Syllanus, and conceived great hope withall to dispatch quite, and make an end of the wars, in case himselfe should not the matter, and made long stay; pursued the remnant behind, and set forward into the utmost Province of Spain against Alphubul. But Alphubul, who hoped them to be encamped in Bomolore, to keep his Allies in obedience and faithful allegiance, all on a sudden dilogged, plucking up his darts, and away; and more like one that fled than marched, led his army further into the country, even as far as the Ocean, and to Gades. But supposing that so long as he kept his forces all together, himselfe was the only mark which the enemy would shoot at, before that he cut over the Straights of Gibraltar to Gades, he brake up his whole army, and sent them away best as he thought to their severall Cities, both to save themselves within the walls, and to defend the walls by force of arms. Scipio, so soon as he perceived that the war was thus divided into sundry parts, and that to lead about his forces from City to City, was rather a long and tedious piece of work, than either difficult or much available, retired back. But because he would not leave this country clear in the hands of the enemies, he sent his brother L. Scipio with 10000 foot, and 1000 horsemen, to assaile the mightiest and wealthiest City in those parts, which the barbarous people call Oringis. This City is seated in the confines of the Mallus (a nation near Spaniards) the chief fruitfull, and the inhabitants there find silver mines. This was the fortress of Alphubul, and his place of safe retreat, when he made outwards all abroad into the midland countries of the main, and spoiled the people. Lucius Scipio having pitched his Camp under the said City, before that he entrenched and blocked the town, sent certain to the gates, who by parling near at hand, might feel and sound the dispositions of the Citizens, and persuade with them to make trall of the Romans friendly alliance, rather than their forcible violence. But perceiving by their answer, he mind at all nor inclination to peace, he cast a trench, and raised a double rampire about the town, and divided his army into three parts, to the end that one of them should ever follow the walls, whilst the other two took rest and ease. And when the first troop and regiment of them began to give a camado, there followed a fierce, cruel, and doubtfull skirmish. For they could not easily either come under the walls, or bring scaling ladders to set to, by reason of the floor that light upon them. And such as already had reared up ladders to the wall, some of them were pulled off with certain forks provided for that purpose, others were caught hold of with iron hooks from above, and were in danger to be hung up in the air, hoisted aloft, and flung over the walls. Scipio seeing that the conflict was unequal, by reason of the small number of assailants, and that the enemies had the advantage besides that they fought from the wall top; called that first regiment to retire, and with the other twain as once gave a fresh assault to the town. This stroke is great a fear to them who were already wearied with fighting, that not only the townsmen suddenly abandoned the walls and fled, but also the Carthaginian garrison souldiers, for fear lest the City was betrayed, forsook also their stations and places of guard, and gathered themselves into one place. But then the townsmen were afraid, lest if the enemies put themselves within the City, they should be massacred every where as they came in their way. With respect and difference who were Carthaginians, or who were Spaniards. Whereupon they let one gate open on a sudden, and in great numbers ran out of the town, bearing their targets before them, against the darts that were shot at a run, and shewing aloft their naked right hands, in token that they had laid aside their swords. But whether the enemy could not well discern them to be so, or whether they suspected some crafty and deceitfull practice, I wot not, but they fell upon those that fled and yielded unto them, and slew them down right, as well as if they had abandoned them in the face of a battell, and at the same gate entered the City with bloody banners. In other parts likewise they fell to hewing down the gates with axes, and to break them open with crews of iron. And as every horseman got into the City, he rode again according to the direction given by the General) into the market places to be possessed thereof. And so these horsemen were assigned the Triarii for aid and assistance. The Legionary souldiers besides ran over all the other parts of the City, spoiling and killing all that ever they met, save such as defended themselves with their armour. All the Carthaginians were taken prisoners and committed to ward, likewise of the townsmen about three hundred, such as had shuted the gates; but unto all the rest the town was rendered again, and each man had his own goods delivered and restored unto him. There were slain at the assault of that City, of enemies almost two thousand: but of Romans not above

A fourscore and ten. As by the winning of the town, they that were employed there took great joy and contentment: so in their return to their General himselfe, and the rest of the main army, they made a goodly show as they marched with a mighty multitude of prisoners led before them. Scipio having praised his brother in the most honourable terms that he could devise, and namely, for this exploit of forcing Oringis, making him equal in glory to himselfe for the conquest of Carthage: because winter drew on, that he could neither give the attempt upon Gades, nor yet follow at once upon the army of Alphubul: so dispersed as it was in sundry parts over the Province, conducted his forces back again into the Province of Spain, that lieth on this side Iberia: and when he had diminished his legions into their severall standing camps to winter in, and sent his brother L. Scipio to Rome, together with Hanno the Generall of the enemies, and other Gentlemen prisoners, he withdrew himself to Taracon.

In the same year the Roman Armado being set out under the conduct of the Admirall M. Valerius Levinus the Pro-Consul, made a voyage from Sicily into Africa, and torraed all over the Territories of Utica and Carthage, inasmuch as they drave booties out of the very utmost confines of the Carthaginians, and even about the walls of Utica. As they sailed back for Sicily, they were encountered by the Carthaginian fleet, consisting of seventy long ships of war whereof seventeen were boarded and taken. four sunk in the deep sea, the rest were put to flight and dispersed. Thus the Roman Captain Valerius, after victories achieved both by sea and land, returned with rich prizes of all sorts to Lilybæum: and hereupon by reason that the seas were open and cleared of the enemies ships, great store and abundance of grain was brought to

C Rome. In the beginning of that summer wherein these things hapned, P. Sulpicius the Pro-Consul, and King Attalus, after they had wintered in Ægina, as is above said, with a joint navy passed over from thence into the Island Lemnos. The Romans were twenty five Gallies of five ranks of oars, and the King had thirty five. Philip for his part because he would be ready at all assaies to meet with the enemy either by land or sea, went himselfe in person down to the sea-side, as far as Demetrias, and made proclamation, that all his forces should by a certain day meet together at Lesbos. Upon the same that went of the Kings coming, there repaired sundry Embassies from the confederate States of all parts unto Demetrias. For the Ætolians having taken heart unto them, as well for the society with the Romans, as upon the coming of Attalus, waited and spoiled their borderers. And not only the Acarnanians and Boeotians, and they that inhabit Euboea, were in great fear, but also the Achæans: whom over and besides the war from the Ætolians, Machidas also the Lacedæmonian tyrant terrified, who encamped himselfe not far from the confines of the Argives. All these States made report, what perils were like to ensue both by sea and land to their severall Cities, and besought the King his aid. Moreover there came unto him out of his own Realm no good tidings of peace and quietness, for that Scerdæmus and Phleurius were gone out and rebelled: and of the nations of Thrace, the Medi especially were ready to invade the frontiers adjoining upon Macedony, in case the King should fortune to be buied and occupied otherwile in any long wars. The Boeotians likewise themselves, and other nations inhabiting the more inland parts of Greece, had given intelligence, that the passages of the forrest

E Thermopile, where as the narrow gullet of the freights yieldeth small passage, were flopped up by the Ætolians with a trench and palliade, that it might give no access at all unto Philip, for to come and defend the Cities of the Allies. Thus many troubles coming fit and thick one upon another, had been able to have roused and awakened even a sleepey and flow Captain, and made him to look about him. These Embassadors he dispatched and sent away, promising every one of them help and succour, as time and occasion would permit: and willing them each one for the present to provide those things that were most urgent and important. Then he sent a garrison unto that City from whence new came, that Attalus having passed with a fleet from Lemnos, had waited and torraed all the territory about it. And he sent Phleurius with a small power into Bœotia, and Menippus likewise, one of his own Captains and Cavaliers, unto Chalcidius, with a thousand targetteers, called Peltæi, (now the Peltæi are certain small bucklers or targets, nothing unlike unto the Spanish Cetra) unto whom were joyne five hundred Ænians, that they might be able to guard all the parts of the Island: himselfe in person went to Scausis, and there he appointed the Rendevous, that all the forces of the Macedonians should be brought thither from Lesbos. News came unto him there that the Ætolians had summoned and proclaimed a general Diet or Council at Hæradus, and that King Attalus would repair thither to consult about the managing of the whole war. And with an intent by his sudden coming to trouble this solemn assembly and meeting of the States, he took great journeys in his march, and led his army toward Hæradus: but the Council was newly dissolved when he arrived thither. Howbeit, he destroyed all the standing corn, which was near-hand ripe, especially in the vale along the Gulph of the Ænians, and so reduced his army back again to Scausis: and there leaving his whole power, he retired himself to Demetrias, attended only with his royal guard. And because he might from thence be ready to meet with all sudden stirrings and invasions of the enemies, he sent out men of purpose into Phocis, Euboea, and Peloponnesus, to chuse out certain high places for beacons, from whence the fires might be seen afar off. And himselfe set up one watch tower upon Cissus (a mountain, the top whereof is of an exceeding height) that upon the signal of the beacons on fire from afar, he might in the minute of an hour have intelligence, so soon as the enemies went about any trouble whatsoever. But the Roman General and King Attalus, passed the seas from Peperethum to Nicea, and from thence sailed with their Armado to Euxas, unto the City Oreum, which as a man beareth his course from the gulph of Demetrias to Chalcis, and Emripus, is the first City of Embra that sheweth it self upon the sea hand. And thus it was agreed between Attalus and Salpinius, that the Romans should give the assault from the sea side, and the King with his forces on the land. Four daies after the flier was arrived they presented themselves before the City to assaile it. For, that time between was spent in secret talk and conference with Plator, who was appointed by Philip governor and Provost of the City. The City had within it two Citadels, the one commanding the sea, the other situate in the very heart and midst of the town. From thence there is a way under the ground that leadeth to the sea at the end whereof there stood a fabrick or tower five stories high, a singular bulwark and place of defence. There at first began a most sharp and cruel conflict, by reason that the turret was well furnished with all kind of shot and artillery: and likewise from out of the ships there was planted much ordnance, and many engines bent to impeach and assault the same. Now when every mans mind was amazed, and eye fixed upon this hot and eager fight, Plator received and let in the Romans at the gate of the other Citadell that stood over the sea, and so in the turning of an hand it was surprized and won. The townsmen being expelled and chased from thence, retired and betook themselves into the middle of the City unto the other fortres. But certain soldiers were set of purpose there to shut the gate upon them: and so being excluded, they were killed and taken prisoners in the midst between. The garrison of the Macedonians stood round together under the Castle wall and neither fled openly amin, nor yet began to fight, as if they meant to flit it unto the end. For whom Plator obtained pardon of Salpinius, and having embarked them, brought them to Demetrium of Phibotus, and there set them ashore, and himself returned to Attalus.

Salpinius bearing himself bold for this so good and speedy success, immediately sailed with his victorious Armado against Chalcis. Where the event in the end answered nothing unto his hope and expectation. The sea lying broad and large on both hands, gathereth in that place to a narrow room, so as at the first sight it maketh a shew of a double peer or haven, opening upon two divers mouths, but in very truth, there is not lightly to be found a worse harbour, and a more dangerous rode for ships. For not only for the exceeding high hills on both sides of the main, the winds arise suddenly and blow blustering, but also the very straight it self of Emripus ebboeth and floweth eleven times in the day, as the voice goeth, at certain set and ordinary hours; but without all order, as the winds drive, the sea turneth and rolleth hither and thither, working up and down, and like a flowing stream runneth forcibly and with great violence, as it were, down a steep hill: so as neither night nor day the ships there riding have any rest and repose. As the Roman Armado was thus engaged within so dangerous a rode: so the town of the one part was environed with the sea and on the land-side fully fortified; besides the defence of a strong garison there, and the assured loyalty of the Captains and principall heads and rulers: whereby it was chiefly guarded, which at Oreum was but vain, fickle, and unfittesall: by means whereof it was tenable and impregnable. The Roman General in this case, considering how he had begun a rash enterprise, and seeing many difficulties on every hand, wrought wisely yet in this one point, that he soon gave over, because he would spend no time in vain, and passed over with his fleet from thence to Cynus of Laoris (a town of Merchandise belonging to the City of Opus, situate a mile from the sea.) Philip had warning by the beacons on fire that appeared from Oreum: but by the fraud of Plator, the other were with the latest set a burning from the watch-tower above said. And forasmuch as he was not strong enough at sea, he could not with his navy have easie access into the Island. So that service was delayed and altogether neglected. But he belidred himself quickly to the succour of Chalcis. so soon as ever he spied the fire from the beacon. For albeit Chalcis it self be a City of the same Island, yet it is divided from the Continent by so narrow an arm of the sea, that there is no more but a bridge between it and the land: and on that side it hath more easie access than by water. Philip having dislized the garison there, cast down the fort and discomfited the Ætolians who kept the freight passage of Thermopyle, came from Demetrias to Scutusa, from whence he departed at the third watch: and when he had driven and chased the enemies in great fear to Heraclea, himself in one day reached to Elatia in Phocia, a journey above 60 miles. The very same day in manner the City of Opus was taken by K. Attalus and put to the ransack. The whole pillage thereof, Salpinius had granted to the King, in regard that Oreum a few daies before was spoiled and filled by the Roman soldiers, and the Kings men had no share with them. Now was the Roman Armado retired to Oreum; and Attalus not ware of Philip his coming, spent time in exacting monies from the chief and principall Citizens. But so sudden and unexpected was this accident of his approach, that had not certain Cretenians by good hap gone forth a foraging far from the City, and descried the march of the enemies a great way off, he might have been overtaken and surprized. Attalus unarmed and out of order as he was, made haste & ran amin to the sea-side for to recover the ships. And even as he and his men were looting from the land and lanching into the sea, Philip came, and from the very shore put the mariners and sailors in great fear. From thence he returned to Opus, crying out upon God and man, and blaming his ill luck, that he had missed so narrowly the opportunity of so great an exploit, and let it go, as it were, snatched out of his very eye. In the fit of anger he reproved and rebuked the the Opuntians, for that being able to hold out the siege untill his coming, so soon as they saw the enemy they presently had yielded themselves in a manner voluntary into his hands. When he had set things in order at Opus and thereabout he took his journey to Torne. Attalus at the first retired himself to Oreum: but upon the news arrived, how Prusias the King of Bithynia had invaded the frontiers of his kingdom, he left the Roman affairs and the Ætolian war, and from thence sailed over directly into Asia. Salpinius also retired his navy unto Ægium, from whence in the beginning of the spring he had departed and taken his voyage. And Philip forced and won Torne, with as small ado as Attalus before had taken Opus. That forsaid City Torne was inhabited by certain that were fled and driven out of Thebes in Phthia. For when the City was taken by Philip and they fled for protection unto the Ætolians, (to whom they recommended and committed themselves) the Ætolians gave unto them that place to let themselves in, being a City walled and in manner desolate by the former war of Philip. Then Philip having recovered Torne again, as is aforesaid, departed from thence, and won Tritionum and Drymas, two small and base towns of no account in Doris. From whence he came to Elatia, where he had given commandment, that the Embassadors of Ptolomæus and the Rhodiens, should give attendance untill his coming. Where, as they were treating about the making an end of the Ætolian war (forasmuch as those Embassadors to the same effect had lately presented themselves at Heraclea, in the Council and assembly of the Romans and Ætolians) tidings came, that Machinidas purposed and determined to set upon the Eleans, as they were preparing to exhibit the solemn Olympian games. Philip supposing it good to prevent that, courteously answered the Embassadors and gave them their dispatch: saying that as himself was not the cause of that war, so he would not hinder and flay the conclusion of peace upon any equal and reasonable conditions. And so with a power lightly appointed he marched through Bœotia to Megara, and from thence went down to Corinth: where having furnished himself with victuals, he marched forward to Phiois & Phaneus. And being now come as far as to Ereæ, and hearing there that Machinidas upon the rumour of his coming forsook was fled back to Lacedæmon, he returned to Ægium, unto the general Diet and Council of the Acheis: supposing withall, that he should find there the Punick armado, which he had sent for to come thither, because he might be able to do somewhat also by sea. But some few daies before the Carthaginians had sailed over into Phocæa, and from thence were gone to the havens of the Acarinians, so soon as they heard once, that Attalus and the Romans were departed from Oreum. Philip, fearing that they would make out alter them, and left they should be overtaken and surprized within Rhium, which is the very mouth of the Corinthian gulph, Philip verily grieved hereat, and was wonderfully troubled in mind, seeing what haste he had made himself in all his enterprises, yet he came too short and effected nothing in due time: as if fortune in taking all things out of his very eye, had deluded, disappointed, and mocked all his speediness and expedition. Howbeit, in that solemn Diet and assembly, he dissembled his grief, bit in his passionate affections, and thus with an haughty mind he spake and said, "That he called both God and man to witness, that he had forsook no opportunity of time nor vantage of place, but when and wheresoever he heard but "any inclining of the enemy, and the least rustling of armour, thither he had made all haste that "possibly he might: but he could hardly devise and conceive, whether himself were more venturous in seeking war, than the enemy nimble and quick in avoiding the same. So Attalus at Opus, "to Salpinius at Chalcis, and so the other day Machinidas escaped out of his hands and got away. But surely (quoth he) his running away will not alwaies prosper and speed well: neither is "that to be counted a dangerous war, wherein a man may be sure (if he but meet his enemy once) "to have the upper hand. That which is the principall point of all, thus much have I got yet at "the enemies hands, that they confels therein, how they are not able to make their parts good "with us: and I doubt not, but shortly I shall achieve the victory of them, and the event and fortune of their fighting with me, shall be no better than their present hope. The Kings allies were glad to hear him speak thus. Then he retired unto the Acheans, Ereæ, and Triphylia, and delivered again Aliphera unto the Megalopolitans: for that they proved by good evidence, that it belonged by right to their territory and confines. Thus having received of the Acheans certain ships, to wit, three Gallies or Carvels of four banks of oars, and as many gallies of two ranks, from thence he cut over to Anticyra. And then with seven Carvels of five ranks of oars, and more than twenty barks besides, which he had sent into the gulph of Corinth to join with the Carthaginian navy, he made sail to Erythra in Ætolia, near unto Enipium, and there disembarked and landed his men. But the Ætolians were advertised aforesaid of his arrival and coming ashore: for all the people that inhabited either the country towns and villages, or the Castles near to Pan-donia and Apollonia, were fled into the mountains and woods. As for the cattell, which in that hurry and haste they made could not be driven away with them, those they preyed upon and brought them to the ships. With these and all the rest of the booty he sent Nicias the Prætor of the Acheans to Ægium, and sent forward to Corinth: and from thence he commanded that the land forces should be conducted and march by land through Bœotia: whiles himself sailing from Cenchrea along the coast of Attica, above the port or cape of Sunium, passed even through the midst of his enemies armados, and arrived at Chalcis. Then after he had commended the Citizens there for their fidelity and vertue, in that neither fear nor hope was able to change and turn their resolute minds, and exhorted them for the time to come, to continue steadfast in their alliance and allegiance, if they made more reckoning of their own fortune, and loved it better than the con-dution of the Oritans and the Opuntii; he failed from Chalcis to Orcum. And when he had committed the government of the State, and the guard of the City, unto those principal Citizens, who chose to lie when the City was laid, rather than to yield themselves unto the Romans, himself sailed over from Emetia, unto Demetrius, from whence at the first he took his voyage to the aid and succour of his friends and Allies. After all this, having appointed and let out at Cassandria keels for an hundred long ships of war, and taken up a number of shipwrights to finish out the rest of the work; seeing that all Greece was now in quiet, both because Attalus was departed from thence, and also for that himself had in good time succoured his allies and confederats, who were in some trouble and distress, he returned back again into his own Realm, for to make war upon the Dardaniens.

In the latter end of that summer, wherein these affairs thus passed in Greece, when Q. Fabius Maximus the father, being sent as Ambassador from M. Livius the Consul unto the Senat at Rome, had brought word and made report, That the Consul judged L. Porcius with his legions to be sufficient for the Province of France, and that himself might well be spared, and depart from thence, and the Consular army withdrawn out of those parts: The Lords of the Senat gave order and determined that not only M. Livius, but C. Claudius also his Collegue, should return to the City. This difference only between the one and the other appeared in the decree, in that they gave direction, that the army of M. Livius should be brought home, but the Legions of Nero should remain still in the province, and be opposed against Annibal. The Consuls by entercourse of their letters passing between, agreed thus together, That like as they had with one mind and consent made war and managed the affairs, so, albeit they were in divers parts far asunder, yet they should meet in one place, and at one time make repair to the City of Rome: and that whether of them twain came first to Prenefte, he should there attend the coming of his Collegue. And it fortune'd so, that they arrived both upon one and the same day at Prenefte. From whence they sent an edict before, that the third day after the Senat should generally assemble together in the Temple of Bellona: and so they were met upon the way with a multitude of people, who accompanied them as they returned into the City. And they were not content all of them in general to salute them and welcome them home, but every man was desirous particularly to take the Consuls by their victorious right hands: some with congratulations, wishing them joy, others with thanksgiving, acknowledging that by their good means and virtue the Commonwealth was preserved and set upright. Now when they had related in the Senat house (as the manner was of all Generals) what acts they had achieved, and withall demanded, that for their valiant and faithful service to the Commonwealth, due honour should be rendered to the almighty gods, and then they themselves allowed to enter the City in triumph: the L.L. of the Senat made answer, That they for their parts were ready and willing to consider first and principally of the merits and goodnests of the gods, and next and immediately of the good deserts of the Consuls: and as they decreed divine processions and supplications in the name of them both, so they granted triumph, as well to the one as to the other. But the Consuls, because they would not divide their triumph (since that they had managed the wars with one accord and common consent) thus agreed between themselves, That forasmuch as the battell was fought within the Province of M. Livius, and the very day of the field fought, it fortune'd to be his turn to take the sign of birds, and to have the entire rule; and besides, the army of Livius was brought back and came to Rome already, but that other of Nero could not be removed out of the Province: therefore M. Livius should ride in a chariot drawn with four steeds into the City, with his souldiers following after, and C. Claudius presently come alter mounted on horseback without his souldiers. Thus the triumph was communicate to the one and the other, and encreased the glory of them both; but especially of him, who the more that he exceeded his Collegue in desert, the more he yielded and gave place unto him in honour. So laid every man, he there on horseback travelled in six daies space the whole length of Italy from one end to the other, and fought the very same day with banner displayed against Asdrubal in Gaul, when as Annibal thought verily he by encamped against him with his army in Apulia. See how one and the same Consul, in the defence of the one part of Italy and the other, against two Captains nay, against two noble Generals of two armies, in one place employed his advice and counsel, and in another opposed his body and force of arms. Behold (say they) the very bare name of Nero was sufficient to keep Annibal within his camp: and what was it else, that discomfited and defeated Asdrubal, but even his only coming? Let the other Consul therefore be set up on high, and ride in a chariot drawn with as many horses as he will: all while that the true triumph indeed passeth through the City upon one horse only. Nay, if Nero went but on foot, he would be memorable for ever hereafter, as well for the refusal of glory in that triumph, as for the winning of honour in that war. With these add such like speeches they entertained Nero as they beheld him, and so accompanied him even to the very Capitol. They brought into the Treasure-house of the City in coin thirty hundred thousand Sestertii, and 800000 Ases. Among the souldiers, M. Livius divided six and fifty Ases to them apiece. And C. Claudius promised as much to his souldiers that were absent upon his return to the army. This was noted and observed in the triumph, that the souldiers uttered more ditties and rimes full of pleasant conceits and jests (as their manner was) upon C. Claudius than their own Consul: and that the gentlemen and horsemen highly extolled and magnified above all the rest L. Veturius, and Q. Cecilius the two Lieutenants, and exhorted the Commons to create them Consuls against the next

A next year: likewise that the Consuls for the time being, confirmed this prerogative choise and election of those gentlemen, with their own assent and authority the morrow after, in a frequent assembly before the people, giving honourable testimony at the valiant and faithfull service of those foretold Lieutenants in that war.

Now the time drew near of election of new Magistrates: and when it was thought good by the Senat, that a Dictator should call that solemn assembly for the said election: C. Claudius the Consul nominated for Dictator his Collegue M. Livius, and Livius named Q. Cecilius General of the horsemen. So there were created Consuls by M. Livius the Dictator, L. Veturius, and Q. Cecilius: even he who then was General of the Cavalry. After this, they went to the election of the Praetors and chosen there were C. Servilius, M. Caelius Metellus, T. Claudius Asellus, and Q. Marcius Thurius, who then was Aedile of the Commons.

When these elections were finished, the Dictator having resigned up his office and dismissed the army, by virtue of an act of the Senat took his journey into the Province of Tuscany, to sit in commission and make enquiry, what States either of the Tuscans or Umbrians intended alplot to revolt from the Romans, and to turn to Asdrubal at his coming into those parts: and who they were that had assisted him either with auxiliary souldiers, or with victuals, or with any aid and help whatsoever. And these were the acts for that year, as well at home as abroad in the war.

The great Roman Games were wholly renewed and set out again three times by the Aediles of the City, Gn. Servilius Capio, and Serv. Cornelius Lentulus. Likewise the patimnes and plaques, called Plebs, were once fully renewed and exhibited again by M. Semonius Alabo, and Q. Manlius Thurius Aediles of the Commons.

In the thirteenth year of the second Punick war, when L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cecilius Metellus were Consuls, both of them were appointed by the Senat to make war upon Annibal in the Province of the Bruttii. Which done, the Praetors cast lots: And to M. Cecilius Metellus fell the jurisdiction of the Citizens: to Q. Manlius, of the foreigners. C. Servilius his lot was to govern Sicily, and T. Claudius Sardinia. As for the armies, they were divided in this manner: one of the Consuls had the conduct of that which was under C. Claudius the Consul of the year before. The other Consul had the leading of that (namely, two full legions) which C. Claudius the Pro-Praetor before commanded. M. Livius as Pro-Consul, whose government was prorogued for another year, received the charge of two legions of voluntaries in Hispania, at the hand of C. Terentius the Pro-Praetor. And Q. Manlius was appointed by a decree of the Senat to deliver over his jurisdiction to his Collegue, and to take the charge of Gallia with the forces there; whereof L. Porcius the Pro-Praetor was Captain: and he had in commission to waste the lands of those Gauls who were revolted to the Carthaginians upon the coming of Asdrubal. C. Servilius was assigned with the power of the two Cannian legions to defend Sicily, like as P. Manlius had before. Out of Sardinia the old army was withdrawn, which was under the governance of A. Hostilius: and the Consuls enrolled one new legion, for T. Claudius to sail over with, Quintus Claudius, and C. Hostilius Tullius, had both of them their commissions newly sealed for one year longer, the one to govern Tarentum and the other to rule Capua. M. Valerius the Pro-Consul, who also was Admiral for the sea-coast and river along Sicily, was commanded to give up thirty of his sail unto C. Servilius, and with all the rest of the Navy to return to the City of Rome.

As the City was in suspense and stood doubtfull for the variable event of so great a war, attributing the causes of all weal and woe, of prosperity and adversity to the gods; behold many prodigious tokens were reported to have hapned. Namely, That in Tarracina the Temple of Jupiter and at Saturnium the Chappell of the goddess Maecus, were blasted with lightning from heaven, and the inhabitants of Saturnium were no less terrified with two serpents that were crept into the temple of Jupiter at the very doors. From Antium there was word brought, that the harvest folk as they were reaping spied certain ears of corn bloudy. At Cere there was a sow that farrowed a pig with two heads, and an ewe yeared a lamb both male and female. It was reported also, that at Alba there were two fens seen: and at Fregelle by night the day-light appeared. Also in the territory of Rome, by report, on one spake: and the altar of Neposine within the Cirke Flaminia brake out into much sweat and the Temples of Ceres, Salus, and Quirinus were blasted and smitten from heaven. The Consuls were commanded to expiate and purge these fearful sights with sacrificing of greater beasts and to make supplication day by day. Which was done according to the decree of the Senat. But above all the wondrous signs, either reported from abroad, or seen at home, the minds of men were put in fear, for the going out of the fire in the Chappell of Vesta. For which cause the Vestal Virgin who had the charge that night to look unto it, was by the commandment of P. Licinius the Bishop well and thoroughly scourged. And albeit this hapned by humane negligence, and that the gods portended nothing thereby yet it was thought good that an expiation thereof should be made with greater sacrifices, and a solemn supplication held in the Chappell of Vesta.

Before that the Consuls went forth to the wars, they were put in mind by the Senat to take regard and order for the Commons, and to procure their reducing again into the country, and placing them in their lands and farms. For seeing that by Gods goodnests the war was removed far from Rome and Latium, the country towns might be without fear of danger inhabited and frequented again: rather was it a meet thing, that they should have more care to inhabit Sicily than

Italy. But the matter was not easily to be compassed and effected by the people, for that many of the free-holders were consumed up in the wars and great scarcity there was of servants and hires to till the ground: besides, the cattell was driven away in booties, and the manor houses were either ruinate or burned. Howbeit, a great fort were compelled by the authority of the Consuls to repair again into their country habitations. The motion hereof was first occasioned by the Embassadors of Placentia and Cremona; who made complaint, that their territories were much dammied and waisted by the incursions and rodes of the Gauls their next neighbours bordering upon them: and that many of their own natural inhabitants were fled and gone away, as their Cities were not well peopled, and their country lay waste and desert. Whereupon Antius the Pretor had commission to defend and guard the Colonies from the enemy. And the Consuls by vertue of an act of Senat made an Edict and Proclamation, that all Citizens of Cremona and Placentia, should by a certain day return into their Colonies. And then, they themselves in the beginning of Spring took their journey, and set forward to war.

Q. Caelius the Cos. received the army of Cl. Nero and L. Veturius of Q. Claudius the Pro-Pretor, and made up the full number of all the companies with those new souldiers whom he himself had enrolled. The Consuls led their army into the territory of Consentia, and having foraged and spoiled here and there, and being heavily laden with good booties, they were in a narrow and streight passage much troubled by the Bruttii and the Numidian archers: inasmuch as not only their prizes were in danger to be lost, but they themselves that were armed in some jeopardy. Howbeit, the alarm was greater than the skirmish, and the booty being sent before, the legions escaped safe into places of security. And so from thence they went into the Lucans country. All that nation without any fight returned under the obedience of the Roman Empire. With Annibal that year was nothing done: for neither he himself made offer of war, upon the fresh hurt and loss received as well in publike as private, nor the Romans provoked him as long as he was quiet. For they were all of this judgment, that there was such mettall and valour in that one commander, although all things else about him went to wrack, that they held it no good policy to provoke him, and wake a sleeping dog. And verily I wot not what to make of him; whether he were more to be wondered at in adversity than in prosperity. For why? warring as he did in his enemies land for the space of thirteen years, so far from home, in much variety of fortune, with an army not consisting of natural Citizens and subjects, but mingled of a confused ruff-raff and medley of all nations, having neither the same laws, nor manners, and customes, nor language: differing in fashions, in habit, in apparell, in armour, in rites, in religion, nor serving, as it were the same gods: he had so knit and united them in one link and streight band, that they mutually neither among themselves, nor against their Generall, notwithstanding oftentimes there wanted money for pay, and victuals in their enemies country: for default whereof in the former Punic war many outrages were committed both among Captains and souldiers. But when Asdrubal the Captain together with his army was defeated and overthrowen, in whom they reposed all their hopes of victory, and when they were faine to quit, as it were, all Italy besides, and to retire themselves into an angle and corner of Bruttium; who would not think it a marvellous matter, that there was no stir nor commotion in his Camp? considering that over and besides all other difficulties, he had no means nor hope else to maintain his army, but out of the Bruttians country: And say, that it were all wholly killed, sowed, and well husbanded, yet a small thing it was to find and feed to huge an host. Moreover, a great part of their youth was far away from the tillage of the fields and grounds, and wholly employed in warfare: to say nothing of the natural guile and corrupt usage of that nation, which in time of war was wont to live and maintain the same by robbing and thieving. Neither had he any succour at all sent from home out of Carthage: whilst they all were studious and carefull only to keep Spain, as if all had gone well with them in Italy.

In Spain the fortune was in some respect all one and the same, in other far unlike and different the same, in regard that the Carthaginians being defeated in a fought field, and having lost their Captains, were driven to the utmost coast of Spain, even as far as the Ocean sea: different, in that Spain is a country more apt and commodious to the reparation of new war, not only than Italy, but also than any land in the world, as well for the site of the region, as for the nature of the people. For although it were the first nation of all the main and continent, that the Romans went first in hand withall to reduce into the nature of a Province: yet it was the last of all others that was subdued, and but lately in our daies even under the conduct and happy fortune of Agrippa Caesar. There at that time Asdrubal the son of Gisco, the greatest and noblest Captain in all these wars (next after the Barchin house) returned from Gades, and hoping by the help of Mago the son of Amilcar, to wage war afresh, took musters throughout the farther part of Spain, and armed to the number of fifty thousand foot, and 4500 horse. And as for the Cavalry, all writers in manner do agree: but for the Infantry, some write, there were 70000 brought unto the City Silpis. There upon the open plains fate these two Carthaginian Captains down, because they would not seem to fall off and refuse battell.

Scipio, when news came unto him of so puissant an army levied, supposed that neither with the Roman legions he was sufficient to march such a multitude, unless he opposed the aids of the Barbarous nations; if it were no more but for shew an outward appearance, nor yet was to repose such assured confidence in them, as in the fundan entail strength of his army, that in case they should

A And should give him the slip when the time came, (the only occasion of the overthrow of his father and uncle) they might do much hurt to the main chance and totallium of all. And therefore he sent Sylanus before unto Coleus, (a Lord over the signory of eight and twenty towns) for to receive of him those horse and foot which he had promised to levy in the winter time. Himself departed from Taracena, and gathered some small aids of his allies that inhabit along the way as he marched, and so came to Casibile. Thither Sylanus brought also certain auxiliaries to the number of three thousand foot and five hundred horse. From thence he went forward to the City Baeris, being in all 60 Citizens and Allies, with footmen & horsemen together, one with another 4500 strong. As they were pitching their tents and encamping, Alago and Masani, with all their Cavalry lay upon them: and no doubt, had troubled them mightily as they were making their defenses; but that certain troops of horsemen hidden behind an hill, whom Scipio fitly for the purpose had there bestowed, suddenly at unawares ran upon them, and recharged them as they were loosely ridden to and without order and array. These had not well begun skirmish with them, but they discomfited the forwardest of them, and such especially as engaged themselves near to the trench to impeach and annoy the pioneers and labourers at work: but with the rest that kept to their colours, and went orderly in their ranks the fight was longer, and for a good while continued doubtful. But when the squadrons which stood ready appointed in their guards and flanks, were first brought forth: and after them, the souldiers also from their work and fortifications were wielded to take arms: and till more and more continually came fresh and in heart, in place of those that were wearied, so as now from all parts of the Camp there was gathered together a full power and ran to the battell, then the Carthaginians and Numidians turned their backs plain and fled. And at the first they went away by troops and companies, keeping their order and array till, and not disbanded for haite or rest. But afterwards, when the Romans began once more eagerly to play upon the hindmost of them, so as now their furious violence could no longer be checked then without all regard of ranks or files they forgot their array, and ran on all hands by heaps, seeking every man the next way he could to escape. And albeit by this skirmish, the Romans were more encouraged a good deal, and the enemies hearts much danted: yet for certain daies ensuing there never ceased excurions and bickerings maintained by the horsemen & those that were lightly armed. Now when by these small scufflings they had made sufficient triall on both sides of their strength, Asdrubal first led forth his forces into the field, and then the Romans likewise came forward ready to receive them. But when both armies stood without their Camp, arranged in battell array & neither of them gave the charge: when the day drew toward fun-setting, Asdrubal first retired with his men into the Camp, and after him the Roman Generall likewise. Thus continued they for certain daies together. Asdrubal was evermore the first that came abroad, and the first again that sounded the retreat to his souldiers, wearied with long standing. But of neither side they made out to skirmish, or discharged any shot, or gave alarms and let up a cry. Of the one part the Romans on the other the Carthaginians, together with the Africans stood in the main battell: and the allies of either side kept the wings and those were Spaniards as well in the one army as the other. But in the front of the Carthaginian battell were the Ephant placed, who at first made a show as if they had been Castles. And throughout both armies this word went for current, that when the time came, they would go fight as they stood day by day arranged: namely, that the main battels of the Romans and Carthaginians, between whom was the quarrel & occasion of the war, with like courage of heart and force of arms would encounter and cope together. Scipio perceiving this once to go for good, & to be fitly settled in their opinions, altered all on let purpose against the day that he minded indeed to give battell. And over-night he gave a watch-word and token throughout the camp, that both horse and man should take their dinner before day, and that the horsemen in arms ready appointed should hold their horses saddled and bridled. Now before it was broad day light he sent out all the Cavalry together with the light armour, to charge upon the Corps de guard and standing watch of the enemies. And himself straight after advanced forward with the whole strength of the legions armed at all pieces. And clean contrary to the conceived opinion and persuasion both of his own men, and also of his enemies he strengthened the wings with Romans, and marshalled the main battell with the allies. Asdrubal raised with the clamour and flow of the horsemen, leapt forth of his pavilion, and perceiving a tumultuous alarm and leafull stir of his own men before the rampart and trench, and seeing star off the glittering ensigns of the Legions, and all the plains over-spread with enemies, presently made forth all his Cavalry against the forelaid horsemen. Himself with the battell of footmen issued out of the Camp, and made no change nor alteration at all in the marshalling of the battalions, otherwise than he used the daies past. The horsemen continued the fight a long time doubtfully: neither could it be determined by itself, because evermore, as any of them were put back (which happened on both parts in manner by turns) they retired lately into the battell of footmen. G Now when as the battels were not pilt half a mile asunder one from another. Scipio sounded the retreat and opened his ranks, and received all the horsemen and light armed souldiers within the middle ward: and having divided them in two segments, he bestowed them for succours and to pursue behind the wings. Now when the time was come to joyn in skirmish, he commanded the Spaniards (and those were the main battell) to take sure footing and go steadily together: he sent Asdrubal and Masani, willing them to stretch out that wing on the left hand, like as they saw him

Italy. But the matter was not easily to be compassed and effected by the people, for that many of the free-holders were consumed up in the wars; and great scarcity there was of servants and hires to till the ground: besides, the cartell was driven away in booties, and the manor houses were either ruinat or burned. Howbeit, a great fort were compelled by the authority of the Consuls to repair again into their country habitations. The motion hereof was first occasioned by the Embassadors of Placentia and Cremona: who made complaint, that their territories were much dammied and waited by the incursions and rodes of the Gauls their next neighbours bordering upon them: and that many of their own natural inhabitants were fled and gone away, so as their Cities were not well peopled, and their country lay waste and desert. Whereupon Marius the Pretor had commission to defend and guard the Colonies from the enemy. And the Consuls by virtue of an act of Senat made an Edict and Proclamation, that all Citizens of Cremona and Placentia, should by a certain day return into their Colonies. And then, they themselves in the beginning of Spring took their journey, and set forward to war.

And verily I wot not what to make of him: whether he were more to be wondered at in adversity than in prosperity. For why? warring as he did in his enemies land for the space of thirteen years, so far from home, in much variety of fortune, with an army not consisting of natural Citizens and subjects, but mingled of a confused ruff-raff and medley of all nations having neither the same laws, nor manners, and customs, nor language: differing in fashions, in habit, in apparel, in armour, in rites, in religion, not serving, as it were the same gods: he had so knit and united them in one link and freight band, that they mutined neither among themselves, nor against their General, notwithstanding oftentimes there wanted money for pay, and victuals in their enemies country: for default whereof, in the former Punick war, many outrages were committed both among Captains and soldiers. But when Asdrubal the Captain together with his army was defeated and overthrown, in whom they reposed all their hopes of victory, and when they were fain to quit, as it were, all Italy besides, and to retire themselves into an angle and corner of Bruttium: who would not think it a marvellous matter, that there was no stir nor commotion in his Camp? considering that over and besides all other difficulties, he had no means nor hope else to maintain his army, but out of the Bruttians country: And say, that it were all wholly tilled, sowed, and well husbanded, yet a small thing it was to find and feed to huge an host. Moreover, a great part of their youth was set away from tillage of the fields and grounds, and wholly employed in warfare: to say nothing of the natural guile and corrupt usage of that nation, which in time of war was wont to live and maintain the same by robbing and thieving. Neither had he any succour at all sent from home out of Carthage: whiles they all were studious and careful only to keep Spain, as if all had gone well with them in Italy.

In Spain the fortune was in some respect all one and the same, in other far unlike and different: the same, in regard that the Carthaginians being defeated in a fought field, and having lost their Captains, were driven to the utmost coast of Spain, even as far as the Ocean sea: different, in that Spain is a country more apt and commodious to the reparation of new war, not only than Italy, but also than any land in the world, as well for the site of the region, as for the nature of the people. For although it were the first nation of all the main and continent, that the Romans went first in hand withal to reduce into the nature of a Province: yet it was the last of all others that was subdued, and but lately in our daies even under the conduct and happy fortune of Augustus Caesar. There at that time Asdrubal the son of Gisco, the greatest and noblest Captain in all these wars (next after the Barchin house) returned from Gades, and hoping by the help of Mago the son of Amilcar, to wage war a fresh took matters throughout the farther part of Spain, and aimed to the number of fifty thousand foot, and 4500 horse. And as for the Cavalry, all writers in manner do agree: but for the Infantry, some write, there were 70000 brought unto the City Silpia. There upon the open plains fate these two Carthaginian Captains down, because they would not seem to fall off and refuse battell.

Scipio, when news came unto him of so puissant an army levied, supposed that neither with the Roman legions he was sufficient to match such a multitude, unless he opposed the aids of the Barbarous nations; if it were no more but for shew and outward appearance: nor yet was to repose such assured confidence in them, as in the fundamentall strength of his army, that in case they should

A should give him the slip when the time came, (the only occasion of the overthrow of his father and uncle) they might do much hurt to the main chance and totall ruin of all. And therefore he sent Syllanus before unto Calpis, (a Lord over the ignory of eight and twenty towns) for to receive of him those horse and foot which he had promised to levy in the winter time. Himself departed from Taracena, and gathered some small aids of his allies that inhabit along the way as he marched, and so came to Casilus. Thither Syllanus brought also certain auxiliaries to the number of three thousand foot and five hundred horse. From thence he went forward to the City Hisalis, being in all 60 Citizens and Allies, with footmen & horsemen together, one with another 45000 strong. As they were pitching their tents and encamping, Mago and Masani, with all their Cavalry, lay upon them: and no doubt, had troubled them mightily as they were making their defenses, but that certain troops of horsemen hidden behind an hill, whom Scipio fifty for the purpose had there bestowed, suddenly at unawares ran upon them and recharged them as they were looely ridden toward without order and array. Their had not well begun skirmish with them, but they discomfited the forwardest of them, and such especially as engaged themselves near to the trench, to impeach and annoy the pioneers and labourers at work: but with the rest that kept to their colours, and went orderly in their ranks the fight was longer, and for a good while continued doubtful. But when the squadrons which stood ready appointed in their guards and stations, were first brought forth: and after them, the soldiers also from their work and fortifications were willed to take arms: and still more and more continually came fresh and in hearty, in place of those that were wearied, so as now from all parts of the Camp there was gathered together a full power, and ran to the battell; then the Carthaginians and Numidians turned their backs plain and fled. And at the first they went away by troops and companies, keeping their order and array still, and not disbanded for haite or heat. But afterwards, when the Romans began once more eagerly to play upon the hindmost of them, so as now their furious violence could no longer be resisted, then without all regard of ranks or files they forgot their array, and ran on all hands by heaps, seeking every man the next way he could to escape. And albeit by this skirmish, the Romans were more encouraged a good deal, and the enemies hearts much danted: yet for certain daies ensuing, there never ceased excurtions and bickerings maintained by the horsemen & those that were lightly armed. Now when by these small scufflings they had made sufficient trial on both sides of their strength, Asdrubal first led forth his forces into the field, & then the Romans likewise came forward ready to receive them. But when both armies stood without their Camp, arranged in battell array, & neither of them gave the charge: when the day drew toward sun-setting, Asdrubal first retired with his men into the Camp, and after him the Roman General likewise. Thus continued they for certain daies together. Asdrubal was evermore the first that came abroad, and the first again that founded the retreat to his soldiers, wearied with long standing. But of neither side they made out to skirmish, or discharged any shot, or gave alarms and let up a cry. Of the one part the Romans, on the other the Carthaginians, together with the Africans stood in the main battell: and the allies of either side kept the wings, and those were Spaniards, as well in the one army as the other. But in the front of the Carthaginian battell were the Ephants placed, who as oft made a E heave as if they had been Castles. And throughout both armies this word went for current, that when the time came, they would so fight as they should day by day arranged: namely, that the main battells of the Romans and Carthaginians, between whom was the quarrel & occasion of the war, with like courage of heart and force of arms would encounter and cope together. Scipio perceiving this once to go for good, & to be fitly sealed in their opinions, altered all on set purpose against the day that he minded indeed to give battell. And over-night he gave a watch-word and token throughout the camp, that both horse and man should take their dinner before day, and that the horsemen in arms ready appointed should hold their horses saddled and bridled. Now before it was broad day light he sent out all the Cavalry together with the light armour, to charge upon the Corps de guard and standing watch of the enemies. And himself straight after advanced forward with the whole strength of the legions armed at all pieces. And clean contrary to the conceived opinion and persuasion both of his own men, and alio of his enemies he strengthened the wings with Romans, and marshalled the main battell with the allies. Asdrubal raised with the clamour and shout of the horsemen, leapt forth of his pavilion, and perceiving a tumultuous alarm and fearful stir of his own men before the rampier and trench, and seeing star off the glittering ensigns of the Legions, and all the plains over-spread with enemies, presently made forth all his Cavalry against the foresaid horsemen. Himself with the battell of footmen issued out of the Camp, and made no change nor alteration at all in the marshalling of the battalions, otherwise than he used the daies past. The horsemen continued the fight a long time doubtfully: neither could it be determined by itself, became evermore, as any of them were put back (which happened on both parts in manner by turns) they retired lately into the battell of footmen. G Now when as the battells were not past half a mile asunder one from another, Scipio founded the retreat and opened his ranks, and received all the horsemen and light armed footmen within the middle ward: and having divided them in two regiments, he bestowed them for succours and reserves behind the wings. Now when the time was come to joyn in skirmish, he commanded the Spaniards (and those were the main battell) to take sure footing and so steadily together: first and last by himself out of the right wing (for that point he commanded) dispatched a messenger to Syllanus & Martius, willing them to stretch out that wing on the left hand, like as they saw him him to draw it at length on the right : with direction also unto them, that they together with the light horfemen and light appointed footmen fhould encounter and clofe with the enemy, before that both battels might meet and joyn together. Thus having enlarged out at full their wings, they with three quadrons of footmen and as many cornets of horfemen, together with the light armed skirmifhers, advanced with full pace dire&ly againft the enemies whiles the reft followed fidewaies acrofs. Now there was a void piece of ground in the midbt between, by reafon that the Spaniards enigs went but flewly forward: and the wings had been in conflict already, when the flower and ftrength of the enemies battels, confifting of old beaten Carthaginians: and Affrican foldiours, were not yet come within the darts fhoot, neither durft they put in to fuccour them that were in fight, for fear they fhould open the main battell for the enemy that came dire&ly againft them. Their wings were much diftreffed in the fight on every fide : For the horfemen, the light armed foldiours, and the skirmifhers, having wheeled about and fet a compals to environ them, ran upon them on their flanks. The cohorts of footmen charged upon them aftront, and all to break off their wings from the body of the battell. And as now in every refpect the fight was unequal, fo the rabble of camp-followers, Balear Iflanders, and raw untrained Spaniards, oppofed againft the approved Roman and Latine foldiours, pulled down afide. The day went on ftill, and Afdrubal his army began to faint : not as marvel, for they were furprized and taken on a fudden, becaufe in the morning, & were forced in halfe to enter into the field & go to battell before they had refrefhed and ftrengthened their bodies. And to that purpofe Scipio had drawn the day on length, & trilled out the time that the battell might be late. For it was the feventh hour, or one a clock after noon, before the enfign of footmen charged upon the fide points. And a good deal later it was ere the main battels fought and joyned together : fo that the heat of the noon fun, the pain of long ftanding in armor, and hunger and thirft came all together to enfeeble and fpend their bodies, before that they came to hand-ftrokes and to buckle with their enemies : which was the caufe that they flood leaning and refing themfelves upon their fhields. And over and befides all other troubles, the Elephants alfo frighted and madded with this ftimulus and difordered manner of fight of horfemen, skirmifhers, and light armed foldiours together, ran from the wings, upon the main battell. The Captains therefore themfelves, being thus tainted, as well in courage of heart, as in bodily ftrength, gave ground and retreated. Howbeit they ftill kept their arrayes, as if the whole battal had retired whole and found by the commandment of their General. But when the winners and conquerors on the other part were fo much more forward to charge upon them more hotly on every fide, becaufe they faw them to lofe their ground and fhink back, fo as their violence could not well be endured : they then albe it Afdrubal held them ftill together, and did what he could to flay their flight, crying oftentimes aloud unto them, that there were hills behind them, and places of fafe retreat, if they would retire in good foot, moderately, and in order : yet when they law their enemies prefs fo hard upon them, killing and hewing in pieces thofe that were next unto them, fear was above a fhame, and fo immediately they flewed their back parts, and ran away all at once as faft as they could. Yet at firft, when they came to the root and foot of the hills they began to make a ftand, and rally the foldiours again into order of battell, feeing the Romans to make time flay of advancing their enigs upon the flie. But afterwards, when they perceived them to come luftily forward, they began again to flee afrefh, and fo in fear were forced to take their Camp. Neither was Scipio himfelf far from their trench and rampier, but in that very brunt had been a fufferer thereof, but that immediately upon the hot gleams of the fun, when he fhineth in a watry fky full of black and rainy clouds, there poured down with a fhore of fhowers and tempefts, that hardly could he himfelf after his victory recover his own camp. And fome there were alfo that made it a fcruple and matter of confcience to attempt any more for that day. The Carthaginians, although they had great reafon to repofe themfelves, and take their neceffary reft, fo wearied as they were with travell, and fore wounded, efpically feeing the night was come, and the ftormy rain continued : yet, becaufe their fear and preient danger wherein they flood gave them no time to loyer and flack their bufines, againft the next morning that the enemies fhould earlie affaile their Camp, they gathered up ftones from out of the vallies near about them, and piling them one upon another, amended the height of their rampier, purpofing to defend themfelves by the ftrength of their fence, feeing fmall help and remedy in force of arms. But the falling away of their Confederats was the caufe that their departure and flight from thence, feemed more fafe than their abode there would have been. This revolt was begun by Ahanes, a great Lord of the Turdetans for he with a great power of his followers and retainers fled from the Carthaginians to the adverfe part. Whereupon two ftrong walled towns, together with their garrifons were yielded by the Captains unto Scipio. Afdrubal therefore, fearing left this mischief might pread farther, now that their minds were once fet upon rebellion, diflodged about the midnight following, and removed. Scipio fo foon as he was adverted at the break of the day, by thofe that kept ftanding watch in their ftations, that the enemies were gone : having fent his horfemen before, commanded the ftandards and enigs to be advanced, and led to fpeedy a march, that if they had gone ftraight forward and followed their tracks dire&ly, they had no doubt overtaken them : but believing certain guides, that there was a fhorter way to the river Ratis, they were adviced to charge upon them as they paffed over. But Afdrubal feeing the paffage of the river topped againft him, turned to the O-ean: and even at the firft they departed in great hafte as if they fled, which was the caufe that they got the ftart of the Roman legionary footmen, and won a good

free of ground before them. But the horsemen, and light appointed footmen, plaid one while upon their tails, flanked another while their sides, and by this means with charging and recharging they wearied them and failed their march. And when upon many of these troubles by the way, their enemies were fain to stand, and forced to maintain skirmish, (some time with the horsemen and sometimes with the light javelotters and auxiliary footmen) behold the legions also came on apace and overtook them. Then there was not so much fighting and resist, as massa to and slaughter of them: down they went with them and killed them like sheep: so long, untill their leader himself began to flee, and slipped into the next mountains, together with 7000. half naked and unarmed. All the rest were either slain or taken prisoners. Then the Carthaginians began to encamp and fortifie in all haile and tumultuous sort upon the highest mount they could find: from whence (by reason that the enemies had staid in vain to get up the hill, having to climb up an ascent) they had not so much ado to delect themselves. But, the siege being bare and naked, and distressed of all commodities for their subsistence, they were not able to hold out the siege for a few daies. And thereupon the soldiers fell apace to forsake their own Captain, and to go to the enemy. So that at the length the General himself in the night season abandoned his army and having got shipping (for the sea was not far off) he embarked and fled to Cádiz. Scipio being advertised that the Captain of his enemies was fled, left with Syllanus ten thousand footmen and a thousand horsemen to continue the siege of the Camp. himself in person with the rest of his forces within few daies returned to Tarragon, for to examine and hear incontinently upon his Criminal the capes of the Princes and States: that upon the true estimate of their defects they might be rewarded or chastised accordingly.

After his departure, Majestica having had secret conference with Syllanus, about inducing his people also to be rebellious and to hearken unto a change, called over unto Africk, with some small retinue. At which present time verily the occasion of his sudden alteration was not so evident and apparent, as afterwards his most constant truth and Al! allegiance observed unto his dying day was a good proof and argument, that even then he entered not into this degeneration and election, without good and important cause. These Argos, in those ships that Africk had sent back, passed over to Gades. The remnant, thus forsaken of their Captains, some by way of voluntary yielding and ranging themselves to the adverse part, others by flight, were scattered among the neighbouring coasts.

D Cries, and no troop remained of them behind of any man, and seeking to speak of, either the number or strength. In this manner and by these means especially were the Carthaginians driven all out of Spain, by the conduct and happy fortune of P. Scipio in the thirtieth year of the war, and in the sixth of Scipio his government in that Province and command of the army. And not long after Syllanus returned to Tarcon unto Scipio, and brought word that the war in Spain was fully ended.

E And Scipio was sent with many noble persons captives, as a messenger to carry tidings to Rome of the conquest of Spain. And when all went with full contentment and infinite joy at their news, and abroad in all places highly magnified the glory of this service, he alone who was the man that led the deed (as one who had an insupportable desire of vertue and true honour) made but small reckoning of the recovery and winning of Spain, in comparison of those matters that he hoped for, and conceived in that high and magnanimous spirit of his, which he carried with him. For now he cast in mind and aimed at the conquest of Africk and great Carthage and therewith, to make perfect and consummate that glorious war to his own immortal honour and renown. And therefore, supposing it was now a good time to begin in the way to those high exploits, and to lay plots, to prepare ahead, yes, and to win unto him the hearts of the Princes and nations, he determined first of all other to sound and assay King Syphax.

F This Syphax was King of the Majestica, a people bordering upon the Moors, and abutting upon that part of Spain especially where new Carthage is situate. At the same time the King was in league with the Carthaginians: which Scipio supposing that he would observe no more fully and precisely, than commonly the Barbarians use, (whose fidelity dependeth upon Fortune) sent C. Lelius with rich gifts and presents as an Orator to treat with him; The barbarous Prince was glad hereof; both because the Romans then prospered every where; and also the Carthaginians in Italy lived by the loke; and in Spain went down to the ground, where they had nothing left: and thereupon he consented to entertain the friendship of the Romans. But for the confirmation of this amity, he neither would give nor take assurance, but only in the personal presence of the Roman General himself. So Lelius having obeyed the Kings royall word and warrant that Scipio might come to the unto him with safe conduct and security, returned unto Scipio. Now for him that aspired to the conquest of Africk it was a matter of great consequence and importance in all respects, to make himself sure of Syphax, whose most mighty and puissant King of all that Land, who had sometimes made proof what the Carthaginians could do in war, and the confines and marches of whose kingdom fully sitly upon Spain, and but a small arm of the sea between, Scipio thinking in therefore to be a matter worth the adventure with great hazard, (for otherwise it might no be) leaving for G the defence and guard of Spain L. Marinus to Tarcon, and M. Syllanus at new Carthage, (whither he had travelled by land from Tarcon, and taken great journey himself) and Lelius together loaded from Carthage with two great Carrels of five banks of oars, and passed over unto Africk, through the calm and still sea, most of all rowing, and otherwhile also making sail with a gentle gale of wind.

Reply is to tell out that the very same time Afrimati, driven out of Spain, was one of the ven with seven galleies of three course of oars, and rid at anchor near unto the shore for to be set a land. When he had a kenning of the two Carvels aforesaid, which albeit no man doubted but they were enemies, and might have been boorded by them being more in number; before they could gain the rode; yet hereupon ensued nothing else but a tumult and hurry among the mariners and fouldiers together, in vain preparation of their ships and their armour. For the wind being somewhat big and high, drove the Carvels with full sail out of the main sea into the haven. Before that the Carthaginians had any time to weigh anchor: neither durst any of them proceed to further dealing within the Kings Rode. So Asdrubal first left a shore, and within a while Scipio and Lalimo landed, and went all to the Court. Syphax took this for a great honour due unto him (as indeed it was no less) that there were come to him at that time, and in one day two General Captains of two most mighty and puissant States, to sue for peace and amity with him; He invited both of them friendly, and gave them entertainment: and since it was their fortune to enter under one roof, and the same house for to be lodged in, he endeavoured to draw them to a party, and to make an end of all quarrels, grudges, and controversies between them. But Scipio denied flatly, "that either there was any private malice or hatred between him and Asdrubal, that should need an end with conference and speech: and as for State-matters, he might not treat with a "professed enemy as touching them, without express warrant and commission from the Senate. But when the King laboured greatly with him, that he would find in his heart and not think much to bear Asdrubal company at meat and meal (because he would not seem to exclude either of them from his bond, he yielded therunto, and was content. So they supped both twain together with the King, and Scipio and Asdrubal ate both at one table in one meal, and upon one bed, for so it was the Kings pleasure. But for courteously Scipio behaved himself (as he was a man that naturally knew how to carry himself with a grace and dexterity in all things, and in every place wheresoever he came) that by his fair language and eloquent speech, he won not only the favour of the barbarous Prince Syphax (who before was not acquainted with the Roman fashions) but also the good will and love of Asdrubal, a most malicious and mortal enemy: who seemed to have him in more admiration upon this one meeting and communication in presence personal, than for all his feats of arms achieved in war, and made no doubt but reckoned folly that King Syphax and his Realm would presently be at the devotion of the Empire of Rome; such a singular gift had that man to win love and favour. And therefore the Carthaginians were not so loath to seek how Spain was lost, as to consider and think how they might keep and hold Affrick. For thus they conceived, That this noble Knight and worthy Roman Captain was not come thither wandering at a venture, nor as a traveller to see countries, and to solace himself with walking along the pleasant and delectable coasts, leaving the Province which he had newly subdued, leaving his armies which he commanded, sailing thither with two ships only into Affrick, and committing himself unto an enemy country, and into a Kings hands, of whose fidelity and protection he had no experience: but no doubt upon some great hopes to compass the conquest of Affrick. And this was it that long since Scipio had in secret purpose and designment, this was it that openly he feigned and formed at, namely, that he wanted not himself as within Spain, as Annibal in Italy. Well, Scipio having concluded a league with Syphax, departed out of Affrick; and notwithstanding he was tossed upon the sea with variable winds, and those for the most part boisterous and raging yet up to the fourth day he arrived at New Carthage.

As Spain generally was at peace and rest for any Carthaginian war, so it was well known, that certain particular States, in regard that they were touched with the guilt of trespasses committed, were quiet for fear, rather than for any loyal allegiance. Of which the most notorious, as well for their own greatness and power, as for their fault and transgression, were Illyriums and Cephals. The Caltulians had been Roman Confederates in time of prosperity, were revolted unto the Carthaginians, upon the defeat of the two Scipios and their armies. The Illyrians besides their revolt and rebellion, added this wickedness, in that they betrayed and murdered the Romans who fled unto them for succour after that overthrow. These two nations, if Scipio at his first coming had proceeded in rigour to revenge (whiles the States of the country stood indifferent) he should have regarded their desert more than his own good and commodity. But when all troubles were composed and reduced to quietness, he thought it then a convenient time to punish and chastise them accordingly. And therefore he called L. Marcius from Tarentum, with a third part of his forces, and sent him to assail Cephals. Himself with the rest of the army marched toward Illyriums, and within five daies presented himself before it. The gates he found shut against him, and all preparation and furniture for defence and to withstand the assault. For their confidence bare them witness what they had deserved, and there needed no other defence or intimation of war against them than the privy of their wicked fact. Hereupon Scipio took occasion to exhort his fouldiers, and began in this wise. "The very Spaniards themselves, quoth he, by shutting their gates declare plainly what they justly are to fear: and therefore ye ought to war "with them in more hostile malice and deadly hatred than with the Carthaginians. For with them the quarrel was maintained, as it were, without anger and rankor, only for sovereignty, and glory: but of these men ye are to take vengeance for their disloyal treachery, for their cruelty, and wicked villany. And now the time is come, to revenge not only the unworthy death of your fellow fouldiers, but also the like falsehood prepared for your selves, in case your hap had been to have fled for refuge thither at any time: yea, and to shew exemplary justice, to reach all "pollitory,

A pollitory, that no man hereafter be so heady as to wrong any Citizen or fouldier of Rome, in what sort chastise ever he be, without fear of condign punishment. Upon this exhortation and comfortable words of the General, they belittled themselves and divided the scaling ladders amongst choice men out of every company. And having so parted the army between them, that Lalimo the Lieutenant had the conduct of the one half, they gave assault with great terror unto the City in two places at once. But neither any one general captain, nor many principal Citizens encouraged and heartened the townsmen manfully to defend their City, but only their own fearful and sinful consciences for they will well and remembered, yea, and put one another in mind, that it was their punishment and not victory that the Romans sought for. And as for themselves, since they were to lose their lives, this was the only point that they were to consider upon, namely, where they were best to die, whether in fight and in the field (where the fortune of Battail was common, and oftentimes lifted up the conquered, and put down the conqueror) by after their City burnt and rased, to yield up breath in the sight of their wives and children taken captives amid the torments of whipping and hard irons, when they had endured all villanies and indignities. Whereupon not only the servicable youth for war; not only men of age, but women also and children, even above the bodily strength of that age, or courage of battles, were ready ad presented themselves to defend the walls. Some brought weapons to the defendants; others carried stones up to the walls onto them that were fortifying and repairing the breaches. For why? they stood not upon their liberty alone, which whetted the stomachs of valiant magnanimous men only, but they felt before their eyes all extremities of torture and punishment yea, and the shameful death that that could be devised: and their hearts were incited to undergo all pains and peril, by striving one together, and seeing one another to hazard themselves. In so much as they stood to it, and fought resolutely, that even that noble army which had subdued all Spain, took the repulse oftentimes at the hands of the youth of one City, was driven from the walls, and finally to their honor received some loss in fight and began to fear. Scipio seeing that, and doubting left upon so many headless attempts the enemies might take heart and his own fouldiers be tainted, thought good to enter himself personally into the action, and to take part for that dangerous service. Having recruited therefore his men for their cowardise, he commanded the ladders to be brought and set, threatening: that himself would scale the walls, if the rest made halting and this drew back. With that he made no more ado, but approached under the walls in great peril of his person. Whereupon the fouldiers, respecting the dangerous state of their General, and fearing greatly of his behalf, first up a shout on all hands, and began to raise ladders in many places at once. Lalimo likewise on the other side plied the assault and gave no over. Then as fast the townsmen, for all their resolute resistance, were overcome; the defendants overthrown and beaten from their standings, and the walls possessed by the enemies. The castle also on that side which was thought impregnable, was in that burnt and tumult taken. For there were certain Africans serving then among the Romans (led before the enemy) who whiles the townsmen were wholly turned to defend those places that seemed to be exposed unto danger, and the Romans climbing and entering where they could, espied one part of the City much higher than the rest; which because it was compassed about with an exceeding high rock, was neither fortified otherwise with bulwarks, nor minded with any defendants at all: and being men (as they were) light and agile of body, and flexible by reason of much practice and exercise, they climbed up the rock where they could meet with any crag therof to bear out unequally from the rest, and they held their hold and footing: but when they came to a plumb upright steep place, and where the cliff was even and smooth, they fastened certain great iron spikes and nails, which they carried thence with them of purpose, and stuck them a pretty distance asunder, like greeces and staves, to climb upon; and ever the foremost plucked him up by the hand that followed next, and the hindmost heaved up those that went before them, until they were gotten up to the top; and then they ran down well an outcry into the City, which was already won by the Romans. Then it was well seen that they forced this City from very desperate anger and deep hatred. There was no thought of taking any prisoners alive; there was none that once minded any pillage, notwithstanding all lay open unto them for to be ransacked and spoiled. But down they went with the unarmed as well as the armed, killed men and women one with another: nay, their cruel mood was such, as they spared not the sucking babes. Then they set fire on their houses: and what the fire loved they valued and pulled down; so carried a mind they had, and so bent they were, so to leave no monument and token of such a City, and utterly to shroud and root out the memorial of those enemies.

After this, Scipio led his army against Cephals. This City was defended not only by Spaniards, who were repaired out of other parts, but also by the reliques of the Carthaginian army which were scattered abroad in their flight, and thither fled. But ere Scipio was come before the City, he had heard the news of the royal calamity and destruction of the Illyrians: by reason whereof they were all terrified and in despair of themselves: and so it fell out in such wise, that he overcame and defeats every man fought against him, till he himself the best he could, without hurt to his neighbours. And as fast they began to have notice of his famous reputation one of another, afterwards they brake out to open dissentions, in so much as the Carthaginians and Spaniards divided themselves, and parted asunder. Cephals openly advised the Spaniards, and persuaded with them, to yield. Illyria was the Coast over the Auxiliary Carthaginians, whom tenance and face so vigorous and courageous, as they never remembered to have seen him so lustily in any battell before. For a while he sat still and said never a word, until he was advertised that the Captains of the mutiny were brought into the place and all things else in readiness. Then after silence made by an Oyez, of the cryer, in this wise he began and said, "I would never have believed that I should have wanted words and proper language unto mine own army: not because I have exercised my self at any time rather to make eloquent speeches than to manage valiant actions; but for that being always from mine infancy almost trained up in the camp, I have been acquainted with the natures and humours of soldiers. But in what manner I should speak unto you, neither my wits will give me advice, nor my tongue afford me utterance: you, I say, whom I was not to much as by what name to call, should I term you Citizens, who have revolted from your native country, or soldiers, who have renounced your General, refused to be under his command, his charge and government, and made no conscience to break the oath of your allegiance: I left of all, should I give you the name of enemies? Now firstly, me thinks I agnize the bodies, the faces, the apparel and habit of mine own natural Citizens: but contrariwise, I see plainly the deeds, the words, the intents and minds of arrant enemies. For what have ye wished and hoped for else, but the Illegates and the Lacerates have done the like? And yet I must needs say, that they had to follow for their captains in their outrage, Mandonius and Indibilis, two Princes of royaill blood: whereas you imposed the sovereign command and government upon Vmbro, Atrius, & Calenus Albinus, two brave companions. Denie it now hardly if you will, that you all either were in the action, or willing in the intention. Verily I can easily believe you in to disavowing, and namely, that all this proceeded from the folly of some brainick fellows among you. For the trespasses committed are of that quality and consequence, that if the whole army were therein culpable, the expiation & purging thereof could not be procured without great sacrifices and exquisite punishment. Full against my will I touch these points, as sores and galls that will not abide the rubbing: but unless they be touched and handled too, they cannot possibly be cured and healed. I assure you, for mine own part, I thought verily, that when the Carthaginians were driven out of Spain, there was neither place nor portion throughout the whole province, that had envied my life and health: such hath been my carriage, and so have I demeaned my self not only with Allies, but also with enemies. But see, how much I have been deceived: even in mine own camp, the news of my death was not only received with joy, but expected also with a longing desire. I speak not this, that I would have any man to imagine that I conceive, how all in general are guilty of this fact (for if I were per- swaded in my mind, that my whole army wished my death, I would here die presently before your eyes; for what good would my life do me, repined of my soldiers and fellow Citizens?) But the multitude of every people is like the seas in nature; which of themselves are innumerable and stir not as the winds blow, as the gales go and come, so are they either calm or troublesome: and inquisit: and even so the cause and source of all this fury and outrage, is in some few heads and leaders. As for you ye have caught the infection from them, and plained the fools with them for company. Surely I am thus persuaded of you this day, that ye know not yet, to what enormous height of folly ye have proceeded: what mischievous acts ye were entred into against mine own persons: what you attempted against your native country, your wives and children: what you enterprised against the gods and witnesses of your loyal oath; what ye have done against the sacred auspices and happy fortune, under which ye have served in warfare; what ye have committed against the custom & law of war, against the discipline of your ancestors; & finally, how prejudiciall and offensive your designs have been against the sovereign majesty of the Roman empire. As for my self, I am willing to say nothing: content I am to think, that yesterday gave credit to my death rashly and inconsiderately, then hearken thereto willingly and greedily. And it may be, that I have behaved my self, that no wonder it is, if mine army be weary of me and of my government. But what harm hath your country derived at your hands which to betray ye should complot with Mandonius & Indibilis? How hath the people of Rome offended you, that you have deprived the Kn. Marshalls and Colonels created by the voice of the people, of their lawfull rule and authority, and conferred the same upon private persons? And being not therewith contented, to have and acknowledge them for your Colonels: you even you the army of the Romans, have taken the knitches of rods belonging only to the General, and bestowed them upon those that never kept so much as a bondslave of their own command, Albinus and Atrius forsooth, let up their pavilions in that chief place and State in the camp, where the sovereign magistrat ought to quarter: with them the trumpet sounded: from them the signall and watch-word was demanded, they sat as judges in the Tribunal seat of Scipio the Pro-conful: upon them the Lictors and Sergeants attended: for them they made way & voided the place, against they should go forth & march in their train: and before them were the rods borne, and the axes withall. When it raineth stones, when thunderbolts are shot, when lightning flash from heaven, when beasts bring forth strange, uncouth, and monstrous young ones, contrary to the course of nature, you take them for prodigious signs and fearful tokens. Nay this is a monstrous sight and wonder in deed, which by no sacrifices of beasts, by no supplications and prayers, can be purged and expiated, without the blood of them that have committed so hainous a fact. And albeit no wicked crime can be founded upon any reason, yet would I gladly know of you (as in a case that indeed should not be once named and remembered)

A "what was in your mind? what imagined you? and what was your designment? There was in times past a legion sent to Rhegium, there to lie in garrison. Traitorously and villainously they murdered the principal citizens there, and for ten years space possessed and kept that wealthy town to their own behoof. For this notorious and beastly fact the whole legion, even four thousand men and no fewer, were in the market place of Rome beheaded every one. And yet they at the first followed not for their captain Atrius Vmbro, one little better than a lander, stupid, and follower of the camp, a man of an unlucky and unfortunate name, but Decimus Indibilis a Tribune or Kn. Marshall; neither joined they with Pyrrhus, nor with the Samnites and Lucans, professed enemies of the people of Rome. Whereas ye, have plotted in counsell, and meant to have banded in arms together with Mandonius & Indibilis, their purpose was to have hated themselves for ever in Rhegium, like as before them the Campanians, who took Capua from the Tuscans, the old inhabitants: and the Mamertines likewise; who possessed themselves in Sicily of Megallans, and never minded to molest and make war either upon the people of Rome, or any of their allies and confederats. But tell me I pray you, intended ye to have made your continual residence, and to have dwelt at Sacro? where if I your General at my departure out of the province, when my time and commission was expired, should have left you behind me, ye might have cried out upon me, and called for vengeance to God and man in regard of hard measure and wrong offered unto you, in that ye might not be permitted to return home to your wives and children. But alas, wife and children were clean excluded out of your mind: ye thought no more upon them, then of me or of your native country. Well, I will follow on still, and dicourage upon your plot and designs, wicked and ungracious though they were, yet happily not altogether to foolish & foolish in the highest degree as may be supposed. Imagined ye being eight thousand men in number, (and say that ye were all of better account & reckoning then Albinus & Atrius are, under whom ye submitted yourselves) to have been able for to defeat the people of Rome of the province of Spain? to long as I lived, and the other army stood fild and strong: where with in one day I forced new Carthage, with which I discomfited, put to flight, and chased out Spain, four brave Generals, and as many puissant armies of the Carthaginians? But let that go by, and to say aside my name, and to speak of no more abuse but this, that ye were very credulous and quickly believed that I was dead. How then? what if: was departed this life and gone indeed? Had the common-wealth together with me yielded up her ghost? Would the main state and empire of Rome have fallen to the ground with me at once? Forfeid (O Jupiter, almighty and most gracious) that ever a City founded first most happily, with the approbation of the gods, built eternally for ever to endure, should be compared and made but equal with this frail and mortal body of mine. Flaminius, Paulus, Gracchus, Posthumius Albinus, M. Marcellus, T. Quintius Crispinus, Cn. Fulvius, two Scipios, my father and uncle both, so many noble warriors and captains have been slain in this one war: and they are dead and gone: yet the people of Rome continue on foot and overlive them, yes, and shall still, when a thousand more of them shall die, either upon the edge of the sword, or upon some sickness or other. How should then the state of the people of Rome be entered & buried with the dead corps of me, but one man and no more? Even you your selves (to go no farther to seek examples) here in Spain, when my father and uncle two Generals, were killed, chose Septimius Martius for your captain, to lead against the Carthaginians, being in the full and jollity of their fresh and late victory. I speak now, as though I had miscarried, Spain had been left destitute and without a Commander and General. M. Syllus who was sent with me in the province, joined in the same commission and of equal authority; L. Scipio my brother, and C. Laelius, both Lieutenants general: would these have sit still and done nothing? would these have failed to maintain and recover the majesty of our empire? What could ye have compared army for army, captains for captains with them? was either your reputation and credit, or your quarrel and cause comparable? and suppose that in all these regards, ye have been superior and gotten the vanrage, would ye indeed with the Carthaginians, have been arms against your native country? against your fellow citizens? would ye in very truth, that Africus should have commanded Italy; and Carthage the City of Rome? And for what demerit and great trespass, I pray you, that your country had committed? Coriolanus long ago, being wrongfully condemned and unworthily banished, seeing himself to live a miserable exiled man, was moved to take arms and to come against his country to assail it. A private regard of love and natural kindnesse, reclaimed them from publick pericill. But what grief of heart, what fit anger hath incited and provoked you? Set aside your wages was paid later by some daies, whiles your General lay sick; was that a sufficient cause for you to give defiance to your country & proclaim open war against it? was that enough to cause you to revolt from the people of Rome, and turn to the Illegates? and to spare no law of God and man, but to break all and make shipwrack of conscience and common honesty? now truly, soldiers, ye were out of your wits, and fools ye were in the highest degree. I was not my self farther out of frame and sicker in body, then ye were in your mind and understanding. I tremble to think upon it and to rehearse, what to believe, what they hoped, what they wished. Let all be forgotten and buried in oblivion, if it be possible: if not let us not speak of it yet, howsoever we do, but rake it up in deep silence. I cannot deny, but my words have seemed sharp and bitter unto you, and all this my speech very rigorous. But how much more crüll think ye are your deeds, then my words tart and sour? And if ye deem it reasonable, that I should bear & put up the things that ye have done; will ye not abide them

and take in good part, and patiently to hear me to tell all that I can say? But these matters I will lay no more in your debt from henceforth; ye shall be checked no more for them. Would God ye could as soon forget them, as I will put them out of my remembrance. And therefore as touching ye all in general, if ye repent and be disquieted with your selves for your fault and folly, I shall be content and think you punished to the full. But as for Albinus Calpurnius and Attius Paterculus, with the rest of the authors of this cursed and detestable mutiny, they shall make amends for their trespasses and transgressions, even with their heart-blood; and they shall surely die for it. The spectacle of their exemplary punishment ought not to seem unto you grievous and odious, but rather a pleasant and delectable sight, if ye have any grace in you, and be come again to your right wits. For their intent was to hurt and do mischief to man alive, more then to your selves.

He had scarce made an end of his speech, when all at once, according to the order given before. I hand, there was presented to their eyes and ears a terrible and fearful object on all sides. For the army which had envied the assembly round about clattered their swords & bucklers together. The common cry was heard to cite by name all those that were condemned there, in the presence of the whole audience. Stripped they were naked, and haled forth in the midst of them all, and every thing brought out at once for to accomplish the execution. Thus were they bound to the stake, whipped with rods, and their heads chopped off. So benumbed they were all and stoned for fear, that were present at the sight thereof, that there was not heard amongst them all one shrewd & hard word, in milking the rigor of the punishment, no, nor so much as one groan or feebler sigh. Then their bodies were all drawn at one side, the place was made clean, & purged; and the soldiers were called by name & before the Colonels & Kn. Marshals, swore allegiance, and to be true soldiers unto Scipio. And every one according as he answered to his name, had his wages truly paid. This was the issue and final end of the soldiers mutiny, which began at Saevus.

At the same time, Captain Hannibal by Mago from Gades with a small power of Africans, solicited the Spaniards about the river Batis, for money, to rebel and put in arms upon a four thousand able men. But after wards he was forced by L. Marius to quit his camp, and having lost the greatest part of his men in the very tumult of taking the camp, yes, and some in the flight, whom the horsemen pursued in chase and slew as they ran. Hagling, himself with few others escaped away. Whiles these things happened about the river Batis, Latinus in the mean time having passed through the Straights into the main Ocean, arrived with his navy at Carthage. This is a City standing on the sea coast bounding upon the Ocean, even in the mouth of the river, where it first openeth from the Straights into the broad sea. Now there was some hope (as hath been aforesaid) to gain the City of Gades without any assault, by treason, for as much as there came some into the Roman camp, that of themselves made offer and promise thereof. But the treason brake forth too soon and was revealed before it was ripe, the conspirators were all apprehended, and sent by Mago unto Adherbal the Pretor, for to be conveyed to Carthage. And Adherbal having embarked those traitors in a Caravel or Gallion of five banks of oars, and sent her afore, because he was flower of sail than those of three banks; himself with eight three-banked galleys, followed a pretty way after. The said Caravel of five banks of oars, was not so soon entered the Straights, but Scipio also being embarked in another Caravel of the same sort, made out of the haven of Carthage with seven Gallies of three banks of oars and invetted Adherbal and the foresaid Gallies, flying verily, that the enemies Caravel being taken tardy in the very current, was not able against the tide to retire. Adherbal being thus surprised on the sudden, for a while stood in fear and doubt what to do; whether he had best to follow on after his own Caravel, or turn the prow and beaks of his galleys, and make head against the enemy. Thus whilst he stood at a bayling, he lost the opportunity of shitting and avoiding a battell: for now they were come within the dart shot, and the enemies on every side were ready to charge. And the current was so strong, that they were not able to rule and manage their ships as they would. But the manner of fight was nothing at all like to a sea-battell, for as much as they could do nothing to their mind, nothing by skill and dexterity, nothing by counsel and advice. The nature onely of the narrow sea, the violence of the current was all in all, and ruled the conflict: driving the ships one against another, as well upon their own fellows as upon their enemies: no, withstanding they rowed and laboured what they could to the contrary. So as one while ye should see a ship that fled and scudded away, whirled about back again with a winnow by the waves, upon those that had her in chase; and likewise another that seemed to follow and pursue after her enemies, if she happened once into a contrary course of billows, to turn top and tail, and seem to flee. And in the very conflict to see fall out, that when as one vessel ran with her beak head full butt upon another, she was forced by waves to turn her side, and receive in her flank the push of her enemies. And contrariwise, when as one with her flank opposite to the enemy, suddenly all at once she should wind and whirle again upon her prow. As the galleys fought thus doubtfully together, hap hazard, at the pleasure and will of Fortune, the Roman Caravel (were it because of her weight she was able to stand more steady against the surging billows, or by reason that she had more ranks of oars that cut the waves, and so was more easily ruled) chanced to sink two of the smaller galleys of the enemies; and running fast by one with a forcible violence wiped away clean all the oars of one side; and had no doubt spoiled and marred all the rest that she would have invetted and charged upon, but that Adherbal, with the other five made sail, and got over into Africk. Latinus having sailed back to Carthage with victory, and heard what had been done at Gades; namely, how the complot of betraying betraying the land was disclosed, the conspirators sent bound unto Carthage, and consequently all their hope frustrated and turned to nothing upon which they came to Gades; dispatched messengers to L. Marius, giving him to understand, that unless they meant still to lie before Gades, sitting away the time and doing no good, the best way was to return unto Scipio the lord General; and so with the consent of Marius both of them within few daies repaired to Carthage. Upon whose departure Mago had not only a time to breath himself being frightened as he was with a double fear both by land & sea; but also hearing that the Illegates were revolted, conceived some hope to recover Spain again, and addressed his couriers to the Senat at Carthage: who by relating not only the civil mutiny that arose in the Roman camp, but also the rebellion of the confederates (and all by way of amplification and enforcing every thing to the highest degree) should encourage and exhort them to send aids for to regain the dominion of Spain, left unto them by descent over their ancestors. Mandonius & Indubilis who were retired for a time into their confines, would then know how the sedition sped and what was the issue thereof (still in suspense). For if the natural citizens had their treachery forgiven, they made no doubt themselves but they might be pardoned also. But when it was published abroad how severely and sharply they were punished, they supposing their own transgression to deserve the like punishment, solicited their own people again to take arms: and thus having levied and assembled the same power of aids which they had before, they passed into the Sedetans country, where at the beginning they lay in a landing camp, being in all 20000, and 2500 horse strong.

Scipio after he had soon reconciled and won again the heart of his soldiers, as well by making true payment of their wages, to the faulty and innocent alike, as also by shewing a loving countenance, and giving friendly words unto all indifferently, before that he dislodged and removed from Carthage, assembled them all together to an audience. Where he inveighed bitterly and at large against the falsehood and treachery of the lords of the country that rebelled; and protested before them all, that he went not now to be revenged of them for their wickedness with the same mind, where with lately before he had cured the folly, and reformed the error of his natural citizens; for then quoth he with grief and groans, yes, and with tears like as one that rent and cut his own bowels, I expiated and purged either the inconsistent folly, or the wilful malice of eight thousand men, with the head of thirty persons; but now I go with joy and glad heart, yes, and with a resolution to execute and massacre the Illegates. For neither are they born in the same land with me, nor linked now in any society at all unto me; the only bond of faith and amity which was between us, that they have themselves first impiously broken. But in my own army, besides that I see they all are either Roman citizens or else allies, and those not Aliens but mere Latins; this doth me good and moved me much, that there is not among them so much as one soldier that I speak of, but was brought out of Italy either by mine uncle Cn. Scipio (who was the first of the Roman name that came at L. Deputus into this province) or else by my father who was Consul; or last of all by my mine own self. They are every one of them well acquainted & injured with the name of Scipio, and tied to their fortune and government: whom I gladly would conduct some late with me to deserved triumph, and whom I hope to find ready to assist me with their honour when I stand for a Consulship, as if it were a matter that concerned the honor of them all in general, as well as mine particular. And as for the expedition now in hand, whosoever taketh it to be a war, little remembereth the noble acts by me achieved; for surely I make more reckoning of Mago and his exploits, who is fled with a few ships as it were out of the compass of the world, in an land environed with the Ocean sea, then I do of the Illegates. For there in that place, is not only a Carthaginian captain, but all the Carthaginian forces and strength that now remain. Here are none but thieves and robbers, and their leader: who peradventure may be of some power and sufficiency to forage the fields, to burn the houses, to drive away some cattle of their neighbours, but to come to hand-strokes in a set fight and ranged battell, they are of no valour and worth at all: who no doubt will come into the field, trusting upon their good footmen to turn away in the rout, more than upon any force of arms to maintain the fight. And therefore I have thought good to put down and suppress these Illegates, before I depart out of the province: not for any present danger at all, or fear of greater war that I see may spring from thence; but first and principally, that so ungracious and wicked a rebellion should not remain unquashed; and next because it might not be said, that in a province so subdued, as well by singular prowess as rare felicity, there was left one enemy behind of the Romans. And therefore in the name of the gods I follow after me, not so much to make just war (for ye are not to deal with enemies any way comparable unto you) as to take vengeance of wicked men, and to punish graceless persons. When he had finished his speech, he dismissed them, with commandment to be ready the next morrow to put themselves in the journey; and after that he set once forward by the tenth day he came to the river Iberus, and when he had passed over, within 4 daies more, he encompassed in the sight of his enemies. Now there was a plain there, environed round about with mountains: into which vale between, he caused the cattle (and those were for the most part driven out of the enemies country) for to be put forth to grazing and all to provoke the anger of the fierce and savage enemies; and sent out withal, the light appointed archers to guard them: he took order besides, that when there were one in skirmish with the vanquishers of the enemies, Latinus with his Cavalry should closely from some covert place give a sudden charge. And for this purpose, there was a hill that bare out hand-somely to hide the ambush of those horsemen.

Scipio to his soldiers.

And presently without any delay, they came so skirmish in for the Spaniards made out to to the hill catch, in soon as ever they discovered them a far off: the archers again and darters of the Romans ran upon the Spaniards as they were busy in their booty. And at first they terrified them, and skirmish'd with their shot: but afterwards, when they had spent their arrows and darts, which were better to begin a fray, they determin'd a battell, they drew their naked swords and began to fight close together foot to foot. And surely the skirmish of the footmen had been doubtfully decided, but that the horsemen came upon them: who not only assisted the enemies in their face, and trampled them all under their horsefeet that came in their way, but also some of them having wheel'd about for a compass along the hill foot, presented themselves at the back of the enemies, so as they enclosed and shut up the most part of them in the middle between. Inasmuch as there ensued a greater slaughter, then commonly upon light skirmishes by way of such rides and excursions. But the barbarous people by this discomfort were rather kindled than flamed to anger, then assisted any way or discouraged. And therefore, because they would seem to have been dismayed or affrighted the morrow morning by day-light, they shew'd themselves in the valley, the freight and narrow valley, as it before said, was not able to receive and contain all their power: for two third parts whereof of the infantry and all the horse were come down into the plain field: and the rest of their footmen besides, stood together quartered on the side of the hill. Scipio judged that the scantiness of the ground made for him, both because it seemed that the Roman souldiers were more fitted to fight in a small room then the Spaniards: and also for that the enemies were engaged within that place, which was not able to contain the whole multitude: and therefore he devis'd a new stratagem besides. For considering that he could not in so narrow a space bring his own cavalerie about to compass and charge the wings and points of their battell, and that the horsemen which the enemies had arranged together with their infantry, would serve them in no stead, he gave direction unto Laelius to conduct the horse closely as he could about the hills, and to keep off the squadrons of the cavalerie to far as possibly might be from the skirmish of the Infantry. Himself directly turned all the engines of the footmen opposit against the enemies, and marshalled the forefront with four cohorts only, because he could not stretch out the battell any broader: and then without delay he made hast to beguile the enemy, to the end, that while the enemies were amused and occupied in fight they should be withdrawn from spying the horsemen as they traversed over the hills. Neither had they any of them at all, whyles they were brought about, beside they heard the noise and tumult of them as they charged upon their backs. So they fought alunder betwix several places and battels of foot, and as many of horse encountered and lay down along the plain, because the narrowness of the ground would not admit both horse and foot together in one plot at once. Now when all the infantry of the Spaniards could not help themselves, and they again were a little distressed by the Cavalerie, but that the footmen trusting upon the Quarry, were without good discretion rashly to fight in the plain ground, and to be beaten down and slain: and the horsemen being enclosed round, could neither abide the enemies footmen front them (for by this time their own infantry was overthrow and defeated) nor yet endure behind them the hot assault of their horsemen: they left their bodies, cast themselves into a ring, and after they had stood to defence long time, were slain every one to the last man there was not a footman or horseman left of all those that fought in the valley. As for that third part which stood upon the hill side, rather to behold the fight in a place of security, than to take part with their fellows in the battell, they had both time and space to shift for themselves and escape. Among whom, were the Princes Ithembales in person, Mandonius and Indibilis: who were slipp away in the first tumult of the fight, before all the battalions were environed. The same day was the camp also of the Spaniards forced, and therein besides other pillage, were taken prisoners almost three thousand men. Romans and allies there died in the fight upon a 2200, and above three thousand were lost. The victory no doubt had been obtained with less bloodshed, if they had fought in a more open piece of ground, where there had been better scope to flee away. Then Indibilis giving over consent to think any more of wars, & supposing nothing safer, then to have recourse to the approved goodness and clemency of Scipio, for his brother Mandonius unto him: who fell posture down at his feet, beseeching much for the cause of his folly) the first rage and fury of the time; wherein not only the Illyrians and Lacedaemonians, but also the Roman camp, as it were by some contagious and pestilent infection, became frantic and besides themselves: and laid without, that condition of himself, his brother, and their followers and subjects was such, as they were ready if it were to thought good, either to yield up their lively breath unto Scipio, at whome very hands they had once received the time, or if they might now be pardoned and saved, to devote and employ their lives for ever hereafter wholly in his service, as being no twice due unto him alone, and no other. Once after they presumed upon confidence in their innocent case, when as yet they had no experience of his clemency: but now contrary wife they repented all their full hope in the mercy of the conqueror, and nothing trusting in the goodness of the quarrell. Now it was an old custom among the Romans, as to exercise the absolute authority of the government upon any that they did to peccable subjects, with whom they were neither considered in equal and reciprocal covenant, nor linked in the bands of amity: before they sent ordered up unto them all signs, as well divine as humane: before they sent, they had received hostages of them, taken armor from them, and planted garrisons in their towns and Cities. Scipio after he had sharply rebuked

A and roundly shake up Mandonius there present, and likewise Indibilis that was absent, said that for their wicked parts & lewd demeanor, they had worthily deserved death: but live they should by his goodness and the gracious favour of the people of Rome. And moreover he promised neither to depolish them of their armour & weapons (the seizing whereof was put again and assurance unto such as feared rebellion; for as for him, he left unto them their armour freely to use at their pleasure, and their hearts and minds secured from fear) nor proceed in rigor and cruelty against the guiltless hostages, but against their own persons, if they went out and revolved again, nor yet would he content himself to be revenged of diltained and naked enemies, but the offenders & transgressors should in their armes suffer for their delicts. And now since they had tried both fortunes, as well the one as the other, he put unto their choice, whether they had rather have the Romans precise or dispensed, friends or enemies? So Mandonius had a fair delivery: only there was an imposition and fine laid upon him and Indibilis, of a sum of money for souldiers pay. Scipio himself also, he had sent Marius before into the farther part of Spain (beyond the river Jaxo) and Syllanus back again to Tarraco, said (some few daies until the Illyrians had made payment of the sponies that they were charged with: and then with all his souldiers lightly appointed without baggage, marched in a running camp to overtake Marius, who by that time approached near unto the Ocean.

The treaty which Masaniassa began before time, was upon sundry occasions put off still and deferred. For the Numidian Prince was very desirous to parley & commune with Scipio himself in person & in the right hand to a shew him of fealty: which was the very cause then, that Scipio took long a journey to far out of his way. Masaniassa being now at Gades, and advertised by Marius that Scipio was coming and near at hand, shew'd false semblance to Mage, made many excuses, & found much fault, namely, that their houses being plunked up and petried within the land, were welcome both and spoiled: and that by their long abode there, not only they made others feel the want and scarcity of all things, but also casted thereof themselves: and besides that his men of arms for very ease and idleness, became feeble and unready. By which suggestions he perswaded with Mage, and prevailed with him so much, as to suffer him to cross over into the continent, under colour to wait and spoil the land of Spain next adjoining. When he was passed over, he sent before him three principall Numidians, gentlemen of mark, to appoint both the time and the place of their meeting and conference, and gave orders, that Scipio should detain some of them with him as pledges: the third was sent back to conduct Masaniassa to the appointed place, according as he was commanded, and so with a small company they met for to compare and commune together.

Now was Masaniassa the Numidian King possessed before with a wonderful admiration of Scipio and his virtue, by reason of the fame that was blazed abroad of his noble acts: and had conceived withal and imagined, that he was a man right personable, of a mighty big and goodly stature; but when he once saw him in place, he grew into far greater reverence and honor of his person. For besides the exceeding majesty and port: that naturally he carried with him, his goodly long both of hair well became and graced him; the habit also and attire of the body, manly & soldier-like port brave nor tricked up decently and delicately, much adorned and let him out. And for his age he was in the best & height of his strength: which seemed upon his late sickness, more full, more long and mould, as if the very prime and flour of his youth had been renewed, and himself cast again in a new mould. The Numidian (at their first meeting) almost alotted, gave him thanks for sending back his brothers son unto him, saying, "That ever since that time, he fought to spite some occasion and fit opportunity, which now at length by the goodness of the immortal gods being pointed unto him, he had not neglected and let slip." Proteking that he was most delicious both to him favour, and to gratifie the people of Rome, any kind of service: in so much as there was no one forerunner more earnest & ready to advance and better the State of the Romans: then himself: which (as he had been willing unto heretofore) he could not possibly fore in "that long as he was in Spain, a strange country, and unknown unto him; but in that wherein he was born & brought up in hope of succession in his fathers Kingdom, he would be most forward to perform. For, in case the Romans would send but Scipio as a General into Hispania, he would doubt but hoped assuredly, that Cassius had not long to continue, and stand; but soon would come to a final end: Scipio for his part was glad both to see him, and hear him so speak, knowing this full well, that of all the cavalry of his very countenance carried none more after a way with quick & prize: and young man himself in his great countenance carried with him good show of a brave and happy mind. So after mutual promise given and received on both parts, Scipio retired to Tarraco: and Masaniassa who he had by the permission of the Romans foraged the coasts next adjoining, because he might not seem to have passed over into the Romans land for nothing, returned into Gades.

C When Mage now being in utter despair of Spain (whereof he had conceived great hope, and where himself is proudly: first upon the coming of the footmen, and after wards upon their revolt & rebellion of Indibilis) made preparation to sail over into Hispania, there came a message unto him from Cassius, that the Senate there had given order and direction, that he should transport the armada which he had at Gades, and pass into Italy: and there to take up again, with all the while men that he could levy, either of Gauls or of Ligurians, to go to join with his power unto Masaniassa: and not to suffer that war to quail and slake now, which was enterprised with greatest force and endeavor, and yet, with greater favour of fortune. For this exploit, both treasure was it brought from Carthage to Mago; and himself also raised as great sums as possibly he could of the Gaditanes, having not only emptied the common treasure of the Island, but spoiled also the temples, yea, and forced all private persons to bring abroad all their gold and silver whatsoever. As he sailed along the coast of Spain, he landed his soldiers not far from new Carthage; and after he had walked and overrun the territories by the Sea side, he approached near with his fleet, and did at anchor before the City: where all the day long he kept his soldiers within their ships; and by night let them ashore, and led them to ward the part of the wall, whereas Carthage was by the Romans won; supposing that the City was not sufficiently defended with a strong guard, and that some of the townsmen, upon hope of a change and alteration, would rise up in arms and rebel. But there were some polls out of the country in all haste beforehand, who had brought news, as well of the foraging of the country & fearful flight of the rustical peasants, as of the coming of the enemies. Moreover the armada was deferred also in the day time, & it was apparent, that they made not choice to anchor even just in the road before the City, for nothing. And therefore the City soldiers stood ready, well appointed, and in arms, and kept within that gate, which turned toward the lake and the sea. And when the enemies, soldiers and mariners confusedly together, were come in great disorder under the walls, with more tumultuous noise then forcible violence: the Romans at once suddenly set open their gate, and with a great cry and shout, made a sally upon them, charged the enemies, troubled and disordered them, & at the first onset & volley of shot discomfited and put them to flight, yea, and with much slaughter chased them to the shore: and but that the vessels stood close to the strand, ready to receive them abroad as they fled so fearfully, there had not been one left alive, either in the flight or fight. Nay, they that were left very ships were in great fright & peril, whilst to prevent the enemies of breaking in upon them pell mell with their own company, they pulled up the ladders, drew in the planks, cut a two the ropes whereby the ships were fastened to the banks; yea, and the very cables for half, that they might have no hindrance by weighing anchors, so that many there were, who in swimming to the ships, because they knew not in the dark night, which way to go or what to avoid, perished miserably. The next day, when the armada was fled from thence back again into the Ocean from whence it came, they were found slain eight hundred men: and of armors and corslets between the City wall and the sea shore, two thousand.

Mago being retired to Gades, was excluded from thence, and arrived with his fleet at Malis, a place not far from Gades. From whence he sent Embassadors, to complain that the gates was shut against him, being their ally and friend: and when the Gaditanes excused themselves and said, that it was long of an uproar of the multitude, who were offended & aggrieved for certain robberies committed, and spoil made by the soldiers at their departure, and when they were ready to be embarked; he trained forth to parry their head magistrats (whom the Carthaginians call Suffetes) together with the chief Treasurer: and after they were scourged and their skin piteously torn, he commanded them to be roundly trussed up and crucified. From thence he sailed to Paphos, an Island distant from the main an hundred miles, inhabited at that time by Carthaginians, where the fleet was friendly and peaceably received: & not only provided for liberality of store of victuals, but also furnished with lully men, for mariners to serve at sea, yea, and with armor and munition for soldiers. Upon which forces Mago bare himself confident and bold, and setting sail fell within the Balear Islands; that were fifty miles off. Now there are two of these Islands called the Baleares, the one greater then the other, and more mighty both in men and munition: having as beech and harbour where Mago supposed that he might commodiously winter in. But the Islander withstood his navy with as great hostility, as if they had been Romans that had inhabited the Island, they could not have done more. And as now adies they use for the most part cings, so at that time they practised no other kind of weapons at all. And in no nation besides, can ye find one special person, so much to excell in that feat, as all the Baleares generally do exceed and surpass others in the call and flight thereof. And therefore they discharged and levelled among them, as the armada approached the shore, such store of stones flying about their ears as thick as hail, that they durst not enter the haven, but turned their ships into the main sea again. Then they pervert to the lesser & Island of the Baleares, which was it was fertile in soil, for so much and straw it was nothing ill strong. Whereupon they disbarked and came a land, and above the haven in a strong and well fenced place they encamped. And having gotten to be masters both of the City and territory about it, without any force of arms and combat, they levied and enrolled there, among them two thousand auxiliary soldiers, whom they sent to Carthage for to winter, and thence they drew up their ships along into the dock. When Mago was once departed from the Ocean side coast, the Gaditanes surrendered themselves to the Romans.

These were the acts achieved in Spain, under the conduct & fortunate government of P. Scipio, who having delivered the charge of the province to L. Lucinius, and Publius Lucinius, returned to Rome with a fleet of ten sail: he had adorned given him in the Senat, assembled in the temple of Bellona, without the City, where he had been before them in order from point to point, of all the affairs and exploits that he had done in Spain: namely, how often he had fought in set and ranged battles: what a number of towns he had forced, and won from the enemies: what nations he had subdued and brought in subjection under the state of Rome: how at last he passed into Spain, against four general captains and four victorious armies; and now had not left one Carthaginian in all those parts. Yet for all these noble deeds, he rather desired that hope be might have of a triumph, than made any hot & earnest lure therefore: because it was never seen to that day, that any one had triumphed who made war, being himself no principal Magistrate. After the Senat was risen and dismissed he entered the City and caused to be carried before him into the Chamber of Rome, of silver in bullion, 24,345 pounds weight; and in coin besides, a great quantity. When L. Furius Philo held the solemn assembly for creation of Cof, and all the Centuries in general, with exceeding favour and affection elected P. Scipio Cof, and for to be his companion in government, P. Lucinius Crassus the Archbishop was joynted unto him. But this assembly (as we find in records) was celebrated with more frequency of people, than ever any had been known during this war. For they repaired and met from all parts, not only to give their voices, but also to see Scipio: nay they ran in great numbers to his house, and into the Capitol, when he sacrificed and slew an hundred oxen in sacrifice for the honour of Jupiter, according to his vow which he had made in Spain. And all mens minds gave them, and they were assuredly periwaded in their hearts that as L. Lucinius finished the former Punick war, so P. Cornelius would make an end of that which was now in hand: and like as he had driven all the Carthaginians forth of Spain, so would Scipio hunt them out of Italy: and every man in his conceit wished and assigned unto him the Province of Africa, as if the war in Italy had been fully brought to an end. Then ensued the election of the Prætors, And two were created that were then Adiles of the Commons, to wit, P. Lucinius, and Cn. Octavius: and of private persons, Cn. Servilius Scipio, and L. Æmilius Pappus. In the fourteenth year of the Punick war, P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus entered their Consulship. And unto the Consuls were the Provinces appointed: namely, unto Scipio was Sicily granted without casting lots, and that with the consent and good liking of his Collegue, because he being the Archbishop, was by virtue of that dignity kept still in Italy, for to see the sacrifices, divine service, and Church matters: and unto Crassus the country of Britany was assigned. Then the provinces for the Prætors were put to the lottery; and the civil jurisdiction within Rome fell to Cn. Servilius Ariminius (for so they called Gallia) unto P. Lucinius: Sicily was allotted to L. Æmilius and Lædinius Cn. Octavius.

The Senat assembled in the Capitol: where Publius Scipio propounded an Act, and it was confirmed by the authority of the house, That out of the money which himself brought into the common treasure he might be allowed to defray the charges of those plaies and games that he had vowed in Spain during the time of the Soldiers mutiny. Then he called the Embassadors of the Saguntines into the Senat house: and the most ancient man amongst them spake in this wise:

"Although right honourable, it be not possible to find any more miseries & calamities than we have endured already in the maintenance of our faithful allegiance unto you even unto the end, yet such have your deers been to us ward; & so many favours have we received of your Captain Generals, that we think not much nor repent of any damage or loss, that we have sustained in that behalf. For first ye entered into the quarrel, & began the war for our sake; and having once begun it, ye have continued therein for the full space of 14 years; and that with such resolution, that oftentimes, as ye have plundered your selves into extreme peril & danger, so ye have engaged no leis the State of the Carthaginians, for at what time as ye had within Italy a cruel and bloody war, & Annual your mortal enemy, ye sent forth your Cof, with armies into Spain, as it were to gather up the broken reliques of our shipwrack, Pub and Cn. Cornelius the two brethren, from the first time that they came into the Province, never ceased to devise and do whatsoever might either advantage us, or endanger our enemies. For first and foremost they restored unto us our town again: then having made enquiry throughout all Spain, where any one of our Citizens were sold as slaves, they delivered and redeemed them out of miserable servitude, and recovered for them their former freedom. But see; When we were well-near come to this good pass, that from our poor & piteous estate we were raised up to a wished for and desirable fortune, then Pub, and Cn. Cornelius your Generals suddenly died: whose death hapned in manner more lamentable and dolorous unto us than unto you. For then we thought verily that of our selves, that we were reduced from remote & distant places unto our ancient habitation for this purpose, that we should perish once again, and see a second overthrow and destruction of our native country: knowing thus much, that for to work our utter confusion there needed not a Carthaginian captain or army to be the instrument and the means: for even the Turdetans alone, our most ancient enemies, who were the cause also of our former ruin and undoing, were able with their own forces to root us out clean, and extinguish our name. Yet amongst this noble perplexities, immediately beyond all our hope and expectation, ye sent among us this noble Scipio here in place. In whose behalf we count our selves of all Saguntines most happy, because we have seen him declare Cof, already, and shall be able to report the news unto our neighbours and fellow Citizens, that we have beheld with our own eyes, even our whole hope, our help, our health and safety. Who having forced & won very many Cities and towns of your enemies in Spain, at all times and in all places set the Saguntines apart from out of other prisoners & captives, and sent them home again into their own country. Finally, as for Turdetania, a nation so adverse and so dangerous enemies unto us, that if it should continue still in prosperity, Saguntines could not possibly stand upright: he hath by force of arms so quelled and tamed it, that neither we our selves, nor (be it spoken without arrogance) any of our posterity hereafter need stand in

"noble exploits: and highly renowned amongst nations both the Roman people, and also "your own name & family. The time will not serve, if I would do all this day do nothing else but "reckon and recount unto you, how many Kings, Emperors, & General Captains there have been,
"who have contented rashly into their Kingdoms, countries, and received many toils and overthrowes
"thereby, as well in their own persons, as in their whole armies. The Athenians, a most prudent &
"politic State, having left the art at home in their own country, and following the counsel & "suggestion of one young man, as hardy & valiant in arms, as noble in birth & parentage as your "self (none dispraised,) failed into Sicily with a brave and puissant navy; and there in one battell "fought at sea, overturned and ruined for ever their most flourishing City & Common-wealth.
"But why seek I former examples of strange, and stories of times too far past, and over-long ago.
"Let even this I name Africk, and M. Scipio, serve as a notable example of both fortunes for us.
"Intend, and learning for ever. Now surely, P. Cornelius, when you shall once discover Africk with "in your view from the sea, you will think then that your Provinces of Spain were matters of import "in comparison of it. For what semblable proportion is there between them? When you were in "your voyage for Spain, you failed in the calm sea peaceably along the coast of Italy and France,
"and arrived at Emporia, a friend City and Confederat: and when you had landed your men, you
"led them in security through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far "as Tarentum. From thence ye journeyed all the waies by Cities and towns, furnished with Roman "garrisons. About the river Iberus you found the armies of your father and uncle, which remained "upon the loins of their Generals more fierce and fell for the calamity that they had received than "before. You met there L. Marius their Captain and Leader, chosen (I must needs say) known &
"not how in a hurry by the soldiers themselves for the time; but otherwise I assure you, if "ability of birth and the titles of dignities which he justly deserved had graced him, he was in all "feats of arms and martial knowledge, comparable to the very best warriors & noblest Captains.
"After this you assaulted Carthage without any impeachment, and took your time at your own "pleasure, even when there was not one of the three Carthaginian armies to aid & defend their "affairs. As for all the exploits besides (without offence be it spoken & not to debate any good "service there) they are in no respect to be compared with the African war: where we shall find
"no haven open to entertain our Armado, no Country peaceable, no City confederate, no King "friendly, no place at all either to sojourn and rest in, or to march forward and pass through with "safety. Which way soever you cast your eyes, nothing but hostility threatening danger and perill.
"unto us. Do you indeed trust Scipio, as yet upon the Numidians? Well, let it suffice that once "ye trusted them. Rath adventures speed not a waile best. And oftentimes we see, that fraud be-
"meth faithfull, and maketh way of credit in small things, that in matters of greatest importance, "and when the time serveth it may pay home and work a mischief with a witness. The enemies
"overcame not your father and uncle by force of arms before that the Celtiberians our Allies
"over-raught them by falshood and treachery: neither were your self in so much danger from "Mago and Asdrubal, the chief Captains of your enemies, as from Indibilis and Mandonius, your "new friends and confederates. Can you reppie any confidence in the Numidians? You say that "have experience of your own soldiers mutiny, and have seen them rise against you: As for Scipio
"and Masaniassa, as they had rather themselves be the sovereign & most mighty in Africk, than
"than the Carthaginians should: so surely they with the Carthaginians to be the highest above "all others besides their own selves. Now at this time there is some emulation and heat-burning "among them, and all occasions of quarrell with them on to maintain sides and factions, so long "as fear of forraign enemy is far enough off. Shew them once the Roman arms and forces, let "them see an host of strangers come, they will run I warrant you altogether thence as it were to "quench a common fire. You shall find that the very same Carthaginians will far otherwise "stand to the defence of the wals of their Country, their Cities, the Temples of their gods, their "Altars and private houses, when going to battell they shall have their fearful wives to bear them
"company, their small children to go aforesome in their eye; you shall find them, I say, like
"to it than they did in the quarrell and defence of Spain. But what and if the Carthaginians "finding themselves strong enough upon the confidence of the general concord of Africk, of "the faith fidelity of the confederate Kings, of the strength of their own wals, should forsake "themselves, when they shall see Italy destitute of your help, and disarmed of their forces, ei"ther to make out a fresh army from Africk and send it into Italy, or else give order and direction "unto Mago (who as it is well known for certain, is departed with his navy from the Bazar "Islands, and lyeth floating and riding continually upon the Alpine Ligurian) for to join his "power with Annibal: It is a clear case, that we shall be in as great trouble, and as much aligh"ted then as we were of late, when Asdrubal mounted over the Alpes, and came down into "Italy. Asdrubal, I say, whom you have suffered to pass over into Italy. But you will say that "all Africk let go out of your hands, and suffered to pass over into Italy. But you will say that "you have vanquished him. Say you so? I would not for any thing, not only in regard of the love
"I beare to the Common-wealth, but also of the affection that I carry toward your self, that a van"quished man could find the way by you into Italy. Be content & suffer us to attribute all things "that have gone well with you or the Common-wealth, during the time of your government, to "your wisdom and policy; and contrariwise, whatsoever hath fallen out cross and adverse to im"pure and assign the same to nothing else, becaus the variable events of war, and to fickle fortune.

A under their hand: & decreed it was that they two, namely, L. Veturia & Q. Caelius, should either
"The better and more valiant that you are, the more need hath your native country, yes, and all
"Italy besides, to keep you still at home with them, to brave a captain. O rare a Protector. You "also about your own self dissemble the matter, but confesse, That wheresoever Annibal is, there is "the very head, the fort & strength of all this war: for as much as you pretend, that the only cause
"why you would pass into Africk, is to draw Annibal thither after you. Well then, be it here or "elsewhere, with Annibal you must have to do. Tell me then, whether are you like to be stronger
"at Africk: your self alone, or here where your own forces and the power of your Colleague shall be "joined together? Is it possible that even the late example of Livius and Claudius, so fresh in "memory, should not inform and teach us, what difference there is between the one and the o"ther? In what place I pray you, will Annibal be more strong in men and munition; here in the "unfertile corner & angle of the Brutians country, where this long time he hath waited in vain for "aid from home, where he hath sent for succour and gone without; or neer unto Carthage, and in "the midst of Africk among his friends and allies? What kind of policy is this of yours, there to de"cide the quarrell and try the whole matter, where your own forces are lesse by a halfe moity, and
"the power of your enemies much greater and stronger, rather then here, whereas you may "fight with the power of two armies against one, toiled out of heart in so many battels, and wearied "with long warfare, so tedious and grievous withall? Consider with your self, what comfort "and resemblance there is, between your designs and your fathers. He, as Consul having "made a journey into Spain, to the end that he might encounter Annibal as he came down the Alps, "retained out of his own province into Italy: and you, when Annibal is in Italy, purpose to a"bandon and leave Italy. And why? forsooth not because you judge it good for the common-wealth, "but because you think it an enterprize that may import you in great honour and glory: like as
"when you being captain General of the people of Rome, left your province at random and your "army at six and seven, without warrant of law, without order or act of Senat, hazarded in two "bothoms the whole state and majesty of the Empire of Rome; which at that time together with "the danger of your life, incurred the perill and jeopardy of the maine chance. To conclude, for "mine own part (my I.L. of the Senat, am of this mind, and this is my conceit, that P. Cornelius
"was not created Col. privately for himself and his own bebold, but for the good of the common"wealth and us all: and then the armies were levied and enrolled, for the guard of the City and de"fence of Italy; and not for the Coll. in their proud self-conceit & overweening of themselves.
"After the manner of absolute KK to transport & lead into what parts of the world they list them"selves. When Fabius by this oration (premeditated and framed to the time) had through his authori"ty and the long settled and confirmed opinion that men had of his wisdom, drawn unto his side
"good part of the Senat and especially the ancients; in such as the greater number commended
"and the grave consent of the old man, above the lully and youthful courage of the other gallant;
"then Scipio by way of answer made these remonstrances, and spake in this wise. "My lords of the
"Senat, even Fabius himself in the beginning of his oration, said very well, that his opinion which "he was to deliver, might be suspected of detraction and envy. Of what note, verily I drifit not "my self tax and accuse a man of his quality and reputation so much, as methinks is not so well
"decreed as it ought to be the very suspicion it self: and I wot not whether it be by a default of his "speech orator, or that the thing it self is so pregnant. For in such manner he extolled with good-
"ly words, and magnified his own dignities and renowned deeds, and all to quench the jealous
"and cruell of envy: as if my self was to fear the danger of emulation and concurrence of some "company of the basest degree and condition and not of him; who because he far surpasseth other "men, (which height and pitch of honor I deny not, but I endeavour my self to reach unto) would "not in any hand, that I should compare with him. So highly hath he advanced himself in regard "of his old years considering that he hath gone through all ranks and honour: and so low de"bated me, and put me down even under the age of his own ion: as though the desire and love of glory,
"should paffe no farther then the length of mans life, and the greatest part there of extended not
"to the memory of posterity and the future time. This I hold for certain, that it is a thing inci"dent to the most magnanimous men and of greatest spirit and courage, to have a desire for to "match themselves not only with them that live in their daies, but with most famous & excellent "persons, that ever were or might be in any age. And surely for mine own part, Q. Fabius,
"I will not make it goodly, but frankly bewray my mind that way, namely, that I would full fain
"not only attain unto your praise-worthy acts and commendable virtues; but also (with your good "leave be it spoken) if possible I can, even to excell and surmount the same. Therefore let us not ea"sily this mind, either you towards me, or I to those that are younger then my self, to be unwilling "and think much, that any one citizen among us, should prove equal to our selves: for in so do"ing, we should offer wrong and do hurt not only to them whom we have envied and maligned,
"but also prejudice the common-wealth, & in manner the whole state of all mankind. And thus much "to you self. He hath now (my lords) recounted, to what great perils I should enter into by the A-"frick voyage: in such sort, as he would seem not only to have a careful regard of the common"wealth and the army, but also to pity me and tender my ease and fortune. Whence cometh it, that "you should all on a sudden take so great care for me? when my father and uncle both were slain,
"when their armies both twain, were utterly almost defeated and put all to the sword; when "Spain was lost; when 4 armies of Carthaginians, and 4 Generals, held all in fear by force of "arms; when there was a captain sought for to undertake that, ward and no man durst be seen to put himself forward, no man so hardy as to present and offer his service, but my self; and when the people of Rome had committed the charge and government of Spain to me, a young man but four and twenty years old, how hapned it that no man then took exception at my age made mention of the enemies force, discoured of the difficulty and danger of the war, or his abroad the late and fresh defeat and death of my father and uncle? I would demand and gladly know whether we have instructed now lately, some greater calamity and losse in Africa, than we received at that time in Spain? or if the armies at this present in Africa be more puissant, or the captains more in number, or better in valour, then they were in Spain at that time? or whether mine age then, was more ripe and sufficient to manage wars, then now it is? Lail of all, whether it be better, more commodious & easie to maintain war with the Carthaginian enemy in Spain, then in Africa? After that I have discomfited and put to flight four hosts of Carthaginians; after I have either fed by assault, or reduced under mine obedience (for fear) so many Cities; after I have vanquished and subdued all, even as far as to the Ocean sea, so many principall and potentates, so many fierce and cruel nations; after I have so fully recovered Spain, as there is not remaining to be seen there, so much as the footing and bare token of any war: an easie matter it is, and all one to elevat and depresse the acts past that I have achieved: as also par-die it will be, when I return with conquest out of Africa, to dis-bale and make nothing of those very things, which now to keep me back from thence, and to make them appear strange, are amplified with great words & uttered upon the theaters to the full. He holdeth that there is no easie, no entrance into Africa, nor have we been open to receive an armada, He telleth us and allegeth that M. Atilius was taken prisoner in Africa, as if M. Atilius fortioth at his first arrival in Africa, had caught that harm and heavy misfortune. But he never remembreth and calleth to mind, how that even the very time captain, as in civill war he was yet found the braver, open enough into Africa; and the first year bare himself right valiantly, and victoriously; & set him to work Carthaginian captains, continued in in-battle to the end. You shall never therefore scape me with the example so much, (were it so), that the calamity you speak of, hapned in Spain, was not in the former: of late, and not forty years ago, that I should give over my intended purpose, and not fall into Africa now, because Regulus there was taken prisoner: as well as I passed before into Spain, whereas the Scipio chanced to be killed. Or that I shall suffer, that Zanthippus the Lacedemonian was born into this world more happy for Carthage, then my self for Italy: but rather, that thereby I should think the better of my self, considering that the virtue of one only man can be so useful, so consequent, and so great effe. But we ought (you say) to consider the example of the Athenians, who leaving the war at home in their own country, passed over into Sicily unadvisedly. Seeing you are so good, leasure to read tales and report the fabulous fables of Greece; why dis-oult you not rather of Agamemnon the king of the Syracusan? who seeing that Sicily a long time was troubled & vexed with the Punick war, failed out into the self same Africa, whereof we speak, and withdrew the war thither from whence it came? But what need I to instruct and teach you by rehearsing old and forrain examples, how materiall a thing it is and important, to begin with an enemy first and put him in fear; and by bringing another in danger, to remove the peril from our selves: Can there be a precedent found more pregnant more present and fresh in memory to prove and enforce this point, then Annibal? A great difference there is between the waiting and piling the lands of others, and seeing of our own burnt and destroyed. And he which giveth the assault, to endanger another, is ever of more courage then he that standeth upon his own guard and at defence only to save himself. Moreover, the fear and dread is alwayes greater of things unknown unto us: but so soon as a man is entred into the confines of a forrain country he may beheld and see at hand as well the good as the bad; what may advantage and what may endamage the enemies, Annibal would never have thought and hoped, that so many States in Italy would have revolted unto him as they did upon the overthrow at Cannae. How much lesse account then may the Carthaginians make of any thing in Africa, to remain full and assured unto them: who are sickle all as to strangers without all truth and fidelity: proud lords & intolerable tyrants over their own subjects full of wrath & cruelty? Or, and besides, we were forsaken and abandoned of all our confederates; stood alwayes upon our own forces & maintained our selves with meer Roman soldiers; whereas in Carthage they have no strength of naturall citizens: (consider that they have, are mercenaries: all & waged for money partly Africans and partly Nations the most unconstant nations of all others by nature, and aptest to enter into changes & innovations. Let me have no stay and hindrance in this place only; ye shall hear news at one time that I am set over in Africa, that all the country there is up in a broil: that Annibal is ready to dislodge and remove out of these parts: & also that Carthage it self is besieged. Expect you daily out of Africa better and luckier tidings, yea and often then ye heard out of Spain. O hopes of mine. I ground upon the fortune of the people of Rome: upon the justice of the gods witnesses of the league broken by the enemies upon Sphax and M. Janiss, both Kings, whose truth and fidelity I will trust so far forth as I find them, and ever stand in fear and doubt of their falshood and treachery. Many things they are now, that by distance of place appear not, which war on begun will soon discover. And this is a special point of a man indeed, & of a good captain, in no case to be wanting unto fortune when the offereth herself, but to take all advantages that she giveth: and those accidents and occurrences which fall by chance to make use of them,

As ye and by wisdom and counsell to frame them to his own purpose and designs. True it is, O Fulvius, I shall have Annibal to beard and to match me: a soldier, I confesse, as good every way as my self, but I will rather draw him after me, than he shall keep me back as good every way. For he I will to fight in his own country, and Carthage shall be the price of my victory, rather then the decayed pieces, and half ruinat pericyables of the Bruttii. Only provide, O Q. Fabius, that in the mean time whiles I am at sea in my voyage, whiles I am landing mine army in Africa, whiles I approach Carthage with a running camp, the Common-wealth be not harmed and damaged here at home. See to this, I say, and be well advised, that it be not a shameful reproach to say, that P. Lucius the Consul, a man of singular valour (who because he is the chief Priest, and by virtue thereof, not to absent himself from the solemn celebration of sacrifices and divine service, was content and willing, that the charge of so distant a province should not befall unto him by casting lots) is not able to perform that, now when Annibal is half-dead, and his heart almost broken, which your self was sufficient to effect when Annibal squared it out, and braved all Italy like a conqueror. But let the case and suppose I say, that by this course which I mean to take, the war be never the sooner brought to an end: yet surely it were for the honour of the people of Rome, and for the reputation and name which they have among forrain princes and States abroad, that they may see and know, that our hearts serve us, not only to defend Italy, but also to offend Africa. And that it might neither be thought and believed nor spoken and noised abroad in the world, how no Roman captain durst adventure that which Annibal hath already dared and done: and when as in the former Punick war, when all the quarrell was for Sicily, our armies and armados so often assailed Africa: now that Italy is in question Africa should lie still, and be at rest. Nay, rather let Italy be at repose and quiet now at last, after so long travel and affliction, and let Africa in her turn be fired and forraged another while. Let the Roman camp be pitched rather under the very walls and gates of Carthage, then we see once again from out the trench and rampier of our enemies, to invest our City. Let Africa be the set place and seat of the war, let fight and flight, foraging and harrying of countries, revolt and rebellion of allies, and all other inconveniences and enormities that follow war, which have lien heavy upon us these 14 years, turn from us thither. Let all content and suffice me to have spoken as touching State-matters & the commonweal of the war present, ly in hand; and concerning the provinces and their government now in question and consultation: it would require a long and tedious discourse, and the same impertinent altogether unto you, as if Q. Fabius hath declared and deprieved mine acts in Spain, so I likewise should dist- grace him, and diminish his glory, and set out my self and mine own reputation with goodly and magnificent words. But my self, I will do neither one nor the other. And if in nothing else, yet at least while young man as I am, I will in modesty and government of my tongue go beyond him as old and ancient a personage as he is. Thus have I lived, and thus have I carried my self in all mine actions, that without blazing of mine own praises, I can soon content my self with that good opinion which you of your selves have conceived and entertained of me.

Scipio had audience given him, with lesse indifference, and patience: because it was commonly voiced abroad. That if the Senat would not grant him to have the province and empire of Africa, he would immediately propound and put it to question before the people. Whereupon Q. Fulvius, a man that had been four times Consul and Censor besides, required the Consul to speak his mind openly before the Senat, whether he would refer unto the LL, there assembled, to determine of the provinces, and stand to that which they should set down or prefer the thing unto the people. When Scipio had made answer again and said, That he would do that which might be good and expedient for the service of the Common-wealth: then Fulvius replied upon him and said: I demand not this question of you, as ignorant what either you would answer or what you meant to do. For I know full well, that ye pretend no leis your self, that you do but sound the Senat, and feel rather how they had inclined, then to stand to any advice of theirs in good sadness. And in case we do not presently grant you the province according unto your desire, you have a bill framed already to present unto the body of the people and Commonalty. And therefore (of he) my masters, ye that are Tribunes, I require your aid and assistance, in that I forbear to speak unto the point and deliver mine opinion in this regard, because I know that the Cons. will not approve and ratifie the same, howsoever the whole house will go with me, and allow my sentence. Hereupon arose some brawle & debate among them: whiles the Cons. urged and enforced this point especially, and said, It was against all reason and equity, that the Tribunes should entrepote their authority, and not permit every Senator being requested to speak in his turn, to deliver his mind and opinion. Then the Tribunes made a decree in this manner, if the Cons. be content that the Senat shall determine of the Provinces, we will and command, that all men rest in that which the Senat that ordein and judgmeneth will we suffer the same to be proposed unto the people: if he be not content nor yield them, then we will assist him who shall refuse to speak to the matter. Then the Cons. requested a daies rest to confer with his Colleague, and so the morrow after he condescended to put all to the censure of the Senat. And in this wise were the provinces distributed and appointed: unto one of the Cons. Sicily was assigned, and thirty ships of war, with brazen beak heads (even the same that C. Servilius the year before had the charge of) with commission also to pass over in Africa, if he thought it were to the good of the Common-wealth. The other Consul had the government of the Bruttii and the managing of the war against Annibal, with the power of that army which L. Veturius and Q. Caelius had wherein they seemed to be made good friends; again, The same Livius left all the tribes by appointment divided, and caused them to pay tribute to no denizens; for that they had both condemned him being innocent, and also made him a Consul and Censor afterwards.

The nine and twentieth book of T. Livius.

SCIPIO after he was arrived in Sicily, disposed his voluntary souldiers in order, and enrolled them by Centuries. Over and besides them he had about him three hundred lusty tall fellows; for the flower of their age and strength of body, the bravest men of all others: but they with not themselves for what purpose they were relieved: being neither assigned to any company, nor to any service, but to be ready to be called upon at all. Then he made choice from one of the whole manhood and youth of Sicily three hundred men of arms, such as for birth and wealth were the very principall and best in the Island, who were to pass over with him into Affrick: and he appointed them a day, upon which they should all present themselves in readiness, furnished and appointed in the best manner with horse and armor. This wasfare so far from home was like to be irksome unto them, and to be with it much trouble, many difficulties and dangers, as well by sea as land. The consideration and fear hereof mightily disquieted not only the parties themselves, but also their parents and kinsfolk. Now when the day appointed was come, they shewed their horses and armour. Then Scipio made a speech unto them, and said, "That he was given to understand, that certain Sicilian horsemen stood in great fear and dread of this soldiery, as if being a fore and painful piece of service: In case then (quoth he) there be any of you so minded and disposed indeed, I had rather you would now presently be known thereof unto me, and confess at once, then hereafter to whine and complain, and so to prove lazy lubbers and unprofitable souldiers to the Common-wealth. And therefore enter your minds in plain terms, and I will be content to hear you without offence. Whereupon, when as one of them took a good heart, and said flatly, "That if it lay in his choice freely to do what he would, he was altogether unwilling to serve: then Scipio answered him again in this manner, Forasmuch as any youth hath not dissembled thy hearts grief, but spoken out what thou thinkest, I will soon deputate one in thy run unto whom thou maist deliver thy armour, thy horse, and other furniture of warfare, and whom thou shalt forthwith have home with thee, therto to train, teach, and exercise him after thou hast given him thy horse and armor. The young man was glad hereof, and accepted the offer upon that condition: and so he assigned unto him one of those three hundred above said, whom he kept about himself unnamed. When the rest saw that horseman in this manner discharged of his service, and that with the favour and good will of the General: every man then began to speak for himself, and to make excuses and took others in their stead. Thus for the three hundred Sicilians were substituted as many Roman horsemen, without any expenses at all of the State. And the Sicilians themselves had the charge of instructing and training them up. For the General had made an Edict and Proclamation, That whosoever did not so, should serve himself in person. This proved by report a brave cornet of horsemen above the rest: and in many battles performed right good service to the Common-wealth. After this, he took a survey of the legions of footmen: and all those who had born arms longest in the wars he selected forth, especially such as had been employed under the conduct of Marcellus. For those he well wist to have been brought under the best discipline of warfare, and also by reason of the long siege of Syracuse, the most skillful in assaulting of Cities. For now they were no small matters that he had in his head, but he plotted even the very destruction and ruin of great Carthage. After this, he divided his army and placed severall forces in sundry towns. The Cities of Sicily he enjoyed to provide corns he made spare of that which was brought out of Italy: the old ships he newly repaired and rigged, and with them he sent Lentulus into Affrick for to prey upon the country and fetch in prizes: the new which rid at Panormus he drew up to land, that they might all winter long lie upon dry ground: and be seasoned, because they were made in halfe of green timber. When he had prepared all things necessary for war, he came to the City of Syracuse, which as yet was not in good order and well quiered, since the great troubles of the late wars. For the Greeks made claim for their goods, granted unto them by the Senate of Rome, which certain of the Italian nation detained and withheld from them by the same violence, wherewith in time of war they had possessed themselves thereof. He supposing it meet and requisite to maintain above all things, the credit of the State: partly by virtue of an edict and commandment, and partly by a civil course and process of law against such as were obnoxious and avowed their wrongs done, he forced them to make restitution to the Syracusians. This act of his pleased not only them, but also all the States of Sicily: and therefore they were more willing and forward to help him in the wars.

The same summer there arose in Spain great troubles, raised by the means of Indibilis the Iberian. For no other occasion or reason in the world, but because in regard of the high admiration of Scipio, all other Captains besides whatsoever were but despised. "Him they supposed to be the only General that the Romans had left, now that all the rest were slain by Annibal. And hereupon it was (thought they) that when the two Scipios were killed, they had no other to send into Spain but him: and afterwards, when the wars grew hot in Italy, he was the only man sent for over to match with Annibal. And over and besides that, the Romans had now in Spain no Captain at all, but in bare name and shew: the old experienced army also was from thence withdrawn. All things are out of frame, and in great confusion, & none there, but a disordered sort of raw Irish water souldiers. And never they looked to have again the like occasion & opportunity to recover Spain out of their hands. For hitherto they had ever been in subjection to that day, either to the Carthaginians or the Romans, and not always to the one or the other, by turns, but otherwise to both at once. And like as the Carthaginians have been driven out by the Romans, so may the Romans be expelled by the Spaniards, if they would hold together. So that in the end Spain being freed from all foreign war, might be reformed for ever to the ancient customs and rights of the country. With these and such like suggestions and discomfites, he solicited and raised not only his own subjects and countreymen, but the Auleians also, a neighbouring nation, yea, and other States and Cities that bordered upon his and their confines: so as within few days there assembled together into the territory of the Sedetans (according to an Edict published abroad) thirty thousand foot and eight hundred horsemen.

The Roman Captains likewise for this part, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, left no neglected of the first beginning the war might grow to a greater head, joyined their forces together, and marching through the country of the Auleians, as peaceably as if they had been friends, notwithstanding they were known enemies) came to the very place where they were encamped and pitched themselves within three miles of the enemies. At the first they assayed by way of Embassage to deal with them, and to persuade them to lay aside all arms and hostility: but they laboured in vain. Afterwards, when as the Spanish horsemen gave charge suddenly upon certain Roman Captains that were foraging, the Romans also sent out from their Stations and Corps de guard their Cavalry to refuse: so the horsemen skirmished, but no memorable act to speak of was effected on the one side or the other. The next morning by sun-rising the enemies all shewed themselves armed and in order of battle, and braved the Romans within a mile of their Camp. The Auleians were marshalled in the main battle: the Iberians in the right point, and certain other Spanish nations of late and mean account in the left: between both the two wings and the battle, of either hand they left certain wide and void places, whereas when the time served they might put forth their horsemen. The Romans having embattelled and put themselves in array after their old and usual manner, yet in this one thing followed the examples of the enemies, in leaving out certain open waies between the legions for the men of arms to pass through. But Lentulus supposing that the use of the horse-service would be advantageous to that part which first should fend out their Cavalry into the battle of the enemies, that lay to open with spaces between, gave commandment to Ser. Cornelius a Knight Marshall or Tribune, to will and charge the Cavalry to set to with their horses, and to enter those open lanes between the enemies' batallions. And himself having sped but badly in beginning the fight with footmen so rashly, staid no longer, but until he had brought the thirteenth legion (which was set in the left wing opposite to the Iberians) out of the rearward into the vanguard, for to succour and strengthen the twelfth legion, which already began to shrink and give ground. After that once the skirmish there was equal and fought on even hand, he advanced forward to L. Manlius, who in the forefront of the battell was busy in encouraging his men, and sending supplies and succours into all parts where he saw needful: shewing unto him, that all was well and whole in the left point, and that he had sent out Cornelius with his horsemen, would like a tempestuous storm come upon them, and soon overcast and becloud the enemies round about. The word was not so soon spoken, but the Roman horsemen were ridden within the thick of the enemies, and not only disordered the array and companies of the footmen, but also at once shut up the waies and passages that the Spaniards could not make out with their horsemen. And therefore the Spaniards leaving to fight on horseback, alight on foot. The Roman Generals seeing the ranks and files of the enemies disarrayed, themselves in fright and fear, and their ensigns waving up and down every way: fell to exhorting, yea, to entreating of their own Infantry to recharge them with all their force, whiles they were thus troubled and disbanded, and not suffer them to come into order, and re-enforce the battell again. And surely the barbarous people had never been able to abide their violent impression, but that Indibilis himself their Prince and Lord, together with the men of arms that were now dismounted on foot, made head against the ensigns of the footmen in the vanguard. Whereupon ensued a sharp and cruell fight for a good while. At length, when as they that guard about their Prince (who first, although he were half dead, yet stood their ground and fought towards with a javelin was nailed to the earth) were overwhelmed with darts, and slain: when they began to flee on all hands: but the greater number were killed in the place, because both the horsemen had no time nor space to recover their horses, and mount upon them again, and also the Romans pressed so hotly upon them after they were once discomfited, and never gave over until they had stript the enemies quite out of their Camp. So there died that day thirteen thousand Spaniards, and well near eight hundred were taken prisoners. Of Romans and Allies, not many more than two hundred left their lives behind them, and those especially in the left point, the Spaniards, that either were driven out of their Camp, or escaped out of the battell, hirt ran scattered and dispersed over the fields, and afterwards returned every man to his own City where he dwelt.

Then Mandacius summoned them to a generall council: where they all bewailed their calamities & miseries, greatly blamed the authors of the war, and agreed in the end to send their ambassadors ladons to give up their arms, and to yield their bodies. These having excused themselves and laid the whole fault upon Indubitu & the rest of the Princes who were the ridders of the war, & were for the most part slain themselves for their labour in the field, yielded up their armour and themselves, and received this answer from the Romans: That they should be received to mercy, and their submission accepted, if they would deliver alive into their hands Mundinus; and the rest that were the breakers of peace. Otherwise, they threatened to lead their forces into the territories of the Illegates and Auleians and so forward, of the other nations their complices in that rebellion. With this answer the Orators departed, and related the same in the council assembled. Where Mundinus and the rest of their Lords were apprehended & delivered to the Romans for to be punished and executed accordingly. So the States of Spain obtained peace again: and a double tribute for that year was imposed upon them, and they enjoyed to provide corn to serve the army six months, besides fouldiers liveries, short coats, and side caskets; and they received hostages near thirty Cities. Thus the troubles and rebellions of Spain being begun and ended after this manner, without any great ado within few daies, all the force of the war turned upon Affrick.

C. Lelins being arrived in the night at Hippo Royall, by the break of the day, led forth with banner displayed in order of batel all his fouldiers and mariners, for to harrey and spoil the country. And finding the inhabitants there retailed and careless, and living in security as in time of peace, they did much hurt and annoyed them fore. Whereupon the news went in post to Carthage, for all on a hurry & put them in exceeding great fear. For it was reported, that the Roman Army was arrived, and that Scipio the General was landed (for the rumour ran before, how he was passed over already into Sicily.) And because they never desiered the ships, nor discovered certainly what power of men invaded and spoiled the country, they thought the most and doubted the worst as fear commonly maketh every thing more than it is. And so at first they were only affrighted and terrified; but afterwards they grew melancholly and troubled in spirit in their teams, to think, "That fortune should so much be changed, that they, who a little before as noble conquerors, had lain encamped with an army before the walls of Rome, defeated to many hosts of enemies, and either by meer force or meer love, held all the States of Italy under their Signory, should now themselves see the wheel to turn about, as they were like shortly to behold the waiving and spoiling of Affrick, and the City of Carthage besieged: a thing that they were never able to endure with that valour and resolution, nor to abide with such strength as the Romans had, for the Romans had ever the Commons of Rome; they had always the youth of Latium ready in hand: who still recreated more and more the new try, and daily grew in number to make supply, and to repair & furnish out to so many armies that were defeated. Whereas, their natural people were neither in town nor country fit for service, their aids were waged and hired for money from among the Africans, a nation like to turn upon any accident, & to change with every puff of vain hope, and were besides false and unfaithful in their promise. For now the Kings already, Sphax and M. Jausif, the one upon conference with Scipio is secretly alienated from us in heart, and the other openly revolved in action, and become our most deadly enemy: so that there remaineth neither help nor hope for us at all in any place. For neither Mago is able in Gad to make any commotions and rebellion nor yet to join with Annibal: And as for Annibal himself, he weareth apace, and decayeth daily both in fame and reputation, and also in strength and forcible means. When their minds being thus disquieted upon those fresh and present tidings, they were fain to bewail and lament their wofull fate, the instant danger recalled them again to console by what means they might withstand the imminent perils. So they thought good to the musters in all haste both in the City and the countries by, to lend some to levy and wage the aids of the Africans: to fortifie their City, to bring in store of grain, to provide weapons and armour, to rig their navy & to send it out to Hippo, for to encounter the Roman Army. Whiles they were devising these courses, there came at last a post with news, that it was Lelins and not Scipio who was set a shore: that there was landed no greater power than for to make rodes into the country for booties only: and as for the main strength of the whole army, it remained still in Sicily. So they had some respite to breath themselves, & began to address their Embassies to Sphax and to other Princes, for to establish and confirm peace and league between them. They dispatched others also to Philip, who should make promise unto him of two hundred talents of silver, in case he would take the seas and pass over either into Sicily or Italy. Messengers also were sent as far as into Italy unto their own Generals serving there, to will them to ralle what troubles they could possibly, for to keep Scipio a work, and hold him back from coming into Affrick. And unto Mago were sent not only those messengers aforesaid, but also five and twenty long ships of war, six thousand foot-men, eight hundred horsemen, seven Elephants, and great store of treasure besides for to hire aid, whereby he might advance forward with his forces nearer to Rome; and join with Annibal. These preparations were making, and these courses devising at Carthage, when as Masaniissa upon the bruit that went of the arrival of the Roman fleet, began to start up and rouse himself: and accompanied with some few horsemen, came unto Lelins, busie in driving still great booties out of the country, which he found altogether disarmed of armour, and unprovided of guards and garrisons for defence. "He much complained that Scipio was so slack in his affairs, and graved that he had not passed over ere this time with an army into Affrick, whiles the Carthaginians were thus affrighted, whiles Sphax was troubled with the wars of the borders of whom "he was thus much persuaded, that if he might have resting time to compose his own affairs

A "to his mind, he would not continue fast unto the Romans, nor deal in any thing faithfully and soundly with them: willing him to sollicit Scipio, yea, and to spur him on and importune him not to stand longer at a bay and make delays. And for his own part, notwithstanding he were distressed of his fathers Kingdom, yet he would be ready to assist him with such a power of foot and horse as were worth God amercy: advising Lelins which not to make any longer stay in Affrick, for as much as he believed verily, that there was a fleet already let out from Carthage, with which in the absence of Scipio, he might not with safety enter into conflict and battail. After this communication, Masaniissa was dismissed, and Lelins the next day looped from Hippo, with his ships laden with pillage and prizes: and being returned into Sicily, declared unto Scipio the council and credence that he had from Masaniissa.

B About the very same time those ships which were sent from Carthage to Mago, coasting along the Albanians and the Ligurians, arrived at Genoa, it happened that Mago at that time lay with his fleet in those parts: who upon the words of the messengers, & the communion to raise as great forces as possibly he could, immediately held a council of the Frenchmen and Ligurians: for of both nations there were great numbers in those coasts. "Where before then all he declared how he was sent unto them for to let them at liberty: and how (as they might like themselves) to that effect he was furnished with new aid and succour from home. But what forces, and how great an army was needful for the managing of the war in hand, it lay in them to determine. As for himself, first and foremost he knew full well, that there were two Roman armies abroad, one in France, the other in Tuscany: and that Sp. Lucretius would join with M. Lelins: and therefore C they themselves were to put many a thousand in arms, for to make head against two Generals, & two compleat armies of Romans. The Frenchmen made answer again, that their will was good enough, and they had an exceeding desire to compels and effect the designment intended: but for as much as the Romans had one camp within their confines, and another in Tuscany near adjoining, and in manner within fight, it peradventure they should be seen in the action to aid the Carthaginians: incontinently both armies, as well the one as the other would in all manner of hostility invade their territories: and therefore they requested him, to desire of the Gauls such things, wherein they might stand high in head, secretly under hand. As for the Ligurians, because the Romans lay far enough off encamped from their lands & Cities, they might dispose well enough of themselves as they list: and therefore it was good reason that they should put their D young & able men in arms, & bear a part in the managing of the war. The Ligurians replied not. Only they craved respite of two months, for to take the matters. In the mean time Mago, having sent away the Gauls, closely took up & prettily considered throughout their country Towns for money, and from the States of France, there was sent secretly provision of victuals of all sorts unto him. Marcus Lelins led his army of Voluntaries out of Tuscany into France, and having united his forces unto Lucretius his power, was ready to receive and welcome Mago: if haply he removed out of the Ligurians country nearer to the City of Rome; but in case Mago kept himself quiet in a corner under the Alps, he minded also himself there to keep his standing leaguer about Ariminum, for the guard and defence of Italy.

After the return of C. Lelins out of Affrick both Scipio was pricked forward by the indignations and privations of Masaniissa: and also his fouldiers, seeing great prizes brought out of the enemies Land, and every ship freight therewith: were mightily incited and set on fire with a burning desire, to be transported over thither with all speed possible. But as they were plotting about this enterprise of greater importance, they thought also upon a lesser that came between, namely the winning again of the City of Locri, which in the general revolve of all Italy, had fided also with the Carthaginians. The first hope that they conceived both to affect and effect this enterprise grew upon a very small matter: by occasion that in the Brutian country, the whole manner of service was performed, by way of robbing and roving, rather than by any ordinary course of war. The Numidians first began, and the Brutii soon took it up and seconded them: not so much because they would keep the Carthaginians company, and do as they did: but for that of their own natural inclination they were prone, and ready enough to follow that course. At last the Roman fouldiers also, infected as it were by their example, took delight in robberies: and so far forth as they might have leave of their Captains, would make inroad into the territories of their enemies. It happened so, that when some of them were gone abroad a plundring, certain Locrians were intercepted, and brought away with them to Rhegium. In which number of captives, were some carpenters and malons, who as it chanced, were hired to work for the Carthaginians in the Castle of Locri. These were discovered and known by certain great men, and the principal citizens of the Locrians, who happened then to live as banished persons in Rhegium: such as by the contrary faction that banded with Annibal had delivered Locri into his hands, were taken out of the City. These men fell to questioning with them (as commonly their manner is, who have been long out of their own Country) of many matters, and among the rest, how all things stand at home: who told them all accordingly, and therewith, put them in some good hope, that if they might be ransomed, set at large, and sent home again, they would betray the Castle unto them: for as much as within it they dwell, and the Carthaginians put them in trust of all things there. They therefore, as men that were wonderful desirous to return thither, as well for joy of their native country, as for to be revenged of their adversaries, out of hand paid their ransome: and after they had given order how to work the feat, and in what sort: as also agreed upon upon the signs and tokens which they should mark from on high a far off, they were sent back again. Then the eiled Locrians repaired unto Scipio at Syracuse, with whom also were others of the banished persons of Locri: and there they related unto him the promises of the captives afore-said, and put the Consul in very good hope that the effect would be correspondent to their designment. With them were sent two Tribunes or Masters, to wit, M. Sergius and P. Matienus, with commission to conduct three thousand soldiers from Rhegium to Locri. Letters also were dispatched unto Q. Pleminius the Vice-prefect, for to be assistant in this action. Who being departed from Rhegium, and carrying with them scaling ladders, proportioned to the height of the Castle wall, were told unto them, about midnight gave a token by fire to those that were to betray the Castle, from that place which they had agreed upon: who being in readiness also, and looking wittily for them, put down likewise ladders of their own, made for the purpose; and in many places at once received them that climbed up: so as, before there was any alarm heard, they set upon the watch of the Carthaginians, half asleep as they were, and distrustful no such matter: who first were heard to groan as they lay a dying, but afterwards, to make a noise and keep a running and much ado, upon their sudden starting from sleep, all the whiles that they wist not what the occasion was. At length, upon the discovery of the matter, one man wakened another, and every one called aloud to arms: trying out, that the enemies were within the Castle, and the watchmen slain. And without question, the Romans had been put to the worse and defeated quite, being far fewer in number than the forces: which (so long as men knew not from whence it came, put them in great fear: and the tumult besides by night made every small and vain thing much greater than it was. By means whereof, the Carthaginians astonished (as if all places had been full of enemies) abandoned all fight, and betook themselves unto the other fortresses (for two there were distant not far asunder.) The Townsmen kept possession of the City as the prize and guard in the midst, for the winners. But out of the two Castles there were light skirmishes every day. Q. Pleminius was Captain of the fort and garrison of the Romans, and Amilcar over the Carthaginians: and both parts increased their strength, by aids that they had coming unto them from the places adjoining. Until at last Amilcar shewed himself in person: and no doubt the Romans had never been able to hold out, but that the whole multitude of the Locretians were galled and grieved with the proud government and the covetous polling of the Carthaginians, took part with the Romans. When intelligence came to Scipio, that the Romans were distressed in Locri, and that Amilcar himself was advancing thither: for fear lest the garrison also should be in some hazard (as having no ready means to retire from thence) himself leaving at Messana his brother L. Scipio for the guard of the place, passed over from thence with his vessels down the water, when he espied the current and the tide together to serve for a fare. Likewise Amilcar having sent out a vanguard from the River Burarus (which is not far from the City Locri) to signify unto his men, that by day light they should give a hot charge with all their might and main upon the Locretians and Romans both, whiles he himself made an assault upon the Towr behind, not looking for him, but wholly turned away and amused upon that other tumult. Now when as early in the morning he found the skirmish begun, he was not willing to put himself within the Castle, for fear of pestering with over great a company the place so freight and off so small receipt: and for to scale the walls they had brought no ladders with them. So causing all their carriages and packs to be piled up in one heap together: he presented all his footmen in battail array before the City, to terrifie his enemies withal: and with the Numidian horsemen he made a bravado under the walls, and rode about the City. Whiles the ladders and other ordinance meet to give an assault, were in preparing and making ready, he approached on horseback near to the wall, for to view on which part above the rest, he might give the assault: and there he was shot with a quarrel discharged from an engine called a Scorpion, which happened to be planted near unto him. And being affrighted at this so dangerous an occurrence, he commanded to found the retreat, and fortified his camp aloof without the peril and shot of any dart. Now was the Roman fleet from Messana arrived at Locri, and had the day afore them: so as they were all set a land, and entered the City before the sun setting. The morrow after, the Carthaginians began to skirmish out of the Castle: and Amilcar being now provided of ladders, and having all things else in readiness needful for the assault, came under the walls: with that all upon a sudden the Romans set open a gate and sallied out upon him, who feared nothing less than any such accident: and thus setting upon them at unawares, slew two hundred of them. Amilcar perceiving that the Consul was there, retired with the rest into the camp: and after he had sent a messenger to them that were within the Castle, willing them to shift for themselves, in the night season he dislodged and departed. They also who were in the fort, after they had set on fire the houses which were in their keeping, of purpose by that tumult to cause the enemy to make some stay and tarry behind, ran away in manner of a rout, and before it was night with good foormanship overtook their own company. Scipio seeing as well this Cause quit by the enemy, as their camp also empty, called the Locretians to a general assembly, and gave them a sharp check, and rebuked them for their revolt. The principal Captains & Anchors of that trespass put to death: and gave away their goods to the chief heads of the other faction, in reward and consideration of their singular fidelity to the Romans. But as concerning the publick state of the Locrians, he said he would neither make nor meddle therewith, either in giving to them, or taking ought at all from them. But willed them to send their Embassadors to

A Rome and look what the Senate would award in equity that fortune they should abide. This one thing he was well assured of, that how illsoever they had deserved of the people of Rome, yet they should live in better condition under the signory of the Romans, provoked to anger as they were, than they had already under the government of Carthaginians, pretending love and amity as they did.

Then himself in person cut over to Messana with those forces that he brought with him, leaving Pleminius his Lieutenant, and that power that won the Castle, in garrison for the defence of the City. The Citizens of Locri had been so proudly mistreated, and so cruelly handled by the Carthaginians, after they were revolted from the Romans, that it seemed they could be content to abide any small wrongs, not only patiently but also willingly, and in manner with a glad heart. But so now exceeded Pleminius, Amilcar the former captain of the garrison so well the Roman garrison soldiers before the Carthaginians in wickedness & avarice, that a man would have thought they had strave together who should pain the other in fustial vice and ungodliness, and not in acts of arms and prowess. For neither Captain nor soldier forbore to practise upon the poor Townsmen any enormous facts, which are wont to make the great & mighty men odious unto the poor and meek persons. They wrought and committed shameful villanies upon their very bodies: upon their wives and children. And their greedy avarice so far proceeded, that they could not hold their hands from spoiling and robbing the very religious and sacred Temples. Inasmuch, as among other holy Churches which they polluted, they met even with the rich measure of Prosepeia, which had been still in all ages, and untouched by all others: save only it was reported to have been spoiled by Pyrrhus, who indeed carried away the spoil of her, but he deeply bought it, and paid full sweetly for that sacrilege. And therefore like as before time the Kings ships shaven with temples, and torn and split with the rage of the Sea, brought nothing at all in that wreck to land, but only that sacred money of the goddesses, which they had stolen and carried away: even so at this present, the very same money (but in another kind of calamity and misery) brought upon them that were tainted in that wicked action of robbing the Temple, a strange & frack madnes: which caused Captain against Captain, and soldier against soldier, to fight as if they were dark mad, and enraged as mortal enemies one with another. Pleminius had the chief role and command of all. As for the soldiers, some were under him: such as himself had brought from Rhegium; others were commanded by the Tribunes or Colonels. Now it chanced that one of Pleminius's soldiers had stolen a silver cup out of a Townsmans house, and ran away with the lad, dogs, and the owners after him with hue and cry, and returned to come in the way, still to meet with Sergius & Matienus the two Tribunes or Colonels full in the face: Whereupon the cup was taken from him by the commandment of the Tribunes: and thence arose first a brawl, and some hard words were dealt between: and from them consequently they went to open clamors and loud noises, until at length there grew a very fray between the soldiers of Pleminius and of the Tribunes: and according as they came still one or other in time to help their own side, both the number and the riot increased at once. In the end, Pleminius's men went away with the blows, and moved themselves unto Pleminius, running to him with open mouth and great indignation, shewing their bloody wounds: and reporting besides, what opprobrious words to the disgrace and passed against him without spare in the time of those brawling fits. Hereupon a great anger and boiling heat of blood, he gat him forth of doors in all the haste: convened the Tribunes before him, and commanded them to be stripped naked, and the rods to be brought forth ready to the scourge them. But whiles there was some time spent in turning them out of their apparel, and dressing them for they struggled & made resistance, and called to their soldiers for help at once they came thick about them (for very lusty they were upon their fresh victory) and ran from all hands, as if the alarm bell had been rung against the coming of some enemies. But when they saw once the bodies of their Tribunes strewed with rods, then they fell into far more furious rage and fury, for madnes: and thus incensed as they were, without all regard, not only of the respect and majesty of authority, but also of common humanity, they fell upon the Lieutenant himself, who they had most pitiously beaten and evil intreated his Lictors and Officers about him. Then having galled him out apart from his Ministers and Sergeants, they cruelly mangled him, cut off his noses, scrape his ears, and left him half dead. News hereof came to Messana, and within few days Scipio highed him apace to Locri in a gally directed with six banks of oars: who after due examination and hearing of the cause between Pleminius and the Tribunes, acquit Pleminius as innocent, and left him Governour of the garrison of the place: but he judged the Tribunes guilty, as Malefactors, and caused them to be bound in chains for to be sent to Rome unto the Senate: and he bestowed to Messana, and from thence to Syracuse. Pleminius not able to overcome his anger, and thinking that Scipio had dealt but coldly and negligently in the matter, and made too light of the injury which he had received, and not punished the offenders accordingly: and supposing that there was no man else able to make true estimate of the cause, but he that in his own person had felt the hard dignity and hainousness thereof, commanded the Tribunes to be hailed before him, and after he had put them to all the cruel torments, that any mans body is able to abide, he put them to death, and not satisfied either with their dolorous torture whiles they were quick, nor with taking their lives from them, cast their dead bodies forth into the fields, there to lie above ground unburied. Like cruelty he exercised upon the principal Burgesses of the Locrians, which he heard say went to Scipio for to make complaint of his wrongs and injuries. And look

what foul and shameful pranks he had plaid afore with his friends and allies, proceeding of lust and covetousness: the fame now in his fell and furious rage he multiplied and wrought in divers sorts: so as he brought infamy, hatred and obloquy, not only upon himself, but also made the world so think hardly, and to speak much shame of the General himself.

Now drew the time near of the solemn election of Magistrates: when as there came letters to Rome from Pub. Licinius the Consul, the tenor whereof was to this effect: That himself and his army were sore vexed with a grievous sickness: and that he could not possibly have staid there, but that the violent contagion and influence of the same malady, if not greater & more grievous, had not assailed the enemies. Seeing that therefore himself was not able to come unto the election, he was minded, if it might so stand with the good liking of the Lords of the Senat, to nominate as Dictator Q. Cecilius Metellus, for to hold the foresaid election. And as for the army of Q. Cincius, it was for the good of the Common-weal that it should be called and discharged, since that there was no employment of them at this present: considering that Annibal was retired already with his forces into his standing camp, and taken up his wintering harbours; and again, the pestilence grew so hot in that leaguer of his, that if they were not discharged betimes, there was not one of them like to escape and remain alive. In these points, the LL. of the Senat granted our their commission unto the Consul, for to do according as himself thought to stand either with his own credit and trust committed unto him, or the benefit of the Common-weal.

At the very same time there was a certain religious opinion that had possessed of a fuddain the whole City, by occasion of a certain Prophecie found in the books of Sibylla. When search was made into them and they diligently perused, about the raining of ftones, which appeared to offer that year. The Prophecie ran in this form: "At what time soever an enemy of a strange and foreign country, shall happen to make war upon Italy, he may be chased out of Italy and vanquished: if the goddess dame Cybele of Ida, were brought to Rome from Pessinus. This Prophecie found by the Decemvirs, moved the Senat more, for that the Embassadors also who carried the oblation and present afore said to the Deities, related, That as they themselves sacrificed unto Pythius Apollo, all the inward of the beast killed for sacrifice, appeared good, and shewed prosperity: and the Oracle besides gave answer, That there was a far greater victory toward the people of Rome than that was, out of the spoils whereof they brought gifts and offered to the God at this present. And for to make up and fully accomplish these hopes, they alleged withal, how P. Scipio in demanding the Province of Affricke, did preface (as it were) before-hand in his mind the final end of this war. To the end therefore, that they might with more speed obtain this honorable victory thus fore-tokend, and offering (as it were) it self, by all lucky prefagings of men and Oracles of the Gods, they thought and devised (fome mean to transpire the said goddesses to Rome.

The people of Rome in those days was confederated with no States of Asia: howbeit the LL. calling to mind, how long ago, upon occasion of a sickness, and to purchase health unto the people, Esculapius was sent for likewise out of Greece, before it was joynted with the City of Rome in any league or society: and considering withal, that there was some friendship and amity being already with King Attalus (in regard of the common war against Philip) and that he would be ready to do for the people of Rome, whatsoever lay in his power, they resolved to send unto him an honorable Embassage to wit, M. Valerius Levisius, who had been twice Consul, and had warred in Greece: M. Cecilius Metellus, who had been a Pretor, and Servius Sulpitius Galba: likewise an Edile, and two late Quæstors, C. Tremellius Flaccus, and M. Valerius Falco. For these five, they assigned five Quinquagems or Gallies of five ranks of oars, that according to the credit and dignity of the people of Rome, they should make a voyage into those Lands; with whom they were to win a reputation and Majesty to the Roman name and State. These Embassadors, as they held on their course toward Asia, so soon as they were put on Land at Delphos, repaired directly to the Oracle, for to know what good hope it might afford unto them and the people of Rome, by offering that business and commission, about the which they were sent forth. And this answer by report, was returned to them again, That they should obtain their desire, and effectuate their purpose, by the means of Attalus the King: advising them moreover, That when they had conveyed the said goddess down to Rome, they should take order, that the very best man of all others in the City, should give her lodging and entertainment. But to proceed, to Pergamus they came unto the King. Who having courteously received and welcomed the Embassadors, conducted them into Phrygia to Pessinus, and delivered into their hands that sacred and holy Roce, which the inhabitants of the country sayd was the Mother of the Gods, and willed them to carry it to Rome. Then M. Valerius Falco was sent back from the other Embassadors to adventure them at Rome, that the goddess was coming, and that they should seek out the best man in all the City, for to receive and lodge her in his house with all devotion that might be.

Now was Q. Cecilius Metellus nominated Dictator by the Consul in the Brutian country, against the solemn election of the Magistrats. His army was disbanded and called, and L. Venerius Philo created master of the hostie. Then the Dictator held the Election. In which were chosen Consuls, M. Cornelius Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus: in his absence, who at that time had the government of Greece. After them were elected Pretors, T. Claudius Nero, M. Marcius Ralla, Scribonius Libo, & M. Pomponius Matro. When the Election was finished, the Dictator resigned up his place of magistracy. The Roman Games were thrice renewed and set forth, & the plates Philisteven times exhibited. The Ediles of the chair were Cn. and L. Cornelius Lemulus both. This Lucius governed

A vermed then the Province of Spain: created he was in his absence, and absent as he was he bare that dignity. The Ediles of the Commons were T. Claudius Asellus, and M. Junius Pennus. That year M. Marcius dedicated the Temple of Venus, near the gate Capena: the seventeenth year after it was vowed by his father at Clafidium in Gallia, during the time of his first Consulship. There died also this year a Famous of Mars, namely, M. Boaylius Regillus.

For the last two years, the affairs in Greece had not been well followed, Philip therefore taking the vantage, that the Ætolians were forsaken of the Romans (and only said upon which they trusted) forced them both to sue for peace, and to contrive the same under what conditions and capitulations himself pleased: which if he had not made the better bait, all that ever he could to accomplish in good time, P. Sempronius the Vice-Consul, sent to succeed Sulpitius in the government, had utterly defeated him whiles he waged war with the Ætolians, considering that he was ten thousand foot and a thousand horse strong, and had five and thirty tall ships of war, heeded with brass pikes before a power of no small importance. I assure you, to aid and assist his allies. For the said peace was not so soon concluded, but news came to the King, that the Romans were arrived at Dyrrachium; that the Parthines and other neighbour nations, upon hope of change and a new world, began to rise and rebel: and that Dimulchus was already besieged and assaulted: for to that City the Romans bent their power (in lead of aiding the Ætolians unto whom they were sent) upon high displeasure and indignation, that without their advice and consent, yea, and against the tenor of the accord and covenants they had made a peace with the King, Philip, upon these advertisements, for fear lest some farther troubles might arise among the nations and States there bordering took long journeys, & sped him space toward Apollonia. Thither Sempronius was retired, after he had sent Lethorius his Lieutenant with part of his forces and thirteen ships into Eubea to visit the country, and to see in what terms they stood, yea, and to disturb and break the peace if possibly he could. Philip waited and spoiled the territories and lands of the Apollonians, and approaching the City with his whole power, had battail to Sempronius the Roman General. But after he saw, once that he kept himself quiet within the City, standing only upon his guard and defence of the walls: disturbing also his own strength, as not able to force the City by assault & defiance withal to entertain peace with the Romans as well as with the Ætolians, if he could: if not, yet at leastwise to have truce with them without effecting any more (seeing he could but only rub an old sore, & renew cankred malice upon fresh contention & quarrel) he returned into his realm.

About the same time, the Epirots weary of long wars, after they had first sounded the disposition and mind of the Romans that way sent their Embassadors unto Philip, to treat about a general and universal peace: affirming, that they had assured hope of an honorable end and agreement, if his highness would vouchsafe to come to a parly with P. Sempronius the Roman General. And soon they obtained thus much of him, as to pass over into Epirus, for the King himself was not unwilling thereunto. Now there is a City in Epirus, named Phaniæ, where the King after communication had first with Eropus, Dardas and Philippus, Pretors of the Epirots, entered into an interview also with P. Sempronius. At this solemn meeting and conference, Aminander the King of the Athamans was present, and other Magistrats of the Epirots and Acarnans. And first Philippus the Pretor began to speak and request as well King Philip as the Roman General, to make an end of all wars, and likewise to give the Epirots leave to do the same. P. Sempronius propounded and shewed the articles and conditions of peace in this wise, That the Parthins, Dimulchus, Bargulium and Eugentium, should belong to the Signory of the Romans, notwithstanding that they had obtained of the Senat by their Orators sent to Rome, to be annexed to the dominion of Philip King of Macedonia. When they were agreed for peace upon those capitulations, there were comprised within the league on the Kings behalf, Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achæians, the Bœotians, the Thebais, the Acarnans, and the Epirots: and on the Romans, the Illyiens, K. Attalus, Pleuratus, Nabis the Tyrant of the Lacedæmonians, the Eleans, the Messenians, and the Athenians. And hereof were instruments and indentures ingrossed and sealed, and truce made for two months, until such time as Embassadors were sent to Rome, that the people might by their suffrages approve of the conditions in that form. So all the tribes in general granted the same, because the war now being intended and bent against Affricke, they were willing for the present to be discharged of all other troubles.

P. Sempronius having concluded peace, departed unto Rome for to enter his Consulship. Now when as M. Cornelius and P. Sempronius were Consuls (which was the 15 year of the Punic war) the Provinces were assigned unto them in this manner, namely, unto Cornelius, Hetruria with the old army: unto Sempronius the Brutia, with the new legions that he was to enrol. And to the Pretors in this wise were the Provinces allotted, that M. Marcius should be Lord chief justice of the citizens pleas, and L. Scribonius Libo have the jurisdiction of foreigners, together with the government of Gallia, Italy, that M. Pomponius Matro should rule Sicily, and T. Claudius Nero sit at L. Depuy in Sardinia. As for P. Scipio, his commission was renewed and continued for one year longer, with the command of that army and Armado which he had conducted before. Likewise P. Licinius had his commission newly sealed for to have the charge of the Brutian country, with the power of two legions, so long as the Consul thought it good for the Common-weal, that he should remain in the government of that Province. Also M. Livius & Sp. Lucretius with the assistance of those two legions with which they had defended Gallia against Mago, continued till in their room for another year. Moreover Cn. Octavius remained in place, with commission, that when he had delivered up Sardinia &c. the legion there unto T. Claudius, himself should with 40 long Gallies four the less, and guard the coasts along the river, within those limits, for which the Senat had given order. Lucius A. Pomponius the Pretor in Sicily were appointed the two legions of the Carthaginian army. And T. Quinctius and C. H. Taburnus Vice-pretors, were to govern as they did the former year, the one Tarentum, and the other Capua; and both of them were allowed the old garri- sons. As for the government of Spain, it was put to question before the people, what two Vice-pretors their pleasure was should be sent into that Province. And all the Tribes with one accord gave their grant, that the same Pro-consuls L. Cor. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, should fit as Governors in those Provinces as the year before. The Consuls began now to muster (soldiers as well to enrol new legions for to be sent into the Bruttian country, as also to supply and fill the number of the other armies; according as they were directed by the Senate. And albeit Afric was not yet openly declared a Province, but dissembled by the LL. of the Senate, (of purpose to lieve, that the Carthaginians should have no inkling and intelligence thereof before hand) yet the whole City was in good hope, and made full reckoning that this year the war would be deter- mined and fought out in Afric, and to an end for ever of those troubles. This persuasion of theirs had possessed their hearts with much superstition: and very forward men were, both to report, and also to believe many prodigious and strange wonders, which daily were blown abroad & divulged more and more. To wit, that there were two suns seen; that in the night season between whiles it seemed day light; that in Sardinia there was a burning torch or blasing Star teaching from the East to the West; that in Tarentum the gate, and in Anagnia, as well the gate as the wall indy- vidual parts were blasted and shaken with lightning; lastly, that in the Temple of Jane Sospita in Lavinium, there was a noise and a rumbling heard, with a horrible crack. For the expiation and purging of these prodigies, there was a supplication holden for one day: and a novential solemn sacrifice was also celebrated, because it had rained stones out of the sky. Besides all this, there was some consultation about the receiving of Ida Ida. For over and besides that M. Valerius one of the Embassadors was returned & had brought word that he would be very shortly in Rome, there came a new messenger with tidings, that she was now already at Tarentum. This deliberation (be- hind no small matter, namely, whom they should give judgement to be the best man simply in the whole City) held the Senat much amused: considering that every one for his part was more desirous of true victory, and pre-eminence in this behalf, than of any promotions, honours or dignities whatsoever, awarded unto them by the voices either of Senators or Commons. In conclusion, they judged P. Scipio, the son of that Cn. who was killed in Spain, a very young man, and as yet not of full age to be a Queitor, the very best man without exception in the whole City. Upon what motives of his singular virtues they were induced thus to deem of him, as I could willingly have delivered unto posterity, what had been let down in record by the ancient and first writers of those times: I will not interpose mine own conceits, in guessing at a thing which hath been dead and buried so long time. This P. Cornelius was commanded to go accompanied with all the dames of the City as far as to Ofis, there to meet the Goddess, and then to take her forth of the ship, and being once set on land, to deliver her unto the foresaid matrons for to be devoutly carried to the City. Now when the ship was arrived at the mouth of the river Tyberis, he, according as he was directed, went aboard in a pinnace, & lanchd into the sea: where he took the Goddess at the Priests hands, and brought her on shore. And the dames which were the noblest and chiefest of the City, amongst whom, C. Quinta was the Lady most renowned, received her. This Claudius who before time (as it is reported) was of no better name & fame than she should be, now by this religious and devout ministry, was for her chastity and continency recommended better to posterity. These women carried this Goddess charily & daintily in their hands; and took her by turns, one in couise after another. All the City came forth by heaps to meet her; and along the streets as she was conveyed, they stood at the doors with censers, making sweet perfumes, & burning frankincense: yea & praised unto her that she would willingly enter the City of Rome, and continue propitious & gracious unto it. Thus they transported her into the Temple of Viktoria within mount Palatine, the day before the Ides of April, which was always after kept as a festival holiday. The people with great frequency brought gifts unto P. Valerius, which they offered unto the goddess & solemnized a Lustrum. And those plaies called Megalica came up then, & were first instituted. Now when the Council were busy and fat about the supply of those legions which were in the Pyrenies, there were certain of the Senators began to whisper & blow into their heads, That the time was now come, no longer to abide those things which during the troubles and dan- gerous daies they made a shift to endure: considering that now at length by the goddesses of the Gods, all fear was past, and the dangers overblown. At which words the Lords of the Senat be- ing in great expectation and attentive to hear out the latter they went on and said, That to set out colonies of the Latins, which whiles Q. Fabius and Q. Fulvius were Consuls refused to set out soldiers, now almost for six years had intermitted their service in the wars, as exempted from warfare altogether, and enjoyed that immunity as an honor and reward for their good deeds: whereas in the mean time, other loyal and obedient allies were by mustering every year con- stantly, waited and consumed, in performance of their faithful allegiance and dutiful service to the Empire of Rome. At this speech, the Lords called not so much to mind a thing long forgot, and almost worn out of remembrance, as they were provoked to anger and grew very hot; & there- fore would not suffer the Consuls to pass any other matter before, but decreed that they should

* The Plaies called Megalica.

A peremptory consent to Rome the Magistrats, and ten principal citizens out of every of these Colonies, to wit, Nepe, Sutrium, Ardea, Cales, Alba, Carfo, Sora, Suessa, Setia, Circuli, Narnia, and Interamna, (for these were the Colonies touched in that point above-named) and to lay upon them every one a double levy of footmen; that number and proportion which they were charged with, when they set out most in the service of the Roman wars, ever since that the enemies were come into Italy: besides one hundred and twenty horsemen a peece. And in case any one of those colonies were not able to make up that full number of horsemen, then to allow for every man of arms three footmen; Provided always, that for foot and horse both, such should be choien and no other, as were most substantial and of the best behaviour, and be sent to what place soever there was need of supply, even out of Italy. And if any of them related thus to do, then the Consuls had commission to stay the Magistrats and deputies aforesaid, and not to give them audience in the Senat, (although they should require the same) before they had performed thole imposi- tions. Moreover thole Colonies were enjoyned to pay every year a tax or tribute, and that there should be raised and levied, one Ais in the thousand, of their tribute by the month; and be as- sessed in thole Colonies according to the rate and rule that the Roman Censors should let down; which they gave order to be the same that was laid upon the people of Rome: and the information thereof to be exhibited and presented at Rome, by the sworn Censors of the foresaid colonies, before they went out of their office. By vertue of this Act of the Senat, the Magistrats and chief men of thole Colonies were sent for and compelled to repair to Rome; and when the Consuls de- manded of them, thole soldiers and tribute aforesaid, they began all of them (but some more than others) to reneue and gain say it; yea, and flatly to deny, that so many soldiers could possibly be made, nay, hardly were they able, although they should strain themselves to furnish the bare single number, according to the usual proportion and old precript order: requesting and beseeching them, to give them leave to have recourse unto the Senat, and there to make force for their release: neither have we (say they) so much offended as thus badly to be used, not deferred worthily to be undone. And say, we must needs military and be cast away; yet neither our offence, nor the wrath of the people of Rome, can force us to find more soldiers than we have. But the Consuls, reluc- tance in their purpose, commanded the Delegates and Committees of thole Colonies, to stay till at Rome, and their Magistrats only to repair home and take mullers: for as much as (unless the full number of soldiers which was set down unto them were brought to Rome) there was no Com- mittee there would grant them audience in the Senat; Thus when all hope was cut off, to have access into the Senat, and to obtain a release; thole twelve Colonies took a levy and enrolled the full number. Which was no hard matter to be done, considering how their youth was increased in that time of long vacation and intermission of warfare. There was likewise another matter (by as long silence forgot and well near quite forgotten) proposed newly again by M. Valerius Levinus; who said, That it was meet and good reason, that thole private persons which had credited forth their monies to the Common-weal, when himself and M. Claudius were Consuls, should now at last be satisfied, contented, and paid: neither ought any man to marvel why he (notwithstanding the City were bound for the debt) had a special care and regard to call upon them for to have it discharged: for, besides that the Consul for that year being, when thole monies of money were granted, was in some sort properly obliged, to see that credit were kept; himself moreover was the very man that made the motion of taking up thole monies, in regard that the City chamber was so empty of treasure, and the Commons puries so bare of money, that they were scarce able to pay the ordinary tribute. This overture made by the Consul, was well taken of the Senat, who willed the Consuls to put up this matter to the house: and so they entered in Act and decree, that the said debts should be discharged at three payments: whereof the first should be made pre- sently by the Consuls then in place; the other twain, by the Consuls that were to succeed in the third and fifth years next ensuing.

But there fell out one new object and occurrence, that drowned all other cares besides, and wholly possessed the heads of the Senat, by occasion of the miseries and calamities of the Locri- ans: whereof before that day, they had no knowledge nor intelligence, and now were by the coming of their Embassadors declared and divulged. Neither were the people provoked to choler and anger, so much as the lewd behavior and wicked pranks of Q. Plautius, as the slackness and negligence, or else the partiality and connivency of Scipio in dealing between them. These Embassadors of the Locrians, ten in number, presented themselves before the Consuls sitting in the open Hall called Comitium; clad they were in homely weeds and coarse apparel, looking pale and poor on the matter; and carrying withal in their hands as tokens of humble suppliants, certain branches of the Olive, according to the manner of the Greeks, fell down prostrate upon the ground before the Tribunal, with piteous weeping and sorrowful lamentation. The Consul demanded who they were: and they made answer again. That they were Locrians, who had endured at the hands of Q. Plautius the Lieutenant, and the Roman soldiers, such indignities, as the people of Rome would not find in their hearts, that the very Carthaginians them selves should suffer and sustain: beseeching them to do them this favour, as to give them leave to have access to the Lords of the Senat, there to make their mone and complain of their woful distresses. Being ad- mitted into the Senate and audience given them, then the ancientest man of the company spake in this wise, "Right honorable (my LL.) I know full well (quoth he) how important it would be, and available to the due estimate and weight of our complaints and grievance, in case we were informed and acquit himself, if he can. If when all is done and said, it can be proved, that he hath left undone any mischief against us, that one man can devise to do unto another: we will be content to abide and endure all those injuries once again (if it were possible) which we have suffered already, yea, & to hold and declare him guiltless of all offences done both to God and man.

When the Embassadors had laid abroad those matters, and Q. Fabius demanded of them, whether they had complained unto P. Scipio, and uttered these their griefs before him; they made answer and said, "That they had sent Embassadors unto him, but he was busied in making preparation for the wars, and was either passed already over into Africa, or upon his voyage ready to take the Seas within few days; and they had been by good experience, in how great favour the Lieutenant Pleminius stood with his general: and namely, they were not ignorant how Scipio after he had heard the matter between the Tribuns and him, committed them to prison: but as for the Lieutenant, who was as faulty as the other, if not more, him he left there still in his full authority. Now after that the Embassadors were willing to go forth of the Temple where the Senate sat, the chief LL. of the Senat began with biting words to inveigh bitterly against Scipio as well as Pleminius. But above all others, Q. Fabius girded at him, and said, That he was born to corrupt and mar all military discipline. Thus (quoth he) in Spain also we have lost more by mutinies of our own soldiers, than by the wars with our enemies: for why? after a strange and forrain manner, and according to the guise of Kings, one while he cockered his soldiers and suffered them to have their will and head too much; otherwhiles he would be overharp and cruel to them. After which rough words, he came upon them both thus with as heavy and sharp a sentence, namely, That Pleminius the Lieutenant by his counsel should be had away hopped in chains to Rome, and there clapt up in prison, until his cause were heard, and judicially determined: and in case those challenges were true, that the Locrians have commended against him, he should be put to death in prison, and his goods be confiscate and forfeited to the chamber of the City. As for P. Scipio, in that he presumed to depart out of his province without commission and direction from the Senat, he should be called home; and the Tribuns of the Commons dealt withal, to prefer a bill unto the people for his deprivation, and to put him besides his place of government. As touching the Locrians, his opinion was, That the Senat should give them their dispatch, and return them this answer: First, as touching the wrongs that they complained of, it was not the will and pleasure neither of the Senat nor of the people of Rome that they were done: who wished with all their hearts they had been undone: Item, that they acknowledged them to be good men, to be their friends and allies, and so would accept of them and call them. As to their children, their wives, and other goods taken from them whatsoever, their mind was that they should be restored again: Item, that enquiry should be made what sums of money were taken out of the treasury of Proserpina, and that two fold restitution should be made and laid up there in stead of it: Item, that there should be a solemn purgatory sacrifice celebrated for amends and expiation of that sin; but so, as the college first of the Priests and Bishops should be consulted with, and their advice taken in that behalf, (considering the sacred treasure was disquieted, laid open and violated) namely, what manner of expiations and cleansings were to be used, to what Gods, and with what beasts they should sacrifice: Finally, that all the soldiers which were at Locri should be transported over into Sicily; and in their room four cohorts of allies from out of the Latin Nation should be brought to lye in garrison there. But every Senator could not be asked his opinion and sentence that day, by reason of their difference and disagreement of minds so hotly incensed, some in favour, other in disavow of Scipio. For besides the lewd part of Pleminius, and the calamity & oppression of the Locrians they began to speak against the apparel of the General himself. "How he went not like a soldier and a warrior, no, nor to much as like a Roman: walking up and down, and squaring it out in the schools and open places of exercise with his mantle and cloke, and in his slippers and pantofles, after the Greek fashion: And that he was over bookish, and set his mind too much upon readings, and took delight to be in the fencing school and wrestling place, and all his men and guard about him as idle and wantonly given as he, took joy in the pleasures & delightful feast of Nepesina.
As for Gentilius and Anubis, they were quite forgotten: and his whole army through loose-ness and liberty was spoiled and clean lost, like to that of late at Sacro in Spain, and all one with them at this time in Locri, more to be feared of their friends than their enemies. And albeit these matters thus reported, were either true, or mingled with some truths, and therefore sounded all very probable, yet the opinion of Q. Marcius prevailed: who in all other things gave his assent unto Maximus, only as touching Scipio, he varied from him. "For I can not see any reason (quoth he) how this can stand, that when every his whole City chose at those young years of his to be the only Captain for recovering Spain, of whom they had made special choice to be their Consul, after that he had gotten Spain from the enemies, to end at once the Punic wars; and from whom they reported great hope, that he was the man to draw Anibal out of Italy, and to subdue all Africa; he now should all of a sudden be called for home out of his Province, as a person almost condemned, without pleading and hearing of his cause, as if he were another Pleminius, considering that even those lewd and cruel parts which the Locrians complained of were by their own words and confession not committed, while he was present in place neither could he be charged and accused directly for ought else but only for his indifferency and con-nivency, in that upon a tender and respective indulgence of his Lieutenant, he was too remisand forbore to punish him with rigor. His advice therefore and opinion was, that M. Pomponi- us the Pretor, unto whose lot the government of Sicily was fallen, should within three days next and immediately ensuing, take his journey into his province: and that the Consuls, should elect 2. Commissioners or Delegates out of the Senat, such as they thought good of, and send them with the Pretor: likewise two Tribuns of the Commons, and one Adile: that the Pretor with the assistance of these personages, should sit upon a commission to enquire and know the truth: and in case they could find that those things wherewith the Locrians found themselves so much grieved, were done either by commandment and direction from Scipio, or with his will and consent; then to charge him to depart out of the province. But in case that P. Sci- pio were already passed over into Africa; then the forelaid Tribuns of the Commons, and the Adile, joyning unto them two of the Delegates above said, (such as the Pretor deemed most meet) should sail into Africa; and the Tribuns and Adile bring with them Scipio from thence; and the two Commissioners have the charge and government of the army, until such time as a new LL. General succeeded and came in place. But if M. Pomponius and the ten Delegates abovesaid, found that neither by the direction, nor with the will of P. Scipio these enormities were committed, then P. Scipio should remain still with the army, and go forward with the war as he intended. When this decree of the Senat was once passed, and an act made thereof, they were in hand with the Tribuns either to agree between themselves, or else to cast lots, which two of them should go with the Pretor and the Delegates. And then the college of the Bishops were consulted with, about the expiation and making satisfaction for those things which in the Temple of Proserpina at Locri were either handled polluted, or carried forth from thence. The Tribuns of the Commons that went the journey with the Pretor and the Commissioners, were M. Claudius Marcellus, & M. Cincius Alimentus: who also had an Adile of the Commons to assist them, whom they might command, if Scipio would not obey the Pretor, whether he were in Sicily, or gone over into Africa, to apprehend and attach his body; and by virtue of their sacrosanct and inviolable authority to bring him home with them. And first they relolved to go to Locri: before they went to Messana. But concerning Pleminius, the report goeth two ways. Some say, that when he was advised what was intended and devised against him at Rome, he purposed to go to Nepesin into banishment, and chanced by the way to light upon one of the Delegates above said, and so by him was perforce brought back to Rhegium. Others affirm, that Scipio himself sent out one of his Lieutenants, accompanied with 30 of the most noble Knights or Gentlemen that he had about him, with a warrant to commit Q. Pleminius, and with him the principal Authors of the sedition, and to lay them fast in irons. But certain it is that they all were it by the commandment of Scipio before, or then by warrant from the Pretor, were put in yard and safe-custody with the Rhagians.

The Pretor and the Delegates being come to Locri, first and foremost, according to their commision, had a principal care of Religion. For all the holy money which they found by diligent search in the custody either of Pleminius, or of the soldiers, together with that which they themselves had brought with them from Rome, they bestowed again in the privy vestries where the treasure was kept: and besides, they made a solemn purgatory sacrifice for the Sacrilege. After this, the Pretor assembled the soldiers together, and commanded them to carry their Engines out of the City: where himself encamped upon the plain; and proclaimed that no soldier, as he would answer at his uttermost peril, should either tarry behind, or bring forth any thing with him but his own. Then he gave the Locrians leave, that every man should lay hold upon that which he knew to be his own; and if ought were not forth-coming and to be seen, to challenge and put in his claim for it. And above all things, his pleasure was, that all bodies of free persons whatsoever, should without delay be restored unto them, and if any made default of restitution, he should abide the smart and be grievously punished. Then he assembled the Locrians to an audience, and pronounced before them all, That the people and Senat of Rome granted unto them their ancient liberty, and their own laws: giving notice unto them, that whosoever had any thing to say against Pleminius, or any other person by way of accusation, he should follow him to Rhegium, and there present himself. Also if they were desirous to make a publick and open complaint of Scipio, namely, that the facts committed at Locri most impiously and wickedly, against both God & man, passed either under his warrant, or with his leave, and liking, then they should send Embassadors to Messana, where he together with his Council and assistants would give them audience of al matters and determine accordingly. The Locrians yielded great thanks to the Pretors and to the Delegates or Commissioners: as also to the Senat and people of Rome; and said, "They would go to accuse Pleminius. As for Scipio, although he desired little to hear the injuries and wrongs done unto this City yet he was a man whose friendship they desired rather to embrace, than to entertain his enmity. And this they knew assuredly, that so many lewd pranks, and so horrible parts there played, were neither by the direction nor yet with the connivency and toleration of P. Scipio: but his only fault was that either he trusted Pleminius overmuch, or credited them too little. And some men (say they) of this nature, that they will have a careful regard for to prevent sin, and an earnest desire that no offence be committed, rather than courage and heat to punish and correct faults when they are once done and past. Hereupon both the Pretors & also the Commissioners with him, thought themselves well eased of all small burden and charge of making farther inquisition and sitting upon the cause of Scipio. But Pleminius and two and thirty persons more with him, they condemned and sent bound in chains to Rome. They themselves went also

also in prison to Scipio, to be eye-witnesses and to make report at Rome of their own knowledge, as touching the manner of apparel, the idle life of the General, and the loose, dissolute, and corrupt military discipline of his soldiers; so ripe and common in many mens mouths. Against their coming to Syracuse, Scipio was provided of deeds to approve his innocency, and not of words to excuse his folly. He gave order for all his forces there to meet, and for his armada to be in readiness, as it were that day to give battle both by Land and Sea to the Carthaginians. The very same day that they arrived thither, they were friendly received and courteously entertained by Scipio. The morrow after he shewed them all his forces, as well for Land as Sea service: nor only furnished, well appointed, and in readiness; but the one fort, namely the land soldiers, running and charging one another at turney; and the Sea servants likewise within the haven, representing a naval combat with their ships. Then he led the Pretor and the other commissioners all about to see the arsenal and armory, the store-houses the garners of corn, and all other provision and furniture for the war. At the view and sight whereof, they were stricken with such exceeding admiration, both of every thing in particular, and of all in general, that they were fully persuaded, that either by the conduct of that Captain and valour of that army, the Carthaginians might be overcome and conquered; or by none other in the world: yet, and they wished him in the name of God, without more ado to pass over into Africk, and with all speed possible to make the people of Rome to enjoy the effect of that hope which they conceived that very day, on which all the Centuries nominated and declared him with one voice the former Consul of the twain: and with so joyous hearts they took their leave and departed from thence, as if they were to bring tidings to Rome of a glorious victory: and not to make relation and report of a magnificent and stately preparation for war. Plinius and all they that were like him attain and gloat, after they came to Rome; were immediately clapt up and laid fast in prison. At the first time when they were brought out, before the people by the Tribunes, they could find no grace, no favour nor mercy amongst them; their minds were to forsall and possessed beforehand, with the consideration of the woful miseries and calamities of the poor Locrians. But afterwards, being produced oftner unto them, as the hatred conceived against him, began to wear and decay, so mens anger grew to affluence and soften: behind the pious sight and deformed how of Plinius there present, and the remembrance whith of Scipio now visible, gat him some favour with the people. Yet he died in prison, before his cause was judicially tried, and definitive sentence of him passed. Clodius Licinius repeateth in this third book of the Roman stories, that this Plinius in the time of the games which Asdrubal second time Consul usurped at Rome, according to a vow by him made, went about (by the help of some whom he had corrupted and wagged for money) to set the City on fire in diverse places; thereby to have opportunity to break prison and make an escape; but when his wicked purpose was once disclosed and brought to light, he was condemned and awarded by a sort of Senat to the dragon Tullianum. But as for Scipio, there were no words made of him, neither come he in question any where else but in the Senat: where all with one accord, both commissioners and Tribunes by extolling and magnifying with glorious words, the navy, the army and the Captain, brought it so about, that the Senat thought good and were agreed, that with all convenient speed Scipio should over into Africk, and have liberty granted out of those armies which were in Sicily, to make choice of those whom he would himself transport over with him into Africk, and whom he would leave behind for the guard and defence of the Province.

Whiles these things passed thus amongst the Romans: the Carthaginians also having spent all the winter time in much suspicion and continual fear, hearkning to all news, and enquiring carefully of every messenger, and keeping watch upon all their promontories and high hills by the Sea side; bestirred themselves likewise, and procured the society and alliance of K. Syphax, a matter of no small importance for the safeguard and defense of Africk, in hope and confidence of whole unity and friendship especially, they were persuaded, that Scipio intended to sail over into Africk. Now there had been already between Asdrubal the son of Gisco and the King, not only familiar acquaintance by way of kind welcoming and reciprocal hospitality, since the time (as hath been said before) that Scipio and Asdrubal fortune to meet at one time together in the Kings house, N when they came out of Spain; but also some treaty was already begun of alliance and affinity, and a union made, that the King should espouse and wed the daughter of Asdrubal. For the assistance of this matter, and the appointing of a certain day for the solemnizing of the marriage (for now the Damozel was ready for an husband, and marriageable) Asdrubal took a journey, and seeing the King burning in love (as these Numidians of all other barbarous nations are most given that way, and exceeding amorous) he sent for the maiden from Carthage, and hastened the wedding. And amongst other congratulations that passed between to the end, that besides the private affinity there should be also a public league; there was an alliance concluded between the people of Carthage and the King by giving and taking their faithful promise interchangeably, and obliging themselves by a solemn oath one to the other to observe it as well offensive as defensive, and to have the same enemies, and the same friends for ever. But Asdrubal remembering both the friendship begun between Scipio and the King, and also how fickle and variable the natures of the Barbarians were; and fearing if Scipio should pass over into Africk, that this bond of wedlock would not be strong enough to hold the King in; took the time whiles this Numidian Prince was engaged with his new love, induced him whither with reasons, and what with the fair words and arguments of his young spouse, to send Busidama his son into Sicily to Scipio, for to advise him not to

A pass over into Africk, nor to rely upon any confidence of him, nor yet to build upon his former promises. For himself was not only linked in matrimony with a Citizen of Carthage, the daughter of that Asdrubal whom he saw entertained as a guest in his court, but also joyed in a public league with the people of Carthage. And first he exhorted him that the Romans would war with the Carthaginians far from Africk, as hitherto they had done; for fear lest he should of necessity be forced to have an hand, and intermeddle in their quarrels; and so while he desired to avoid the danger and hostility of one part or other, be driven at length to side all one way: giving him more plainly to understand, that if Scipio would not forbear Africk, but needs come with an army against Carthage, then must he necessarily fight in defence of the land of Africk, wherein himself was born, and for the native country, for the father and house of his own wife. With this commendation and direction were certain Orators sent unto Scipio, who met with him at Syracuse, and there delivered their message. Scipio, albeit he was disappointed greatly of his ground-work, that he had laid for his wars in Africk, and put besides his good hopes; gave the Embassadors letters into Africk, unto the King, and sent them back again in all haste, before the thing were published and come abroad. In which letters he requested him earnestly to be advised and bethink himself that he brake not the rights either of friendship & hospitality begun with him, or of the league and society entered with the people of Rome: nor violated justice and faithful promise made by giving right hands; nor yet beguile and abuse the gods, the witnesses and judges of all covenants and agreements made. But forasmuch as the coming of those Numidians could not be concealed (for they went all about the City, and were daily conversant in the General his lodging: and if it should have been kept secret wherabout they came, it was to be doubted lest the truth the more it was smothered and dimbled, the more it would break forth and come to light: and so the army was to stand in fear, that they were to war at once both with the King and Carthaginians. Scipio therefore buzzed abroad into mens ears, false devised matters, and so withdrew them from the understanding of the truth indeed. He assembled all his soldiers together, and said unto them, that now it was no longer staying and trifling out the time: bearing them in hand, that the Kings his allies and confederates, importuned him to let over into Africk with all convenient speed; that Asdrubal beforetime himself in prison came to Lalium, grieving and complaining that the time ran thus on in delays and doing nothing; & Syphax now sent his Embassadors, musing much and wondering what the cause should be of so long temporizing: and requiring that either the army without more ado, should be sent over at once: or else if their minds and purposes were changed, to certify him so much, that he likewise might provide for himself and his kingdom. And therefore he did them to wit and understand, that he intended now that he was sufficiently provided and furnished of all things; and considering that the Empire might abide no farther stay, to conduct his armada to Lilybæum; to wait the first good day of wind and weather, to take the less for a bon-voage, and with Gods grace and favour to set sail for Africk. His letters he dispatched to Marcius Pomponius to this effect, that if he thought it good, he should repair to Lilybæum, to the end they might commune and consult together, what legions especially, and what number of soldiers he should transport over with him into Africk. In like manner, he sent a labourer the maritime and sea coasts, to stay all the carriages and ships of burden, and to bring them away at once to Lilybæum. Now when all the ships and serviceable men in Sicily were assembled to Lilybæum, so as neither the City was able to receive the multitude of soldiers, nor the haven contain the number of the vessels; so earnestly minded they were all, and so hotly set upon their voyage into Africk, that they seemed as if they were conducted not to fight a war, but to enjoy the assured rewards of a victory. But especially above all others, the soldiers remaining of the Carthian army, were verily perfwaded, that under this captain, or else none, by valiantly quitting themselves in the service of the Common-weal, they should be able to end and finish their iniquitous and shameful soldiery. And Scipio himself made no bare account of those kind of soldiers, as knowing full well that the defeat received at Canna, was not occasioned by their cowardice: neither were there throughout the Roman army any soldiers so ancient and of so long continuance, or so well experienced not only in many and sundry toughen fields, but also in the assaulting of towns and Cities. And these Legions of Canna were the six and six in order. Now when he had once resolved and given out, that he would transport them over with him into Africk, then he took a particular view of them, man by man. And having culled out those, and left them behind, whom he supposed unmeet and unsufficient, he substituted in their place those whom he had brought with him out of Italy: and so fully he supplied and made up his number of those Legions, that either of them had six thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred men of arms. He chose also out of the same army of Canna, both horsemen and footmen, of the allies and confederates of the Latine nation. What power of soldiers in the whole were set over into Africk, writers differ not a little in the number. In some authors I find, that they were ten thousand foot, and two thousand and two hundred horse: in others, fifteen thousand footmen, and fifteen hundred horsemen. In some records again, they were more by one half footmen, and better, namely, that of horse and foot there were embarked five and thirty thousand. And there be that have set down no number at all, amongst whom, as in a matter to doubtfull and uncertain, I would myself be counted for one. But Calpurnius for his part, as he forbeareth to put down any number at all, so he seemed not to imply an infinite multitude of them, in that he saith that wher they and those that the soldiers set up, the very souls of the air fell down to the ground: and and he that had seen the multitude of them when they went a shipboard, would have said there had not been a man left behind either in Italy or in Sicily. Well how many or how few fewer they were, Scipio himself took the charge to see the soldiers embarked in good order, and without any tumult. As for the sailors and mariners, who were forced before to shipboard, C. Laelius the Admiral of the navy, kept them still and quiet within their ships. M. Pomponius the Pretor had commission for to furnish the armada with corn and victuals; who made provision of food and sustenance for 45 days: of which there was of baked meats and other viands already dressed, as much as would suffice for 15 days. Now when they were all embarked, he sent about to all the ships, certain pinnaces or cock-boats, and commanded all the pilots and masters of every ship, with two soldiers apeece, to come into market place, there to receive their charge. When they were all met and assembled together, first he enquired of them whether they had provided and taken into their vessels fresh water sufficient both for man and beast, to hold out to many days as their corn would serve? and when answer was made that they had water in their ships to last five and forty days: then he charged and commanded the soldiers to keep silence and be quiet during their navigation, and without any strife and contention to be obedient unto the mariners, and willing to help in any ministry and service whatsoever, saying, that himself and L. Scipio would keep on the right wing with twenty strong ships with brazen beak heads, and C. Laelius the Admiral with M. Porcius the Treasurer on the left, with as many of the same sort, to wait over and guard the bulks and ships of burden: willing and requiring that there should be light in all their vessels, namely, that every brazen headed ship should have one; each Carrick two; and the Admiral ship, wherein the General was, three lights, for a special mark, to be discerned from thence in the night. And so he commanded the Pilots to steer and direct their course for Emporia. [The territory hereabout is most fertile and fruitful, whereby the whole country aboundeth in plenty of all things: the barbarous peasants (as commonly it falleth out in battell and plentiful lands) are cowards, and unfit for war, and it was thought they might be surpris'd and subdued before any incur could come from Carthage.] When these directions were given, they were commanded to retire to their ships, and the next morrow at the signall, with the help of the gods to weigh anchor, hoist up their sails and away. Many Roman Armadoes had aforetime set out of Sicily, and the very same port: but never any voyage all the time of that war, no, nor during the former, made so goodly a shew, and was so much looked on. And so marvellous for most of their other fleets were sent out only to rob and to fetch in booties and prizes. And yet if a man would esteem as to the number and greatness of ships, there had been aforetime two Consuls together, who went over with a power of two complete armies: in every of those fleets there were welcome as many war ships with brazen beak heads, as bulks and carricks in those that Scipio transported over. For besides fifty long ships of war, he had not all out four hundred ships of burden and passage to transport over his army with. But if we would compare both was together, the second seemed unto the Romans more sharp and cruel then the former: both because it was fought within Italy, and also by reason of the great overthrow of so many armies together with the losse and death of their Generall captains. Moreover great expectation there was of Scipio the Commander and General of this voyage, a man much renowned and talked of, both in regard of his own noble acts of valour, and also of a speciall and singular fortune that followed him in all his exploits; where by he grew every day more glorious then others which caused all mens hearts to be set upon him beside his very resolution and mind that he carried, to raise in Africk, which all the while of that war entred into the head of any Captain before him: in that he gave it out abroad, That he meant to go over, with intent to draw and fetch Annibal out of Italy, and to divert and translate the war into Africk, and there to finish and make an end of it. There came running unto the haven to see the setting out of his Armado, the whole multitude, not only of the inhabitants of Lilybæum, but also the train of all the Embassages out of Sicily, which were come together for to accompany Scipio, and to do him honour, and also attended upon the Pretor of the province M. Pomponius. Over and besides, those legions also which were left behind in Sicily, went forward to bear their fellow soldiers company. So that not only the navy N was a goodly prospect unto the beholders upon the land, but also the strand so overspread all about with numbers of people, made a brave and pleasant shew unto these passengers, that were in the ships. When day light once appeared, Scipio from out of the Admirall after silence commanded by voice of the crier) praised in this wise: O ye gods and goddesses altho that haunt and inhabit seas and lands both, I beseech and pray you to vouchsafe, that all that ever hath been done already, is now intended, or shall hereafter be enterprised, during my conduct and government, may speed well, and turn to the good of my self, the people and commonwealth of Rome, our allies, and especially those of the Latine nation: who by land, by sea, by rivers, follow the direction, command, government, and fortune of my self, and of the people of Rome, and that in all our actions ye would be good, gracious, favourable, and helpful unto us, and advance O all our proceedings: that ye would grant us the victory over our enemies: and after we have subdued them, to continue safe and sound: and adorned with their goodly spoils, laden with their rich pillage, to return home all together with glorious triumph: & give us the hand and opportunity to be revenged of our foes and mortal enemies: and design me and the people of Rome that power and strength, to execute upon the City of the Carthaginians those fearful examples of cruelty, which the people of Carthage intended to practise and bring upon our City and

and these. After these prayers thus pronounced, he took the row inwards and put to sea the beak killed for sacrifice (as the manner is) and flung them into the sea: and wish that by sound of trumpet, gave the signall of departure.

Now when they under sail: having a good great gale of a forewind, they soon lost the sight of land. In the afternoon, there began to fall a thick mist; by which the ships could hardly avoid running one upon another. But when they were once in the main and deep sea, the wind became more mild: and all the night following, the same dark mist continued still. After the sun was once up at brake and dispersed, and when the wind again grew big and high, by which time they might discover land. And not long after, the pilot said unto Scipio, that they were now full stop leagues from Africk; and that he saw well and discerned the cape or point of Amerin: and if his will and pleasure were thither to direct their course, presently the whole armada should be in the road. Scipio so soon as he was within view of land, after he had made his prayers unto the gods, to bless this first discovery of Africk to his own good and the benefit of the commonwealth, gave commandment to sail still, and to put within the shore and ride at anchor in some bay or haven. So they made way with the same wind. But about that very time as the day before, they were mist again, and lost the sight of land. And as the fog increased, the wind fell, the night also the same upon them besides, made all things more doubtful. Whereupon they cast anchor, for fear that the ships should hit one against another, or run aground. When day light arose, the same wind was up again, but the foggy mist ceased; and then they might see plainly all the coast of Africk. Scipio then demanded what promontory it was that he saw next; and hearing that the name of it was The head of Prothura, [or The fair Cape] the same (quoth he) pleased me, and the presence thereof I like full well; even thither put the ships land, and so the armada entered the bay, and all the host waser ashore. Thus have I reported that they had a prosperous voyage without any fearful danger, or much trouble; giving credit herein to very many writers, as well Greeks as Latines. Only Caesar (setting aside that the ships were not cast away and drowned amid the surging waves,) writeth how other dangers both of water and weather encountered them in such as the last the Armado was driven by tempest from the coasts of Africk, and fell upon the strand Agimura, from whence they had much ado to recover their deck and cargo again; and finally when the ships were at hand to sink under the water, then the soldiers firing like men at point to suffer shipwreck, without licence and commandment of their General and without their armor, in great fear made shift with boats to recover the shore.

The Romans thus being landed, pitched their tents among the hills next adjoining. By which time the terror and fearful fright of that their arrival was not entred only into the maritime coasts and territories bounding upon the sea, first upon the discovery of the fleet, and afterwards by reason of the rumour and tumult of the army, as it came ashore; but also spread forward as far as to the good towns and very Cities. For not only the high waies were all filled and overspread with multitudes of men, women and children, who went by heaps together one with another; but also the country peasants drove before them whole herds of cattels: a man would have said that had seen how all Africk was like to be abandoned at once on a sudden: in such sort, as they put the Cities indeed in greater fear & perplexity then they were themselves, and especially Carthage above all others: where there was no less trouble and hubbub, then if it had been surpris'd and forced by the enemy. For since that time that M. Attilius Regulus, and L. Manlius were Consuls, for the space almost of fifty years, they had not once to see an army of Romans, but only certain fleets of rovers and men of war, who had landed at times, and made some rodes into the landing lying upon the sea side: and when they had harried some prizes, such as came next hand, they ever were retired again to the ships, before the alarm could be given to raise the country. The greater therefore now was both the sight and fight within the City. And to speak a truth, good cause they had; by reason that there was neither at home in readiness an army of puissance to encounter the enemy, nor a captain of valour to conduct and lead an army. Asdrubal was the son of Gisco, for nobility and high parentage, for honour and renown, for wealth and riches, and besides for the new affinity then contracted with King, was of all others the personage by many degrees, and the only man of the whole State. And him they remembered very well to have been foiled, discomfited, and beaten out of the field in Spain, by the self-same Scipio in divers and many battles. Also they made account, they were no more able to match the Captains man for man, than to compare and set their tumultuary power raised in batt, with the stand and experienced army of the Romans. Therefore they gave the alarm presently, as if Scipio were ready to shake Carthage out of hand: the gates with all speed were shut and made sure: the walls manned with soldiers: the corps de guard set: watch and ward kept: and all the night following the sentinels duly relieved and maintained. The next day, 500 light horse were sent out as espials and venturers to discover and scour the quarters to the sea side; and withall to impeach them that were a disturbing and coming land: who changed to light on the Romans corps de guard. For Scipio had sent away the fleet already to Pisa, and before he was gone up into the land far from the sea, had encamped upon the next hills thereby, placed guards of horsemen in convenient places, and put out certain forgers into the fields and villages for to raise booties. These having entred skirmish with the Carthaginian cornet and horsemen, slew a few of them in the very conflict, but most of them as they fled and were followed in chase, amongst whom was Hanno also the provost-marshal, a noble young gentleman, Scipio not only walked the country all about, but also was a City of the Africans that stood neereſt, and was of ſufficient wealth where beſides other pillage, which was frequently imbarked in the ſhips of burden and ſent into Sicily, there were taken priſoners eight thouſand ſlaves of free and bond one with another. But the greateſt joy and contentment that the Romans took in this new entrance and beginning of their warlike affairs, was for the coming of Mafaniſſa; whom ſome report to have preſented himſelf with 200 horne and poſſeſſors: but the moſt do write that he came with 2000. But for as much as this Mafaniſſa was one of all other Kings for hiſtme the greateſt Prince and moſt puiſſant; and withall he that ſtood the Romans in beſt ſtead and helped their ſtate, none like unto him: me thinks it were worth their labor, and would quoy for all the paines, to digreſſe a litle out of the way, for to ſhow and declare in what variety of alternative fortune he was toſſed, both in the loſſe and alſo in the recovery of the inheritance of his fathers kingdom.

This Mafaniſſa, while he was employed during the wars of Spain, in the defence and quar-rell of the Carthaginians; his father, whoſe name was Gala, hapned to die: and then the kingdome fell by deſcent, according to the cuſtome and manner of the Numidians unto Deſales the late Kings brother, a man of great years and very aged. And not long after, when Deſales alſo was departed his life, Capſa the elder of his two ſons, (for the other was a very child) ſucceeded in his fathers Kingdom. But for as much as he the ſaid Capſa maintained his royall ſtate and throne, more by reſon of the authority and reputation that he carried among his friends and favorites; than by power and ſtrength: there aroſe up in arms one named Mecetulus (who alſo was deſcended of royall blood, but of an houſe that was ever of the adverſe and contrarie ſide) and contended in much variety of fortune about the crown, with thoſe who then ſwayed the ſcepter. This Mecetulus having gathered a power of his tenants, followers, and peaſants of the country (with whom he carried a great ſtroke and was highly eſteemed, by reſon of the hard that they bare unto the Kings race) encamped openly and ſhewed himſelf in action, yea, and forced the King to come into the field, and to trie the title of the crown in a ſet battell by dint of ſword. In which conflict, Capſa, together with many of his peers and nobles were ſlain; and the whole nation and ſeignory of the Maſſilians, was reduced under the rule and obedience of Mecetulus. Howbeit he forbore to be called King; and contenting himſelf with the mean name of Tutor or Protector, gave the Kings ſiſter to the child Lacmax, who only remained alive of the Kings iſſue and line. He took to wife a noble dame and lady of Carthage, Amabel his neceſſary his ſiſter who had been lately wedded unto King Deſales; hoping thereby to enter into league and alliance with the Carthaginians: and beſides, for to renew the ancient familiarity and amity with Syphax, he ſent Embaſſadors unto him of purpoſe. Thus made he himſelf ſtrong ſtored againſt Mafaniſſa.

Mafaniſſa likewise for his part, being advertiſed of his uncles death, and alſo how his couſin german was deſcended, croſſed the ſea out of Spain over to Mauritania, at what time as Bochar was King of the Moors. At whoſe hands by humble ſute and importunit praier in moſt lowly manner, he obtained a power of 4000 Moors to accompany him in the Journey, for otherwiſe to employ them in war he might not. And after he had diſpatched a meſſenger afore-hand to thoſe that were his fathers friends and wel-willers to himſelf, by that time that he was come with them to the confines of his realm, there met him almoſt 500 Numidians. Having therefore ſet back again the Moors from thence unto the King, according to covenant, albeit there was aſſembled together a ſmaller number of people than he hoped and looked for, and not ſufficient that he duſt adventure upon ſo great an enterpriſe; and ſuppoſing withall, that by entering into ſome action, and by travell and endeavour, he ſhould gather ſtrength ſill to perform ſome great exploit, he encountered at Thapſus the young King Lacmax, as he journeyed unto Syphax. And when the Kings company in great fear fled into the town, Mafaniſſa both at the firſt aſſault won the ſaid town, and alſo of the Kings train received ſome that yielded themſelves, and ſlew other ſome that made reſiſtance in their own defence. But the greateſt part with the child himſelf the young Prince, got away in that tumult and eſcaped unto Syphax, unto whom at firſt they intended their journey.
The ſame of this matter ſo happily achieved in the firſt beginning and entrance of his affair, cauſed all the Numidians to revolt and ſide with Mafaniſſa. So as there ſtooked unto him from all parts of the country, and out of the villages, the old ſouldiers of King Gala, and incited the young Prince and ſet him on to recover his fathers kingdom. Now in number of ſouldiers, Mecetulus was good deal ſuperior: for both himſelf and the ſame army ſill entire, with which he had van-quiſhed Capſa, beſides had ſome others that after the ſlaughter of the King, he had received upon their yielding; and alſo young Lacmax the infant, had brought great aids from Syphax: ſo that Mecetulus was fifteen thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe ſtrong. With whom Mafaniſſa, albeit he were nothing ſo puiſſant either in foot or horſe, fought a battell, yet achieved he the victory through the approved valour of the old ſouldiers, and his own politick wiſedome, being a captain well experienced and exerciſed both in the Roman and Punick wars. The young Prince together with his tutor and protector, and ſome ſmall number of Maſſilians, fled and eſcaped into the territories of the Carthaginians. Thus Mafaniſſa having recovered his fathers Kingdom, and ſeeing that there remained ſill behind a far greater bickermert and encounter with Syphax, & taking it to be the beſt courſe and policy for him, to be reconciled and made friends with his couſin german: addreſſed certain meſſengers both unto the child, for to put him in good hope and aſſurance, that if he would ſubmit and yeeld himſelfe under the protection

A of Mafaniſſa, he ſhould live in as honourable place and degree with him, as Deſales ſometime had done with his father Gala: and alſo to Mecetulus to give their word and promiſe unto him, not only for impunity of all treſpaſſes, but alſo for faithful reſtitution of all things that were his.
By which means he perſwaded both of them to take part with him: who made choice of a mean estate at home in their own country, rather than to live in exile: notwithstanding the Carthaginians laboured at all that ever they could to the contrary.

Mecetulus hapned at that time when theſe occurrences fell out, to make his abode with Syphax:
who finding the Numidian King Syphax reſolved upon this point, and fully perſwaded, That it mattered not, nor imported himſelf much, whether Lacmax or Mafaniſſa were King of the Maſſilians, replied unto him and ſaid, that he was fully deſcided if he thought that Mafaniſſa would keep himſelf within thoſe terms, that either his father Gala or his uncle Deſales, held them contented with: No, no, (quoth he) there is much more to wardneſſe in him and far greater ſignes of haughty mind and forward wit and ſpirit aſper in him, then ever ſhewed in any of his houſe and line before him. Full often hath he in Spain been good proof of rare valour and ſingular prowdeſſe, as well unto his friends as his enemies. And let both Syphax and the Carthaginians look as well about them as they can, for unleſſe they put out this ſparkle of fire betimes, and even at the firſt beginning, it will be their chance to be caught therewith, when it ſhall burn forth; and able they ſhall not be to help the matter and quench the rage thereof. Mary, as yet his ſtrength is ſmall and ſlender, his forces frail, tender, and feeble, and not well united together to maintain his ſtate, unleſſe as he is in his Kingdom. Thus he importuned him ſill by reaſons and per-ſwaſions, untill at length he reduced him to lead forth an army into the confines of the Maſſilians and there in that territory, about the title whereof he had oftentimes not only contended by plea and words with Gala, but alſo by arms and dint of ſword, to encamp himſelf as in his rightfull and undoubted inheritance: with this direction, that if any came againſt him to warn him off the ground, then to trie his intereſt by ſword: which was the only way to be taken and moſt for the purpoſe: but in caſe for fear of him they quit the poſſeſſion quietly, then to advance for ward into the heart of the kingdom: for either the Maſſilians would without battell render themſelves under ſubjection, or elſe in a pitched field ſhould be able to ſtand out againſt him. Upon theſe ſugge-ſtions Syphax was incited and prickd on; inſomuch as he made war upon Mafaniſſa, and in the firſt battell diſcomfited and put to flight the Maſſilians. And Mafaniſſa with ſome few horſemen D fled out the field and eſcaped unto a mountain which the inhabitants call Babus. Certain whole families and houſholds with their ſheeds and tents, together with their cattell (which is all their riches) went after and followed the King. But all the multitude of the Maſſilians beſides, did homage unto Syphax and came under his obedience. This mountain aforeſaid, which theſe exiles that ſled their country were poſſeſſed of, was plentiful of graſſe well watered; and being ſo good for paſture to feed their cattell, it yielded ſufficient maintenance and food abundant, for the people that uſed to live upon ſheep and milk. From hence they began at firſt to ſteal out by night and make rodes; but afterwards in open day light to rob and ſpoil all the country about: but above all others to fire and burn the territory of the Carthaginians: both becauſe there were more prizes to be had from thence, than from the Numidians; & alſo for that it was more ſafe robbing and harrying there E without danger. They they practiſed ſo long, ſo licentiouſly, and in ſuch ſcornfull manner, that now they would carrie their booties to the ſea ſide, and make markets & ſale thereof to the merchants: and for this purpoſe divers ſhips arrived thither to traffick: yea, and otherwhiles there were many of the Carthaginians cut off and came forth home, and more of them were either ſlain or taken priſoners then oftentimes in open war and ſet battells. The Carthaginians bewailed and complained of theſe matters unto Syphax, and ſpurred him forward (diſpoſed well enough as he was of himſelf to revenge) for to purſue the reliques of the war, in his own perſon. But for ſo much as it was not thought to ſtand with the royall Maſtelle of a King, to chaſe and hunt a rabble of vagrant thieves about the mountains; therefore Bochar one of the Kings Captains, a right hardy and valourous man, was choiſen to do the feat, and to perform that ſervice. Who had the command of four thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe: and was promiſed beſides, great gifts and mighty rewards, in caſe he brought away the head of Mafaniſſa: but if he could take him priſo-ner alive, that were alone indeed, and a peerleſſe peece of work of inſtimable joy beyond all meaſure. He waiting his time when the enemies were traſgling reſtleſſly abroad, came upon them at unawares and charged them, and having ſingled from the guard of the armed ſouldiers, a huge number both of people and cattell, he forced Mafaniſſa himſelf with ſome few horſemen to take the top of the mountain. From whence after he had ſent away unto the King (as if the war had now been at point of an end) not only a great booty of people and cattell, the which he had taken, but alſo part of his forces, as being much greater in proportion, then for to diſpatch the remnants of a war, accompanied with no more than five hundred foot, and two hundred G horſe, he purſued Mafaniſſa being come down from the hill tops, and there having beſet and ſtopped the paſſages at both ends, encloſed him within the ſtreight and narrow valley. Where the war was committed a great execution and ſlaughter of the Maſſilians, but Mafaniſſa with fifty horſemen and not above, got away through the unknown and hidden cranks of the mountain, and eſcaped the hands of the purſuers. Howbeit, Bochar traced him ſill, and followed him at heels ſo uproviſly, that neer to the City Clupſa he overtook him in the plains, where he ſo ſtreight-ly ſcourged him about, that he killed all his company every one, ſave onely four horſemen,

With whom in that tumult he let slip as it were out of his hands. Mafaniffa also himself fore wounded and lost him alone. As he fled, he had still in his side certain cornets of horsemen dispersed all over the plain, and some of them crossing the waies overhurlt to meet the enemy at every turn, and to intercept him. But he and the four horsemen with him fled forwards still, and took the great river before them: for their fear and fright was greater than to make any stay at the bank side, but to put their horses to it, and plunge in: where they were carried with the current of the stream and born to a side: two of them in the sight of the enemies were swallowed up of the deep harpits: himself also was supposed to have perished with them, but he and the other two horsemen besides caught hold of certain twigs of oltiers that grew under the banks on the further side. So Bacchar made an end of farther pursuit, as neither daring to take the river, nor believing that he had any enemy for to chase. And thus returned he to the King with false news, that Mafaniffa was drowned. And divers polts and curiers were sent out to Carthage, to report their exceeding joyfull tidings. This rumour and fame of Mafaniffa his death being noised all over Africa wrought diversly in the minds of men. But Mafaniffa keeping himself close in a secret cave, whilst he cured his hurt with certain herbes, lived for some daies by the foraging and robbery of the other two horsemen. So soon as the wound was once healed up and skinned over, and that he thought himself able to abide the sitting and shaking of his horse, with exceeding courage & boldness he set forward again to claim and recover his kingdom. And having in the way as he passed gotten together unto him not above forty horse, by that time he was come among the Maffians, and gave out openly who he was, he prevailed to much with them, that as well in regard of their ancient favour and love toward him, as also for the unexpected joy that they saw him alive and found, whom they formerly believed to have been dead, within few daies there were gathered and assembled unto him 6000 foot, and 4000 horse. So as not only he was restored again, and put in full possession of his fathers Kingdom, but also waisted and spoiled the confederate nations of the Carthaginians, yea, and the frontiers and confines of the Maffians, which belongeth to the Kingdom and dominion of Syphax. Having thus provoked Syphax to war, he set him down and encamped between the Cities of Ciripa and Hippo, upon the ridge of certain hills, places of advantage and commodious in all respects. Then Syphax supposing it a greater peece of work, and of more importance then to be managed by his captains, sent part of his forces under the conduct of his son, the young Prince named Fernina, and gave order unto him to wheel about with his power, and whilst the enemy was amuled upon himself one way, to charge upon him behind another way. So Fernina set forth, and took his way by night, because he was to give the charge closely, and in secret. But Syphax, who was to shew himself with banner displayed, and to bid the enemy battell, marched openly by day light, and advanced forward. And when the time (as he thought) was come, wherein they that were sent about to Carthage, might reach to the place appointed, himself also mulling as well in the multitude of his men, as in the ambush laid before at the enemies back, set his battell in array: directly upon the side of the hill, which with gentle and easie ascent ariseth, and leadeth towards the enemy. Mafaniffa likewise arranged his men, presuming most of all in the plot of ground, which seemed much better for his advantage to fight. The battell was sharp and cruell, and for a long time doubtfull. Whilst the site of the place, and valour of the souldiers much helped Mafaniffa, and the number again on the other side, which exceeded beyond all measure, and made too great odds, availed Syphax. This multitude divided into two battallions, whilst the one was opposed against the enemy, and the other compassed about their tail and back part, gave the victory clear unto Syphax: inasmuch, as the enemy thus enclosed both before and behind, had no way in the world to escape. Whereupon all the footmen and horsemen both were either killed or taken prisoners. Only two hundred horsemen or very near to many, which were gathered in a ring together about Mafaniffa, he commanded to call themselves by troops and squadrons into three several companies, and so to pierce and break through but first he appointed them a certain place, where they should rally and meet together again after their feasted flight. Himself in person, at one side which he had proposed to himself before, made means to pass through the very pikes and darts of the enemies, and escaped. Two of those squadrons tarried still behind, the one for fear yielded to the enemy, the other sticking to it, and making more resistance, was overcharged with shot of arrows and darts. But Mafaniffa winding in and out, and to and fro, deluded Fernina, who pressed hard upon him, and followed him at heels: and after he had wearied him out at length in tedious travail and desperate pursuit, called him perforce to gave over the chase. Whilst he himself with seventy horse got away as far as the left's Syrtis, where he set up his rest, and quitted his conscience, in that he had so often right valiantly fought to recover the inheritance of his fathers Kingdom, and led his life before the eyes of Phenick Emperoria and the nation of the Garamans, until the arrivell of the Roman navy, and C. Lelios into Africa. These presumptions induce me to think and believe, that Mafaniffa came afterwards also unto Scipio with a small power of horsemen, rather than with any great aid. For that multitude was besting the state of a Prince, established in his Kingdom, but this small number befetted the mean condition and fortune of a poor exile and banished man.

Now to return again unto our story. The Carthaginians having lost the cornet of horsemen before said, together with their captain, and raised another power of horse, by taking new musters, made Hanno the son of Amiles commander over them. And first by messengers and letters

A missive they sent for Asdrubal and Syphax one after another, and at last also even by Ambassadors and Orators. As for Asdrubal, they required him to succour his native country, desert in manner round about Syphax they besought and requested to provide for the safety and fence of Carthage and all Africa.

At that time Scipio was encamped near Prica, within a mile of the City: for he was removed from the sea side, where some few daies, he kept a standing camp close to the fleet. Hanno having received a power of Cavalry, nothing sufficient and strong enough to charge upon the enemy, not so much as to guard and defend the country from waisting and spoiling, silt before all other things it about and devised, how he might augment his number of horsemen by a new levy and enrolment. And albeit he rejected none of other nations, yet he levied and waged the Numidians especially, the best horsemen simply in all Africa. Now had he gathered together upon four thousand horse, when he surprised a City named Safra, almost fifteen miles from the Roman camp. And when word was brought to Scipio, that to great a Cavalry took up their summer standing harbour within a town; Tullius (quoth he) I passe not, if they were more then they are, so long as they have such a one to be their leader. And thinking with himself that the more slowly the enemies went to work, the less he was to slack his business, he sent Mafaniffa before with the horsemen, and gave commandment to ride up and down before the gates, to brave the enemy, and to train him forth to fight: with this direction, that when their whole multitude was sifted forth, and the skirmish grown to hot, that he might not well endure the charge, he should give ground and retreat by little and little, for he would himself come in due time to the battell. And flying no longer behind, then whilst he thought Mafaniffa who was gone before, had time enough to train the enemies forth, he followed after in person with the Roman horsemen, and reached closely under the hills (which stood fitly for the purpose, opposite between him and the enemy) about every turning of the way. Mafaniffa for the purpose according to the direction given him, one while right courageously galloped before the gates, as one that would brave and terrifie the enemy, another while as it had been said himself, gave back; and by this counterfeit show of fearfulness, he made the enemies more bold and venturesome, and drew them on to pursue him rashly. But as yet they were not all gone forth, and their captain was diversly troubled, and had much ado with them, while he was faine to force and compell some that had taken their head of wine, and were heavy-headed and sleepe withall, to arm themselves and to bridle their horses, and to stay others from running out of the gates at once confiedly, without order or array, and without their colours. Mafaniffa caught up thole, and cut them short, that a part from their company at the first setting out, rode venturously forward, and took no heed to themselves: but when more of them rushed forth at once out of the gates, the skirmish was maintained with equal valour on both sides and at last, when the horsemen were abroad and joyned in battell, Mafaniffa was not possibly able to hold but any longer. Howbeit he fled not outright, but as he gave back leisurely, he received them as they violently charged upon him: so long, until he had trained them to those hills, under which the Roman Cavalry lay hidden. Then rose the horsemen from out of their ambush, themselves in heart, and their horses fresh; and environed Hanno and the Africans, who with fighting and following were tired out and overwearied: Mafaniffa likewise turned his horses suddenly, and made head again, and returned to battell afresh: so there were environed, intercepted, and killed in the place together with Hanno himself the Generall, fift upon a thousand, even as many as were in the vanguard, and could not well retire themselves backward. The rest affrighted with the death of their leader, fled with bridle on horse neck: whom for the space of three miles the conquerors followed in chase upon the spur, and either flew and took prisoners two thousand horsemen of them besides. Amongst whom there were, as it is for certain known, no fewer than two hundred natural Carthaginians, men of armes, and divers of them of good mark, both in regard of wealth and riches, as also of birth and noble parentage.

It is recorded that the very same day when this happened, the ships which had transported over the booty in to Sicily, returned back charged with provision of victuals, as if they had prelaged & foretold by their arrivall, that they were come for a new pillage and fresh prizes. But all writers do not accord, that two Carthaginian captains of one name were slain in two battels, of the Cavalry (for we as I verily take it) left by telling one thing twice, they might seem to deceive and abuse the reader. Certes Calpis and Valerius report that Hanno was taken prisoner. Then Scipio bestowed rich gifts upon the captains and horsemen according to their good service, and as they overcame deserved: but above all the rest, he highly rewarded Mafaniffa. And when he had placed a strong garrison in Salera himself with the rest of his army made rodes: and not only waisted and spoiled the lands and villages all the way as he went, but also forced and won certain Cities and borough towns: and so having filled all places far and near with the terror of war & hostilities, he returned to the camp, the seventh day after he set forth bringing with him great numbers of people, much store of cattle and prizes of all sorts; and so dispatched away the ships a second time freighted and laden with spoils of the enemies. After this he set aside all light expeditions, small rodes and forage of the country towns, and bent his whole power and all his forces against Virca, intending that he had once won it, to faste himself there, and to make it his seat from thence forward, and a sure place of defence in all other exploits that he meant to perform. Thither at one time were the sea-rovers brought from the armado, to that part of the City where the sea beateh upon the walls: likewise the land souldiers advanced from the hill that overlookeh

* Golfo di capo. These Syrtis as well the greater as the less, are in the Mediterranean sea near Africa full of shelves and bars: and are called Syrtis or Bazis de Berberia.

the town, and joyneth in manner hard to the very wals. As for artillery and engines of battery H and assault, some they had brought with them, and others were sent out of Sicily with the victuals: and daily new were made in the common Armory and Arsenal, where there were of purpose artificers continually kept at work for the framing of such fabricks and peeces of battery. The men of Vicia betwixt thus round about on every side with great preparation and ordinance of war, reposed their whole hope and confidence in the Carthaginians; and the Carthaginians relied themselves upon Asdrubal, in case he should sollicite Syphax for to let to his helping hand. But all things went but slowly forward, and they bestirred themselves not so quickly, as they should have done, who wanted so much aid as they did. And Asdrubal when he had with all the means and the best shift that he could make, gathered together thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse, yet durst he not approach the enemy, before the coming of Syphax to joyn with him. At length came i Syphax with fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: and immediately departing from Carthage, encamped not far from Vicia and the Roman camp. Whole arrivall yet was so important, and wrought this effect, that Scipio after forty dayes welcome (during which time he had invetted Vicia and tried all maltries but in vain) was compelled to remove his siege & dislodge, without doing any good at all. For now the winter approached, and he fortified his standing leaguer for winter harbour upon a promontory, which joyneth to the continent by a thin and narrow ridge of a bank, lieth out a good way and beareth into the sea. And with one and the selfe same trench and rampier, he empaled both his army, and also the ships that lay up in the dock. The legions were quarred and lodged in the midst of the said cape: the ships that were drawn up to land, and likewise the sailors and mariners, kept the strand on the north side of the hill; the horsemen took up the vail towards the south, upon the hanging and side thereof, shooting to the other shore. And there were the acts achieved in Africa untill the end of Autumne.

Besides the provision of corn gathered from all parts out of the countries pill'd and wasted round about, and other store of victuals brought out of Sicily and Italy, Cn. Obavimus the Vice-pretor arrived with a mighty deal of grain out of Sardinia, sent from T. Claudius the Pretor, who had the government of that land: so as not only the old garners already made were replenished, but also those that were newly built. For thus wanted apparel for the army. Whereupon Obavimus had in commission to break with the Pretor about that matter, namely, what livery might be provided out of that province, and sent for the supply of that defect. Which business was not slackly followed, but with all diligence performed in such sort, as in short space there were sent over 1200 side horiments coats, and 12000 short cullcocks and jackers.

During the time of that summer wherein those occurrences passed in Africa, P. Scarpinius the Consul who governed the Province of the Brutii, skirmished suddenly in a disordered manner with Annibal upon the very way, within the territory of Croton: where the fight was maintained rather by squadrons and companies one to one, then by any set body of a ranged battell. The Romans were discomfited; and having lost in this conflict (which might more truly be called a tumultuous scuffling than a full fight) upon 1200 of the Consuls army, they retired in great haste and fear into their camp. Yet durst not the enemies make an assault upon them within their hold. But the Consul dislodged from thence in the dead time of the next night, and having dispatched a courier before unto P. Licinius the Vice-consul, for to come forward with his legions, he joyned his power unto them. So they returned again unto Annibal, being now two Generals, and two entire armies. And without any day, to battell they went: whilst the Consul on the one side flood upon this his power redoubled and reinforced, & Annibal on the other side took heart for his fresh victory aforesaid. Scarpinius advanced with his legions into the vanguard; P. Licinius with his, kept the reterwards. The Consul at the very first shock and beginning of the conflict, vowed a chappell to Fortuna under the name of Primitiva, in case he might have the honour of that day, and vanquish his enemies. And surely his vow was heard, and he obtained his desire: for the Carthaginians was discomfited and put to flight, and more than four thousand armed men slain, three hundred or somewhat under taken prisoners, forty horse of service got alive, and a 12 ensigns won and carried away. Annibal dismayed and daunted at this adverse and unlucky battell, withdrew his forces to Croton.

At the same time M. Cornelius the Consul, in another side of Italy held in sawc Herrania not so much by force of armes, as by rigorous proccesse of law and severe justice: for all that country in manner was turned to Mage, and by his means and favor hoped for a change, and were altogether set upon novelties & an alteration of the state. The examinations and judicial trials of these matters the Consul followed by vertue of commission from the Senat, and not upon his own motive and seeking: and went through therewith, setting aside all partiality, nothing respectively favour or displeasure. In such sort, that many of the nobility of Tyscane (such as either had repaired themselves in person, or had sent their agents unto Mage, for to treat with him about the revolt and rebellion of the States wherein they lived) were at first, as many as made personal appearance, condemned: but afterwards, such as had guilty consciences, went into voluntary exile: and being condemned in their absence, in stead of their bodies which were gone out of the way, they yielded and left behind them their goods only, which might be forfeit and consist as pawns to pay for the punishment of their persons.

Whiles the Coss. was thus employed in divers places one from the other, the Censors in the mean

A mean time at Rome, M. Livius and C. Claudius held a new choice and review of Senators: and Q. Fabius was once again chosen the principal Senator and President of the Senat. Seven in number of them were noted with ignominy and disgrace, but not one of all those had fitten in the ivory chair and born office of state. They looked narrowly and most faithfully to the Publicans, that had the charge of the City-buildings to see them kept wind-tight and water-tight, and if sufficient reparations. They publicly gave order for a paved caufse to be made, from the bealls market unto the temple of Venus; and about the shops and scaffolds in the shew-places. Also the church * Magna Mater [the great mother of the gods] they were used to be built in the mount Palatine. They instituted also a new tax and impolt out of the provision of salt. And whereas both at Rome and throughout all Italy, salt was sold at a * Sextant by the Modius, they let and ferm'd this commodity, to be served out of the same price still in Rome; but in the market towns and fairs, they enhanced the price higher, and in sundry places they rated it at divers prices. This tax was devised as all men verily beleaved, by the one of the Censors, for anger, and an old grudge that he bare unto the people; because he had been in times past unjustly judged and condemned by them, and therefore in the pension and price of salt they supposed that those tribes were most pinched and charged who were the means of the hard doom that passed against him. Hereupon it came that this Livius was furnished Salinator. The census and numbering of the Citizens was finished the latter, because the Censors had sent about into all provinces, that the full number should be taken of all Roman Citizens, who were without in the armies, and presentment made accordingly. So there were registered in all, with those abroad two hundred and seven & fifty thousand persons. And C. Claudius there was that he performed and accomplished this numbering and assessment. After this there was a Cense or taxation taken of the twelve Colonies, a thing then brought up and never before. And according to the relation of the Censors they were entered into the subsidy book at Rome: that it might appear upon record in the publick instruments and writings, what number of able men for war they could make, and what every man was worth in money and goods. Then they began to take a survey of the gentlemen and knights at Rome. And it fortuned too, that both Censors had hories of the City provision and charges. And when the crier came to cite those of the tribe Polia wherein the name of M. Livius was enrolled, & made some stay to call the crier himself by name: Cill hardly (quoth Nero) for M. Livius. And whether it were upon the reliquet of an old cankered malice, or that he took a foolish pride and vain delight to seem forthwith to be severe and precise, he commanded M. Livius to tell his horse of service, because he had been sometimes a man condemned by the doom of the people. Semblably M. Livius when the crier was come unto the tribe Narvenis, and to the name of his colleague, awarded C. Claudius to tell and make away his great horse likewise; and that for two causes, the one for that he had born full witness and depol'd wrongfully against him: the other, because he was not foundly and in truth of heart reconciled unto him, when they were made friends. Whereupon there grew a foul jar and contention between them, whiles they passed not to impeach and stein the credit one of the other even with the touch and hazard of their own good name and reputation. At the end of the Censorship, when C. Claudius had sworn to keep and observe the laws, and was ascended up into the chamber of the Cities treasure, among the other names of those that he left as disfranchised and tributaries, he declared his colleague for one, and gave up his name in the roll. Afterwards came M. Livius into the chamber aforesaid, and setting aside the tribe Meia only (which neither had condemned himself, nor elected him a condemned person for Consul or Censor) he declared the whole people of Rome likewise suspended, even four and thirty tribes; and left them all no better then meer strangers and aliens, in regard of taxes and tributes: and why? because they had both condemned him, an innocent and guiltless man: and being thus condemned, had created him Coss. and Censor notwithstanding: neither could they deny but that they had erred and done amiss in their judgement, and twice in their elections. And among those four and thirty tribes, he pronounced that C. Claudius also should be reckoned for one: protesting moreover, that if he could have found any one precedent, to have led him to the disfranchising one man twice, he would have left C. Claudius by name, as a noted person by himself, in the checkroll of the City chamber.

Surely that reciprocal debate between the two Censors, in depraving and defaming one another was but a lewd and naughty part by them plaid: but this chastisement of the peoples levity and inconstancy, was a worthy thing, and befitting the Censors gravity of that time. While the Censors stood thus in exceeding disgrace and hatred with the people, Cn. Bibulus a Tribune of the Commons taking his time and occasion hereby to rise and become great, entided them both and commenced an action against them before the body of the people. But this delignment of his was soon dashed and came to nothing, though the general accord and content of the L.L. of the council, to the end th it time to come, no such example might be extant upon record, that the Censors dignity should be exposed to the variable and inconstant pleasure of the people.

The same summer in the Brutians country, Perilla had been already forced and won by the Coss. when as Consentia and Pandofia, with other mean and base peeces, willingly yielded themselves to his devotion. Now when the time drew neer of the election of new magistrates, it was thought good that Cornelius should be sent for to Rome out of Tuscan, where there was no war at all, rather then the other Consul out of his province: who being come, created for Consuls Cn. Servilius Capiz, and Cn. Servilius Geminus. After this, the court was assembled for the chusing of Pretours, where-continued still. And for mine own part, I would rather believe that these matters were treated upon by enterprize of messengers, as most writers do report, than that Syphax himself in person, as Marius Valerius recordeth, came into the Roman camp to parle and conference thereabout. As the first the Roman General, would scarcely lend his ear to hear those overtures: but afterwards, to the end that there might be some colourable and probable cause for his people to retire unto the camp of the enemies, he seemed not to freight-laced, nor to deny the same articles to satisfy, but pretended some hope, that by often debating thereof to and fro between them, they should at length grow to some good point and final agreement. The wintering harbours of the Carthaginians were in a manner all of wood, but built of slender stuff gathered out of the fields at a venture hand over head, where they could meet withall. The Numidians for the most part lay in cabins and sheds, walled and wound with reeds especially, and covered and thatched with mats of fedge I and such like, here and there fastening without all order: in such sort, as some of them taking up their lodging at their own pleasure, without direction and commandment of any officer, quartered without the trench and rampier. Scipio advertised hereof, conceived good hope to find some opportunity one time or other to fire the camp of the enemies. Upon a certain day therefore, he sent in to of those Commissioners whom he addressed unto Syphax, in stead of pages and drudges, and disguised in slaves and bondmen weeds, the bravest soldiers of a band, (men of approved valor, wisdom and discretion) who while the commissioners were busy in conference, should range about the camp, some one way, some another: to espie and mark all the passages and wyes in and out; to see the siting and form generally of the whole leaguer, and particularly of every part; where the Carthaginians quartered; where the Numidians lodged; what distance there was between Asdrubal his tents, and the Kings pavilions: to observe also and learn within, the order & the manner of their sentinels, their ward and watches, whether by night or by day they lay more vantage to be surprized by an ambush. And according as there were divers meetings & conferences, and so of purpose some were sent one time, some at another: to the end that more & more still should have the spiall and full knowledge of all things in the enemies camp. Now whereas often that this matter was treated of, the greater hope of peace both Syphax had and the Carthaginians likewise by his means; the Delegates or Commissioners aforesaid of the Romans, said that they were expressly forbidden by their General to return without a full and resolute answer. And therefore they willed him to make short work at once, and to bethink himself what to do, either to stand upon his own determinate purpose (if he were resolved) or else to consult with Asdrubal and the Carthaginians, and determine accordingly. For now high time it is, say they either to conclude peace, or to prosecute war freshly, and to go through with it lustily. Thus while Syphax consulted with Asdrubal, and Asdrubal with the Carthaginians, both the spials had sufficient time to view and fecall, and Scipio also good leisure to provide necessaries for his purpose. Moreover, by this motive and hope of peace, as well the Carthaginians as the Numidians, began (as commonly in such cases it falleth out) to be negligent and slack in forefront, and to provide that in the mean while they came by no harme and detriment from the enemy. At length an answer was returned and some clauses put in, without all reason, and founding to much inconvenience by occasion that the Romans seemed too far gone and desirous of a peace. Which fell out very fitly for Scipio whole only desire was to pick some just quarrell for to break the truce and abstinence of war: and so the next day (for in the mean time he said he would confer with his Council) he answered the Kings messenger in this wise, that besides himself alone, who laboured all in vain and could do no good, there was none liked of the peace: and therefore he willed him to report unto the King his master, that there was no other hope for Syphax to have peace with the Romans, unless he renounced and cast off quite the friendship of the Carthaginians. And thus he ended the truce, that with free conscience being discharged of his promise in that behalf, he might go forward in his disengagements, and bring his enterprise to his desired issue. So having put his ships to sea (for now the prime of spring was come) he embarked in them his artillery, his ordnance and engines of battery, as if he meant to assault Pica on the sea side. And sent out two thousand foot-soldiers, to possess themselves of the hill that overlooked Pica, which he had held and kept before, both to withdraw the minds of the enemies from that which he secretly designed and intended, & amuse them upon the care and regard of another thing; and also to prevent a mischief, that while himself should go against Syphax and Asdrubal, they might not fall forth of the City, and assail his camp, left with a small guard to defend it. Having made this way, and laid this ground aforesaid, he assembled his council, where he commanded as well the foresaid spies to lay forth and utter what they had seen and found, as also Masaniassa, who was acquainted with all the manner and fashions of the enemies: and then at last he declared and the woe unto them, what himself intended to execute the next night. Then he gave commandment to the Tribunes or Kn. Marshalls, that so soon as the council was risen, and the count dismissed in the Generals pavilion, at the first sound of trumpets immediately they should bring their legions out of the camp. Thus according to his edict, the engines began a little before sun-setting to set forth. About the first watch they put the soldiers in array ready for to march, and by midnight (for they were to journey seven miles) they going a fair and soft pace, approached the enemies camp. There Scipio gave unto Lulius a part of the forces together with Masaniassa and his band of Numidians, with direction: to invade the camp of Syphax, and to set fire thereupon. Then calling them by themselves both apart one from the other, Lulius and Masaniassa, he earnestly besought them of all love to make up and recom-

A recompence by careful industrie and devoir that providence and forecast, which the darkness of the night disappointed them of. As for himself, he meant to let upon Asdrubal, and the Carthaginians camp: but begin he would not, before he saw the fire amongst the kings tents. And it was not long first ere it began: for as soon as the fire caught hold of the next pavilions whereupon it was call, by and by it took all that were near it, and so forward to those that joyined unto them, it spread into all places of the camp. And verily into a great fright they were all put, as they could not choose, but needs must in a night (careless, which was run all over in so short a time. Howbeit they thought it some fire by mischance only, and not the hand of the enemy, by occasion and means of war: and therefore unarmed as they were, and lightly appointed without weapons, they ran forth by heaps to quench the fire, and light tall upon their armed enemies, the Kings camp. Especially, who by Masaniassa that was well acquainted with the manner of the Kings camp, were beset in convenient places, at the ends of every avenue and passage. Many in their very beds and couches, between sleeping and waking, were consumed, without the time of any running, heading in this their hally flight one upon another, were in the freights of the gates troden under foot, or else thrust and crush to death. The sentinels and watch of the Carthaginians, espied at first the fire shining and flaming out: after whom others awakened and railed out of their rests by this nightly tumult and alarm, might behold and plainly see the flames: but they likewise were deceived, as well as the other, and believed verily that the fire began of itself by some misfortune, no man with how. The confused noise and cry alloy, which was heard while they were a killing, flying and wounding, would not suffer them to know the truth indeed, whether the same arose upon their fright and sudden fear by night, or otherwise. And therefore every man naked as he was, and suspecting no practise at all of all the enemy, at all the gates they stood next, did what he could to bring with him such instruments and means as were to quench the fire: and hapned upon the army of the Romans. Now after they were all massacred and put to the sword to the last man, not only upon an ordinary hatred between enemies, but also because there might not escape so much as one to carry newes unto the rest. Scipio immediately entered the gates, being not warded, but altogether neglected, as in such a fearful garboil and hurlyburly it was no marvel. They fell a flinging of fire upon the lodgings and sheds, that stood next, so as the flame brake out, and shewed at first as if it had been dispersed in many places: but afterwards casting and spreading from one tent to another as they joyined close together, they were all arced on a light fire, and burnt every stick down to the ground. Men and cattle both, singed and scorched at the first, as they ran in piteous and fearful sort away: but afterwards as they tumbled one upon another by heaps, stopped and choked up all the waies and avenues of the gates. And look who escaped the fire, sculped on the edge of the sword. Thus in one day were 2 camps consumed. Howbeit, both the Generals, and of so many thousands of armed men, only 2000 foot and 500 horse armed by halves, and many of them either wounded or else singed and half roasted with the fire, got away and escaped. There either were slain or burnt to ashes upon 40000 men: taken prisoners there were above 6000: among whom there hapned to be many gentlemen of the Carthaginians, and 11 Senators. Of ensignes were taken 178. Of Numidian horses for service more than 2700. Six Elephants got alive, eight perished either with fire or sword: and a mighty deal of armor came to their hands: all which the L. General Scipio consecrated to Vulcan, and let on fire. Asdrubal with some few Africans that fled with him, rid away upon the spur to the next City: and thither got all rest, who remained alive, following the tracks of their captain, and there saved themselves. But afterwards left that City should be yielded to Scipio, he quit the place and departed. Anon the Romans were received within the time at the gates (standing open for them): and beset, willingly of themselves they rendered, the town, there was no kind of hostility or violence offered unto them. But two other Cities one after another were forced and put to the ransack. All that pillage, as also whatsoever was saved out of the fire in the two camps, was freely given to the soldiers, Syphax encamped and fortified himself in a strong hold, almost eight miles off. But Asdrubal made halt to Carthage, for fear lest upon the sudden sight occasioned by this fresh and late overthrow, things should go backward, and the Senat resolve upon some unmanly and unworthy course. Thither at the first arrived such fearful newes, that all men thought verily that Scipio would give over Pica and forthwith lay siege unto Carthage: whereupon the Suffetes (who are the Consuls as it were, of the City) called the Senat: where three opinions were delivered amongst them. The first advised to dispatch Embassadors to Scipio to treat for peace: the second, to send for Annibal home to the defense of his own country, against so dangerous and deadly a war: the third gave counsel, by example of the Romans constancy and resolution in their adversity, to repair the army and gather new forces, and to request Syphax not to abandon and give over the quarrell. This opinion, because Asdrubal was in place (and all those that sided with the Barchine house and faction, evermore inclined to war) prevailed and took effect. Hereupon they began to take matters in town and country: Orators were addressed to Syphax, who of himself with all his might and main, was bidden to levy fresh forces, and preparing for new war. For his wife now, not as aforesaid, by flattering words, flattering speeches, and pleasant allurements, that might serve the turn to win and move the heart of an amorous lover, but by way of prayer and pitiful compassion had prevailed so much with him already: yea, and with plentiful tears brought him, not to deny her natural father and native country, nor suffer Carthage to be burnt with flaming fire, like as the camps were consumed already.

"The Embassadors also brought with them new hopes besides, which were presented to them in as happy a time as might be; who reported, that they furnished to meet with 4000 Celtiberians brave and audacious young men, about the City named Oliva, which had been levied and hired in Spain by their Commissioners; of purpose sent to take up new soldiers: and that Afranius himself in person would be present with a power of no small importance. Syllax not only entertained these Orators with gracious speeches and courteous answers, but also shewed them a great number of Numidians, gathered out of the country towns; which some few days before he had furnished with armour and horses; promising besides, that he would assemble all the young and able men for service throughout his whole realm. For well he wist, that the late loss and defeat brought by occasion of fire, and not by fight: and never in war is a man to be repented inferior; before he be vanquished by more forces in ranged battell. In this wise answered he the Embassadors. And after some few days Afranius and Syllax once again joyined their forces together: so as in all, their host amounted to the number well near of 30000 armed men.

Now when Scipio was wholly set upon the assault of Prisa, and at the point to bend his ordinance and artillery against the wals, as thinking verily that the war was already done with Syllax and the Carthaginians; the fame of the war renewed by them afresh, averted him from his purpose, and caused him to give over that enterprise for a time. So leaving behind him certain small guards, as well by water as land, only for a sign and shew of siege; himself with all the strength of his army, set forwards to meet the enemy. At the first he bare him down and encamped upon an hill, four miles (or very near) distant from the Kings camp. The next day after, he descended with his cavalry down into the great Plains or Downs (for so they call them) lying near the same hill; and spent that whole day in braving the standing corps de guard of the enemies before their camp, and playing upon them with skirmishes. And so for two days together next ensuing, they passed the time in divers tumultuous excursions between the one part and the other, without doing any great exploit worthy the remembrance. On the fourth day, they entered on both sides into the field, and embattailed themselves. Scipio marshalled his men in this wise: Behind the Princes in a vanguard, he placed the foremost ensigns of his Hastati, or Spears; and the Triarii he bestowed in the rearward, for to second them. The Italian horsemen he set in the right point: the Numidian horse and Masanius he ranged in the left. Syllax and Afranius put their Numidians horse opposit to the Italians; and the Carthaginians to affront Masanius. In their main battell were placed the Celtiberians, to make head against the ensigns of the Roman Legions. Thus ordered and arranged, they encountered one another, and joyined battell. At the first onset, both ways at once, as well the Numidians as the Carthaginians, were put back and forced to give ground: for neither the Numidians (being for the most part country people and rusticall) were able to receive the Roman horsemen; nor the Carthaginians (raw and untrained soldiers) sufficient to hold out with Masanius; who (besides all other things) for his hue and fresh victory, was too terrible, as there was no dealing with him. So the battell of the Celtiberians, naked and disarmed of both her points stood still; for neither law they any likelihood to escape and save themselves by flight; considering they knew not the coast of the country; nor hope to obtain pardon at Scipio his hand, against whom, (deserving so well of them and their nation) they were come into Africa with a power of waged mercenary soldiers. So being environed on every side with the enemies, they fell one upon another, and obliantly dyed to the last man. But whilst all the enemies were wholly employed about them, Syllax and Afranius gained themselves some time to get a way to escape. The victors (wearied rather with continual killing than long fighting) were overtaken with the night. The morrow after, Scipio sent unto Latinus and Masanius, with all the Roman and Numidian horse, and the nimblest and appointed footmen, after Syllax and Afranius for to follow the chase. Himself with the strength and body of the army, invaded all the Cities thereabout that were within the feignory of the Carthaginians; whom he partly forced by assault, and partly took by surrender for fear. Great was the fright ye may be sure at Carthage: and they thought no other but that Scipio being now in the train of conquest would make haste to overrun the country; and when he had done brought under his subjection (and that with speed) all the other States there bordering, then at once he would come to assault Carthage. Therefore they fell to repair and make up the breaches of their wals, and to fortifie them with high bulwarks: and every man did his best to bring out of the country all kind of provision, against the time they should abide a long and tedious siege. Few words or none at all of peace, but much talk of sending Embassadors to call home Anibal. The greatest part were of mind & gave advice, to make out the armada which stood ready rigged for to intercept the Romans vituals, and to surprize and assault the Romans fleet, riding before Prisa carelessly without fear, and distrusting nothing: for peradventure they might also force the navall camp, left with small guard for the defence thereof. And to this counsel the most inclined: yet they thought it good to send Embassadors to Anibal. For suppose that their navy should speed full well, and that the happiest success that they could wish, this only good would come thereof, that Prisa thereby might be in some sort eased of the freight flogge, where with it was invetted: as for the defence of Carthage it self, they neither had any other Generall besides Anibal, nor army left but only his. Whereupon the next day after, the ships were shot into the water, and set afloat: and whilst the Embassadors took their way towards Italy, All things were huddled up and done in halt; such was their fortune that pricked them forward, and gave them no further time. And look if any one man slackt his business never so little, how was reputed to betray the whole state, and the safety of all.

Scipio now marching with an army, laden with the spoil and pillage of many Cities; sent the prisoners away, and all the prizes besides, unto the old camp before Prisa. And wholly set upon the conquest of Carthage, he surprized Tunes (a City abandoned of her guard left for defence) situate from Carthage almost twelve miles. The place, both by mans hand was strongly fenced, and by nature surely fortified: and as it might be easily seen from Carthage, so it yielded a goodly prospect to Carthage, and allo to the sea all about Carthage. From thence the Romans (as they were hard at work in fortifying themselves with a trench and rampier) discovered the enemies fleet, sailing from Carthage towards Prisa. Laying therefore their work aside, they founded the remove, and presently in all hast advanced their ensigns, to prevent that their own ships which stood close to the shore, bent wholly to the siege, and nothing fitted and furnished for a sea-fight, might not be surprized and boarded. For how possibly could ships heavily charged, carrying artillery, ordnance and engines of battery, be ever able to withstand an Armado nimblely appointed, rigged and trimmed for the purpose with all ship furniture meet for battell, and manned besides with armed soldiers? How might our ships (I say) withstand the enemy, which either are converted to the use of merchant-ships of burden; or else to use set to the wals, that they serve in stead of a platform and bank, or else of bridges to enter upon the City? Scipio therefore, after he was thither come, and had bestowed his wars ships with brazen beaks behinds in the rearward near to land, which (as the manner is in fight at sea) might guard and defend the rest: opposed the Hulls and Caricks in a four-fold rank and course, in stead of a wall against the enemy. And because that in the tumult of the fight, those ranges might not be broken and disordered, he laid the masts and sail-yards over-crosse, reaching from ship to ship; and with strong cables he linked and fastened them all in one together, and laid boards and planks over them, that men might passe every way from one ship to another. But under those very bridges, he left certain spaces between, from whence the light pinnaces and frigots might make out to charge and recharge the enemy, and retire themselves thither again in safety. Having thus in halt (according as the time would give him leave) set these matters in order; there were to the number almost of a thousand elect and choice soldiers put aboard unto those ships of burden, to make head in the forefront, & withstand the violence of the enemies; and furnished they were with offensive weapons, but missive especially, to shoot and sling from them: and such store thereof they had together, as might serve for the assault were it never so long. Thus appointed and prepared, they waited the coming of the enemies. The Carthaginians, who if they had made good speed, might have surprized them unawares, and found all pell-mell and out of order whilst they were troubled, frightened, and to seek what to do upon that sudden occurrence) fearing still as men out of heart and dismayed with so many foils by land, and thereupon distrusting themselves even at the sea also; where (no doubt) they were the better and more patient: and having trifled out all the live-long day, and failed but slowly; about the sun-set arrived in the haven, which the Africans call Rafsinon. And the next morning by sun-rising, they put forth into the open sea, and ranged their ships in order, as against a set navall battell: supposing that the Romans would make out and receive them. When they had stood thus a long time, and perceived the enemies not to stir or once to set forward, then at last they charged upon the forehead hulks and ships of burden. The service was nothing like a sea-fight, but resembling for all the world the ships that are to assault the wals of some Town. For the hulks were a good deal taller and stood a loft over the enemies. And the Carthaginians out of their war ships armed and belted with brazen beaks let fire many a dart in vain, as lancing them from beneath faintly against the higher place; whereas the shot from above out of the Caricks, was levelled with more strength and by reason of their own poise light also with greater force. The light pinnares for spial, and the other tall barkes, which made sallies from under the bridges aforesaid, framed of planks upon masts and sail-yards, at the first were encountered, overcharged and hidden only with the violence and greatness of those war-ships: but afterwards they were some trouble to the defendants of their own side; for that being intermingled amongst the enemies ships, their own fellows were forced oftentimes to stay their hands, and neither shoot arrow, nor lance dart, for fear of missing their enemies, and lighting amongst their own part. At the last, the enemies from out of the Carthaginian ships, began to call out certain loggers, with iron hooks at the end (which the soldiers use to call Harpagones) [Grapples] for to take hold upon the Roman ships. Which when the Romans were not able to cut in sunder, no more then the very chains whereto they hung, and whereby they were lured, thence ye might have seen (as any one of their enemies war-ships & gallics rowed back, and towed after it a Roman Carick hanging by the grapple end) the boards and ropes cut asunder, by which it was tied and fastened unto others, or else another range and course of more ships together, to follow after the tail of the other. By this device especially were all the bridges torn and rent in peeces, and scarcely had the defendants any time and space to retire and passe into the second rank of ships behind. Thus there were about six Caricks of the Romans drawn away to Carthage, hanging at the poops of their gallees. Their gladness and rejoicing hereat was much greater than the thing it self came to, and the more acceptable in that amidst so many continual losses and plentiful tears of theirs, one only joy as small as it was, shining upon them beyond their expectation, eased and lightened their hearts: considering withal how near by all likelyhood and appearance the Roman armada was to a mischief and final destruction, had not the captains of their own galleys foretold so much, and Scipio come in time to help.

It fortune about the same time, that Laelus and Masanius were come within 15 daies into Numidia; the Masaniusians rendered Masanius the ancient realm belonging to him by inheritance from his father, and received him with joy, as their King whom they had long time desired. Syphax seeing his captains and garrisons distressed and displaced, kept himself within the ancient limits of his own Kingdom, but was not like to be long at rest and quiet. For his wives father on the one side, and his wife again on the other, set him on, and pricked him forward continually to make arms against the Romans; and so loved her in excessive love, that needs he must yield to her, there was no remedy. Besides, so mighty he was in numbers of men and horse, that the puissance of a Kingdom flourishing so many years together, offering and presenting itself daily to the eye, had been enough to have made a Prince proud, that was not so barbarous and uncivil as he, and had some better rule and mastery of his affections than himself had. When he had assembled together as many as were able for service, he furnished them with horses, and with armour, as well offensive as defensive. The Cavalry he sorted and divided into small troops and cornets, the infantry into the cohorts and squadrons, according as he had learned long since of the Roman centurions. And thus having raised an army, equal for number to the former, but standing altogether in manner, of new and untrained soldiers, he put himself on his journey against the enemies. And after he had encamped near unto them, at the beginning some few light horsemen advanced forward from the corps de guard, in elphial, so near as they might with safety, but being set back from thence with arrows & javelins, they retired unto their companies. After this they began on both sides to make out one against another, and to maintain light skirmishes; and when of any part they had taken the foil, they would again for anger return in greater number which is the wonted manner to kindle a battell between horsemen: for whiles the winners hope still of better, and the loser chafes for having the worse, the company ever encreaseth on both sides. And thus now, after some few had scuffled and blowed the coals, at length the whole-armie of either part, came forth into the field eager of fight, and to strike a set battell. So long as the horse service, the Masaniusians were to command, as there were hardly any dealing with them, Syphax sent them out in such great troops: but after that the Roman footmen once had suddenly entered between the cornets of their horsemen, which gave way as they came, and had gotten sure footing and made head, and to frighted the enemy charging so free upon the spur as he did, then the Barbarians began to ride their horses more easily, and within a while gently to stand still; and in the end, not only to give ground to the footmen, but also to retreat from the horsemen, who now were the more bold and brave, being flanked with a guard of footmen.

And now by this time the standards of the legions advanced forward, and approached near hand. But when the Masaniusians were so far from receiving and enduring their first charge, that they might not abide the very sight so much, as of their engines and armour, so mightily wrought with them either the remembrance of former overthrowes already past, or the present fear of imminent danger. Where Syphax, while he rode bravely in the face of the enemies troops and squadrons, if happily for very shame, or for the perill of his own person, he might stay his men from running away, had his horse under him fore wounded, and being cast off his back to the earth, as overpressed with the number, taken prisoner, and brought alive unto Laelus, for to represent unto Masanius above all others a goodly show and joyfull sight to behold. Now was Ciriba, the head City of all the Kingdom of Syphax; and thither after the flight, betook themselves a mighty multitude of people. The slaughter in this battell wasles in proportion, though the victory, because the horsemen only maintained the conflict. Not above five thousand were slain, and not halfe so many taken prisoners. And when they had made an assault upon the camp whither the frightened multitude after the losse of their King, had retired, Masanius came unto Laelus and said, that for the present there could be nothing more pleasing and honourable unto him, then upon his victory to visit and see his fathers Kingdom, which he had recovered and won again after so long a time. But as in adversity, to like wife in prosperity (and the tract of time and delays are never good. In case therefore Laelus would permit him and his horsemen, together with conquered Syphax to go before unto the City Ciriba, he would inspire them on a sudden, finding all out of frame and to feele by reason of this so sudden and unexpected fear: and Laelus with his footmen might travell fair and softly, and come after with ease journeys. Laelus yielded hereunto. Whereupon, being gone afore unto Ciriba, he commanded the principall Citizens of Ciriba to be called forth unto a parle. But all the whiles that they were ignorant of the Kings unhappy fall, and so long as Masanius uttered nothing of that which was hapned, he might not prevail either with threats or faire words and persuasions until he presented the King before them a bound prisoner. Then at to heave an object and miserable spectacle, they lift up a pitifull cry, and made great lamentation. And partly for fear they abandoned the defence of the wals, and partly by a general consent to court the Conqueror, and to seek for grace and favour at his hands, they set the gates open. Then Masanius, after he had bestowed about the gates, and in convenient places of the wals, certain strong guards, to keep that no man should flir and make an escape, he rode a gallop to the

A royal palace, for to be possessed of it. As he entered within the fore-gates thereof, even in the very entrance of the porch, Sophonisba the wife of Syphax, and daughter of Adrabal the Carthaginian, met him on the way: and espying in the midst of the armed train Masanius full gorgeously dight, as well in his brave armor, as in other goodly array and ornaments, imagining him to be the King (as he was indeed) she fell down prostrate at his feet, and spake in this wise: "True it is (quoth she) O Masanius, that the Gods above, together with your own vertue and fidelity have given you full power and puissance, to doe with us according to your pleasure: but if it be lawful for me a poor prisoner and captive woman, to open my mouth and make an humble speech unto my Lord, and in whole only hands lieth my life and death: if I may be so bold to touch your knees, and that victorious right hand of yours; I would beseech and pray you for the honour of the royal majesty of a Prince, wherein we also our selves erewhile were interested in the love and name of the Numidian nation, which now is common to you and Syphax, by the domestical gods, protectors of this regal house and princely palace, who vouchsafe to receive you into it at this present with better prelates and more fortunate tokens, then lately they sent Syphax out of it; to deign me a lowly suppliant this favour, and grant me this petition, as to determin your self of me your captive whatsoever pleaseth you, & not to suffer me to fall into the proud hands and inhumane disposition of any Roman. If there were nothing else but this, that I was sometime wife and Queen to Syphax, yet would I rather trie the countesse and humanity of a Numidian, and one born in Africa as well as my self then of a stranger and alien. But what hard measure a Carthaginian lady, and the daughter of Adrabal, may fear at a Romans hand, you see and know full well. Wherefore once again I request and intreat your highnesse upon my knees, to regard my suit: and if there be no way else to save and keep me from the will and appetite of the Romans, to put me to death out of hand. For beauty she surpassed and was incomparable: for years lully, and in the very best of her age. And therefore when as now she held him fast by the hand, and requested his protection and honourable word, only for this, that she might not be delivered and betrayed to a Roman, placing & setting her words so well, and couching them so cunningly, that they sounded nearer to speeches for to win love, then prayers to crave pity: see the sanie, and affection of this victorious Prince: he inclined presently not only to mercy and compassion, but also (as all the King of these Numidians are full of love, and have no stay of their wanton lust) as conqueror otherwise though he were yielded himself prisoner to the love of his captive: and after he had given her his right hand for assurance to perform her request, he went into the palace. This done, he began to call about with himself how he might make good his promise unto Sophonisba: but finding no means else to compass and bring it about, he borrowed foolishly, rashly, and themselves counsell of blind love. He made no more ado, but commanded in all haste to prepare that very day for the solemnization and marriage with Sophonisba, because he would give neither Laelus, nor Scipio himself, any liberty at all to proceed against her as a prisoner, after the come once the wedded wife of Masanius. The wedding was no longer done, but behold Laelus came, a guest unfent for and nothing welcome: who so little dissembled how much he misliked the thing, that he was once about to have plucked her forth of the bride-bed, and sent her away even with Syphax and other prisoners to Scipio. But overcome with the earnest prayers of Masanius, who had brought and importuned him to refer the matter over to Scipio, for to arbitrate and decide unto whither of the two Kings Sophonisba should be awarded, for to mend their state, and better their fortune, he sent away Syphax alone with the rest of the prisoners, and by the help of Masanius, was recovered the other Cities in Numidia, which were held by the garrisons of the King. When news came into the camp that they were bringing Syphax thither, all the multitude went forth as it were to behold a triumph. Himself went bound before all the rest, and a number of Numidian noblemen and gentlemen followed after. Then every man to set forth and amplify this victory, magnified what he could the greatness of King Syphax, and the glorious renown of the nation, in these termes: That he was the King, unto whose majesty the two most mighty and puissant states of the world, to wit, the Romans and the Carthaginians attributed so much, that Scipio the Generall of the one, for to seek his amity, left the provinces of Spain and the army there, and with two Caravels or Gallies ruled with five banks of oars, sailed over into Africa; and Adrabal the great commander of the Carthaginians, not only repaired himself in person unto him into his Kingdom, but also gave him his daughter in marriage: so as at one time he had in his power the two grand-captains, of Carthaginians and Romans both. And like as both these nations killed sacrifices unto the immortal gods, and craved thereby their grace and favour, so of both parties at one time was his friendship sought for, and desired. And as for his power and puissance, it was so great, that he expelled Masanius out of his own Realm, and drove him to this narrow point, that the best means he had to preserve his life, was either the running ramour of his death, in the lurking holes of the wild woods, wherein he was glad to live by rapine and stealth, after the guise of savage beasts. The King thus talked of in every mans mouth that stood about him, was brought at length into the Prætorius or Generals pavilion, and there presented unto Scipio. And Scipio verily was much moved in mind to consider the former state and fortune of the man, compared now with his present condition: and to remember withal and call to mind the hospitall intertainment, the giving interchangeably of the right hand, and the covenant between them made both in publick and private. In these regards likewise Syphax took heart, and spake more frankly unto the conqueror. For when Scipio demanded of him

"forces out of Italy and France. Item, that they forbore to meddle in Spain. Item, that they abandon "and quit all the lands between Italy and Affric. Item, to yield up all their ships of war fiving
 "only twenty. Item, that they deliver unto the Romans, of wheat 50000 Modii, and of bar"ley 30000. [Now what was the sum of money that he required or demanded of them, it is "not certainly agreed upon. In some writers I find 5000 talents: in others, five thousand pound, "weight only of silver: and there be that have set down, that they laid upon them a double pay
 "of all the fouldiers.] Upon these conditions (saith he) whether ye will like of peace or no, ye "shall have three daies respite and liberty to consult and consider, if you will accept thereof in these "terms, make a truce with me for the present, and send your Embassadors unto Rome to the Senat
 "there. Thus the Carthaginians, when they had agreed together, and concluded to refuse no ar"ticles and conditions of peace whatsoever, were dismissed. But in truth they fought for nothing "else but delays and truce of time until Anibal were sailed over into Affric. So they "addressed certain Embassadors unto Scipio to enter a truce: the others they dispatched to Rome to treat
 "for a peace: who brought with them for a few, some few captives, renegates, and fugitives, to the "end they might obtain their fute more easily. But Lelius with Syphax and other captives (the "principall nobles and gentlement of the Numidians) was many daies before arrived at Rome, and
 "had declared unto the LL. of the Senat all things in order as touching their good speed and successe
 "in Affric, to the great contentment and joy of all men for the present, and with exceeding hope "for the time to come. Then the LL. after consultation had, gave order that the King should be sent to "Alba, there to lie in ward and safe custody, and that Lelius should be kept still at Rome, untill the "Carthaginian Embassadors came. A solemn procession for four daies was decreed. And P. Aelius
 "the Pretor, after he had dismissed the Senat, called presently an assembly of the people, and to"gether with C. Lelius went into the Rostra (or pulpit for publick orations.) Where the people hearing "that the Carthaginian army was defeated, that the King of great name and renown was over"come and taken prisoner; that all Numidia was overrun from one end to the other with a "noble and singular conquest; they could no longer contain their joy in silence, but in shouts and "acclamations and other tokens (as usual in the assembly of a multitude) expresse and signifie their "exceeding gladness and contentment of heart. Whereupon the Pretor immediately made procla"mation, that the Church-wardens and sextons should let open all the holy temples and chapels
 "throughout the City, and give the people liberty and leave all the day long, devoutly to go about "the gods, reverently to salute them, and heartily to render thanksgiving for this achieved victory.
 "The next day following, he admitted the Embassadors of Masaniissa into the Senat house, and gave "them audience. Who first and foremost rejoiced in the behalf of the Senat, for the prosperous "wars and happy successe of P. Scipio in Affric; then they gave thanks, that he not only had en"titled Masaniissa their lord and master by the bare name of King, but also invested him a King-"deed by restoring him to his fathers Kingdome. Wherein if it pleaseth the LL. of the Senat, he "might reign, now that Syphax was removed and gone, without fear and trouble at all. Also for "that he solemnly in the open assembly praised him in most honourable terms, and adorned him "richly with right stately and precious gifts. For to deserve which favors and honours done unto "him, as he had endeavoured already, so would he henceforth not fail to do his best. Then they "made a petition that the Senat would confirm and ratifie by their act and decree, his royall style
 "and title of a King, with other benefits and favours received of Scipio. And this moreover particu"larly Masaniissa would request (if he might be so bold, and that it stood with the pleasure of the Senat)
 "that they would enlarge and set at liberty all the Numidian captives that lay in prison in Rome for "this would be a thing whereby he should acquire much honour and reputation, and gain great "love and favour amongst his people and countrey men at home. To these points the Embassador "received this answer. Concerning the prosperous affairs of the wars in Affric, they "congratulated likewise, and rejoiced reciprocally with the King. As for Scipio, they liked well, and "confirmed his act in giving Masaniissa the name of King: and therein he had done well and justly "and according to good reason. And whatsoever he had passed else to the honour of Masaniissa, the "LL. approved and commended the same. Then they decreed certain pretents that the Embas-
 "sadors should carry unto the King: to wit, two purple fouldiers casocks, each of them with a cap
 "of gold; and as many rich coats embroidered and bedusted with purple. Also two couriers ar"med and trapped, with their rich caparisons: two complete armours for horses, with their car"riages: likewise pavilions, with all their military furniture, in as full and ample manner as a Con"sul is allowed. These pretents I say had the Pretor direction to send unto the King. As for the Em-
 "bassadors themselves, there was bestowed upon them no less then 5000 Asces a peece; and upon "their followers in the train, each of them 1000 Asces. Also a double suit of apparell for either of "the Embassadors, and one single fute to every one throughout their train: as also to those Numid-"ians, who being set at large out of prison, were to be delivered again to the King. Over and
 "besides, there was appointed for the Embassadors, lodging of free cost; gardenage and walking "places of pleasure; allowance for their table, and all provision else whatsoever, at the Cities ex-"pences.

In that summer when these decrees passed at Rome, and those affairs were achieved in Af-"frick, P. Quintilius Varus Pretor, and M. Cornelius Vice-consul, fought a fier battell with Ma-go the Carthaginian, in the territory of the Insubrians, within the province of France. In the vanguard

vanguard were placed the legions of the Pretor. Cornelius kept the legions in the rereward, and "himself in person rode to the standards in the forefront. And before both wings, the Pretor and "Vice-consul encouraged all that ever they could, the fouldiers for to advance the ensignes, and "give a charge upon the enemy. But seeing he could not prevail nor do any good, then quoth "Quintilius to Cornelius: you see how the fight flaketh and waxeth cooler, and the enemies that "were timorous, are hardened and heartened: by this resistance beyond their hope and expectation, "yea, and it is to be feared, that they will turn to be hardly also, and make head against us. We "must needs raise up a storm of Cavalry, if we would disorder them, and put them out of array. And "therefore either do you main: in fight either in the front, whilst I bring the men of arms into the "battell, or else will I fight here in the vanguard, whiles you send out the horsemen of four legi"ons upon the enemies. And when the Vice-consul was willing to accept of whether service the "Pretor would, then Quintilius the Pretor, with his son also named Marcus, a lusty young gallant,
 "went to the horsemen, commanded them to mount on horseback, and suddenly all at once set "them against the enemy. The tumult and noise which the horsemen made, was answered & redoub"led by the shout that the footmen let up. And verily the enemies battell had not been able to have "kept their ground, but that Mago at the first stirring of the Cavalry, made out the Elephants forth"with into the battell, whom he had in readinesse for such purpose. At the uncouth braying, the "strong smell, and hideous sight of which beasts, the horses were affrighted: and so the aid of "horse-fight proved vain. And as the Roman Cavalry interlaced among the Infantry was more "strong and forcible, where they had the use both of lance, point aloof, and of swords edge close "at hand: so when they were transported and carried far off with their panting: and fearful horses,
 "the Numidians horsemen had the more room to shoot their darts against them with better ad"vantage. Besides this disorder, the twelfth legion of footmen (whereof a great part was beaten
 "down and slain, more for shame then upon any strength and valour, kept their place still; but never "had been able to have held out any longer, but that the twentieth legion drawn forth of the re"ward into the vanguard, reinforced the battell that was in hazard and lay a bleeding: and Ma-go withall for his part, came in with the Frenchmen out of the rereward, and opposed them "against this fresh legion; but when they were once discomfited and put back (which required no "great ado nor long fight) the Halati or javeliniers of the eleventh legion gathered round together "and charged upon the Elephants, which now also began to break the ranks of the footmen. But "when they had lanced their javelins against them (standing thick together in multitudes) and lightly
 "there was not one of them hit amiss (but did his errand) they forced them all to turn back upon "their own battell: so four of them were fore wounded and fell down dead. Then the vanguard of "the enemies began somewhat to give ground, and withall, the whole strength of the Roman foot-
 "men (seeing the Elephants turn all, came forward at once for to encrease the disordered tumult, and "put them in greater fear. But so long as Mago stood to it stoutly, and standing in the forefront "of the ensignes, the ranks and files as they went back tofly, and retired by little and little, still main"tained fight as before in good order: but after that they saw him shot through the thigh and fallen,
 "and therewith carried forth of the battell for dead, incontinently they were all dejected and put
 "to flight. There were slain of enemies about five thousand, and of military ensignes eighteen won and "carried away. The Romans likewise bought not this victory without losse of blood. For of the "E Pretors army were lost two thousand and three hundred, and the greater part of them by far were "of the twelfth legion. Whereof two Tribunes Military or Colonels also lost their lives, M. Cocio-ninus and M. Mannus. Likewise of the thirteenth legion, which came last to the conflict, Cn. Helvinus a Colonell, in renewing the fight was slain, and eighteen men of arms besides, most brave "and excellent horsemen, with Centurions who were by the Elephants troden down, trampled un"der foot, and so perished. And no doubt the battell had continued longer, but that by occasion of "the Generall his hurt, the victory was given away and yielded. Mago in the dead time of the "next night dislodged and departed; and stretching out his journey so far as possibly for his wound
 "he might, he marched away untill he was come to the sea side, unto the Inguanis in Liguria: where
 "the Embassadors sent from Carthage (who a few daies before were arrived in the French gulf) re"paired unto him: commanding him with all speed possible to sail unto Affric, for as much as his "brother Anibal likewise (unto whom also there were Embassadors gone with the like mes"sage and commizition) would do the same. For the State of Carthage now was not in safe, nor up"on terms to defend and keep in obedience by force of armes France and Italy, but to see to home.
 "Mago not only moved with the commandment of the Senat, and the danger of his countrey, but "seeing also left the enemy following the train of his victory, would pursue and set upon him, if "he made long lay; and doubting lest the Ligurians likewise, seeing Italy abandoned by the Car"thaginians, would revolt and turn unto those, under whose obedience they were like shortly to "be reduced: albeit he had no hope that his hurt should have less flaking at sea by sailing, then on "land by travelling, or to find things there more handsome and ready for the cure, embarked
 "G his army and departed. But before he was well gotten beyond the point and lands end of Sardinia, he died of his wound before said. Certain ships also of the Carthaginians, being scattered "under in the deep sea, were by the Roman Armado, that kept about the coast of Sardinia tur-
 "piled and boarded. These were the Acts performed both by sea and land, on the side of Italy
 "which lieth along the Alps.

Cn. Servilius

On Servilius the Consul having performed no worthy and memorable exploit, either in his province Hetruria, or in France (for thither he went also in the end) but only that he redeemed his father Cn. Servilius and his uncle C. Laetanius, from servitude and bondage, now sixteen years after they had been taken prisoners by the Boii before the village Tanturnus, returned to Rome, with his father going on the one side, and his uncle on the other: a man famous rather for his privat deeds, then renowned for any publick and honourable act worthy of remembrance. And a bill was preferred unto the people, that it should not be imputed for a trespass unto Cn. Servilius, that whilst his own father (who had sitten upon the ivory chair of estate) was living (and that unknown to him) he had been both Tribune and Edile also of the Commons against the laws in that behalf provided. This act being passed and granted, he returned again into his province. Unto Cn. Servilius the Consul who was in the Brutians country, there revolted Consusius, Hyfugum, Verga, Beldia, Hetracum, Syphum, Argemamm, Dampetia, and many other peeces of small account, upon occasion that they saw the Carthaginians war to wax cold and feeble. The same Consul fought a battell with Annibal in the territory of Croton: the manner of which fight is darkly and obscurely reported. For Valerius Antias saith, there were slain five thousand of the enemies: a thing of such consequence, that either it was meer impudency to forge it, or great negligence to overslip it. But the truth is, from that time forward nothing was done by Annibal in Italy: for to him also there came from Carthage Embassadors to call him home into Africa, even about the same time that the others did unto Mago. And as it is reported of him, all the whiles that he gave audience to the Embassadors, he gnashed and grinded his teeth, he kept a sighing and groaning, yea, and hardly could forbear to shed tears. After they had delivered their Message according to their commission, Yes, marry, qd. he, now they go no more about the business with me: by covert means and under-hand to send me home, but openly are seen in the action: I who all this while in suffering no supplies either of men or money to be transported over unto me, fought to draw and hale me from hence. Well then, it is not the people of Rome to often by me defeated and put to flight, that hath by armes overcome Annibal, but it is the Senat of Carthage, with their backbiting and malicious envy. Neither will P. Scipio rejoyce to lose, and bear himself proud upon this disgrace of my return, as Hanno will: who with the ruine and subversion of Carthage, hath overthrowen our house and family, when by no other means he could effect it. Now Annibal, whose mind fore-gave him that such a thing would fall out, had prepared shipping beforehand. And therefore after he had sent away the multitude of souldiers that were of small or no service, into the towns of the Brutians country, under a colour and shew of garriisons for defence, which towns were but few, and the same rather held in by awe and fear, then abiding in obedience for love and loyalty, he took with him the whole strength and floure of his army, and crossed over into Africa. But before he went to sea, many of the Italian nation, who refusing to follow him into Africa, had taken for sanctuary the chappell of Iuno Lacinia, which never to that day had been violated and broken: not withstanding the liberty of the place, he cruelly massacred in the very temple. Seidome by report had ever any man been known to leave his native soil and country, and depart into exile with more heavy heart, then Annibal did when he went out of his enemies land. Oftentimes he looked back to the coasts of Italy, blaming both God and man, yea, cursing himself and his own life, for that he led not straight waies upon his fresh victory at Cannae, his souldiers embred as they were with blood directly even to Rome. Scipio (quoth he) had the heart to go to Carthage, who when he was Consul, had never been in Italy the Carthaginian enemy: and my self, having slain at Thrasymum and Cannae 100000 armed men, have still sitten about Castellum, Cumes, and Nela, wearing and decaying in strength every day more then other. In this manner he blamed himself, and complained of his hard hap and cursed fortune: and so he was pulled out of the possession of Italy that he held so long.

News came to Rome about one and the same time, that both Mago and Annibal were departed and onward on their journey: The joy of which twofold gratulation was the lesse in two regards, both for that their own captains seemed to have either little courage or small force to stay them behind, and impeach them for going, considering they had express order from the Senat to do so: as also because they at Rome were penfive and doubtful, what would be the issue and end of all, seeing the whole weight of the war to bear and rest upon the shoulders of one only Captain and army.

And much about this time came the Saguntine Embassadors, bringing with them certain Carthaginians prisoners, who were taken with sums of money upon them, and had sailed into Spain for to levy and wage men for aid. The money they laid down in the very port-hall or entrise of the Senat-house, amounting to 250 pound weight of gold, and 800 pound weight of silver. The men they received and clapt them up fast in prison, the silver and gold both, they delivered again to the Embassadors, with many thanks, over and besides they gave them rewards and ships to return again into Spain. Then the grave and ancient Senators began to reason and discourse in this wise: That men naturally have lesse sense of good things then of bad: and feel not so sore their own weal as their woe. We remember say they, what fear, what fright and terror we were put in, when Annibal passed over into Italy. Lord, what loises, what lamentable misfortunes hapned thereupon! The enemies camp was discovered and seen from the walls of the City: what wowing, what praying was there then, both of all and some! How often in assemblies and councils were men seen to stretch out their hands to heaven, & to utter these words & cry alouds

When

A When will that day come? and will it never be, that we shall see Italy again cleere of enemies, obtain repose, and flourish once more injoying happy peace? Now at length, even at 16 yeers end, and not before, the gods have vouchsafed us this blessing: and no man faith a word, nor maketh a motion of thanksgiving to their divine majesty therefore. And surely, if men know not how to accept with joy and thankfulness a benefit when it first cometh, they will be far short, and fail much more to remember the same when once it is past. Hereupon they cryed out and called aloud with one voice from all parts of the Senat-house to P. Valerius the Pretor, for to propole the matter to the court there assembled: and a decree was granted, that for five daies there should be solemn processions and supplications in every church and chappell before the shrines of the gods and goddesses: and greater beasts killed for sacrifice to the number of 120.

Now when Levius and the Embassadors of Masani had their dispatch and were dismissed, they were brought of the Carthaginian Embassadors coming to the Senat to sue for peace, were led in at Portici, and that from thence they would travell by land unto Rome. Whereupon it was thought good unto the Senat, that Levius should be sent for again and called back, that he might be present, and at the hearing of the treating of peace. Q. Fulvius Gellio a Lieutenant of Scipio had the conducting of the Carthaginian Embassadors to Rome: who being forbidden to set foot within the City, were lodged without the in great hall named Villa Publica, and had audience given them of the Senat, assembled in the temple of Bellus. Who made in manner the very same speech that they had before unto Scipio, clearing the whole State and their publick council, and laying all the fault and blame upon Annibal for making war: saying, that he had no warrant, commission, and commandment from the Senat to passe over the Alps, nor so much as over Iberus: and that of his own head he took arms: and warred not upon the Romans only, but also upon the Saguntines. In consideration whereof, he that would esteem all things aright, and weigh the truth indeed, must needs judge, that for any thing done by the Senat and people of Carthage, the ancient league made with the people of Rome, hath continued to that day found and entire. And therefore nothing else had they in commission to sue for and request, but that they might maintain and remain still in that accord & league which was last concluded and contracted with Levius the Consul. Now when the Pretor, according to an ancient custome of their forefathers, had given liberty to whomsoever that would for to put interregatories unto the Embassadors, and the elder for such as had been present at the making of the capitulations and covenants concerning the said peace, and demanded of them, some one thing, and some another: and the Embassadors answered again, that by occasion of their young age (for they were all in manner but young men) they remembered no such thing: the whole court from all parts thereof cryed out and said, that this was but a fraudulent and traiterous Carthaginian trick, to chuse and send such for to sue for the old peace which they themselves could not remember. And when the Embassadors were voided out of the Senat-house, and the opinions of the LL demanded, M. Livius was of this mind, that Cn. Servilius the Consul, who was the neerer of the twain, should be sent for, that the treaty of peace might in his presence be consulted upon. For since that there could not lightly a weightier matter then it was, come after them to be determined of, he thought it stood not with the honor and reputation of the people of Rome, that such a matter should be debated without the personall presence of both, or at the leastwise one of the Consuls. Qu. Metellus (who three yeeres before had been Consul and Dictator) spake to the cause in this manner. For as much as P. Scipio by defeating and putting to the sword whole armies, by waiting and spoiling the territories of the enemies, had driven them to this exigent, that in humble fort they came to crave peace: and considering that no man living was better able to judge with what mind and intent they sued for this peace then himself, who warred ever before the gates of Carthage: therefore no mans advice was to be heard, but only his, either to accept of the said peace in question, or to reject it. M. Valerius Levius, who had been twice Consul, argued, that they were spies and not Embassadors, who now were come; and that it were a good deed to command them to avante and be packing out of the confines of Italy: & to send with them certain men of purpose to guard them to their ships. Frey, & to write unto Scipio to go forward with his wars & not to slack one jot. Levius & Fulvius added moreover and said, that Scipio laid this especially for his ground, to hope there might be peace, in case Annibal and Mago were not called out of Italy: As for the Carthaginians, they would make remembrance of any thing whatsoever, so long as they expected the leaders and those armies: but afterwards without remembrance of covenants, were they never so fresh and new, yea, and without respect of all the gods, they would (no doubt) maintain and continue the wars. In these regards they inclined the rather to Levius, and approved his opinion. So the Embassadors were sent away without any peace obtained, or certain answer returned unto them.

Much about that time, Cn. Servilius the Consul, who made full reckoning that he should have the honour of bringing Italy into quietnes, made pursuit after Annibal, as if he had been courted & given out by him: and first sailed over unto Scily, and then into Africa. Which being commonly tolled and bruited abroad at Rome, at the first the LL of the Senat thought good, that the Pretor should write unto the Consuls to this effect, that the Senat judged it meet and reason for him to return into Italy. But afterwards upon the Pretor his words, saying that the Consul would be taught by his letters, P. Sulpitius was created of purpose Dictator, who by vertue of that more sovereignty, rule and authority, called the Consul peremptorily home into Italy. And the rest that year, be together with M. Servilius the Generall of the horse, spent in progresses and visiting all the Cities of Italy which in time of war had shaken off their allegiance, and in taking due knowledge of all their causes and reasons severally.

During the time of the truce, there let forth alioout of Sardinia from Leontium the Pretor, an hundred hulks laden with victuals, together with a convoy and guard of twenty gallees of war, and passed over into Africk safe, both from the danger of the enemy, and also from the perill of tempests by sea. But Cn. Octavius as he was in his voyage from Sicily, with a fleet of two hundred hulks and thirty strong gallees, had not the like good speed. For as he sailed (well near) within the kenning of Africk, first he was calmed; then the wind turning South, troubled and disordered his ships, yea, and scattered them over the sea one from another. Himself with his gallees of war wrought against the wind and the current, and with exceeding toil and labour of the oars-men, I doubled the point of the cape of Apollo, & there in the bay rode at anchor; but the hulks for the most part fell with the land Ægimurus (which thrusteth upon the foreland, and lieth in the very mouth of that creek from the sea wherein Carthage standeth) almost ten leagues from the City: and some were driven by wind to a place called the Hormwaters, over against the City. All this happened within the sight of Carthage. And therefore out of all parts of the City, was great running to the market place. The magistrats assembled the Senat; the people at the entry and porch of the Council house, called upon the Senators and cried out; that they should not let slip to great a booty out of their eyes and hands. Some alleged against them, the fidelity of treating of peace: others also objected the faithfull promise of truce (the terme whereof was not yet expired). But at last when both Senat and people were intermingled all in manner together, agreed it by a general consent, that Ashurban with a fleet of fifty sail, should cut over to Ægimurus; and so from thence rally and gather together the Roman ships dispersed along the coasts and the havens. And the hulks (abandoned of their mariners that were fled, first from the land Ægimurus, and afterwards from the Hormwaters afore said) were drawn and towed as it were at the tails of their own ships to Carthage. As yet the Embassadours were not returned from Rome, neither knew they what the resolution of the Roman Senat was concerning war or peace, nor the day of the truce determined. Scipio taking the wrong and indignity to be more bawious, in that the hope of peace, and the assurance of truce should be violat by them first, who sought both for the one and the other: presently dispatched an embassage to Carthage. M. Behnius, L. Servilius, and L. Fabius; who being by the concurse and running together of the people, neer to a shrewd turn and mischief; and foreseeing their return like to be a dangerous, craved of the magistrats (who saved them from violence) to send certain ships to wait them. So they were allowed two gallees called Tiuremes, which having conducted them until they were arrived at the river Bagrada, where they were with in sight of the Roman camp, returned back again to Carthage. Now the Carthaginian Armado lay in the rode before Vitea. From thence there made out three gallees of four ranks of oars; whether it were upon some secret direction from Carthage so to do, or that Ashurban the Admirall of the fleet, upon his own head adventured to foul an action (the latter having no hand therein, and therefore not to be blamed) and elypping the Roman Galley of five banks of oars past the point of the cape, suddenly assailed her from the main sea. But neither could they invell and strike her with their beak heads, making to good way, and shifting to well by reason of her swiftness; neither could the armed fouldiers from out of their lower vessels boord her being to fall ship over them. And right valiantly the defended her self as long as shot lasted; which when it once failed, and that she had no other means to help her self, but only the nearness of the land and a number of fouldiers who from the camp were run to the shore, with the losse only of the ship all the passengers escaped safe to land.

Thus the truce being doubtles broken with one wickedness coming in the neck of another, L. Lilius at Falvina came in the very nick from Rome, together with the Carthaginian Embassadors: unto whom Scipio, having given his word, that though the Carthaginians had not only broken the faith and assurance given of the truce, but also the law of arms, in abusing and evilly intreating the persons of the Embassadors, yet himself would do nothing to them unworthy either the order of the people of Rome, or unfixing his own manner and custome, dismissed the Embassadors, and made preparation for war.

When Anubal now approached the land of Africk, one of the mariners was commanded to climb up to the top of the mast to discover the coast, and to see what part they were directed to; and when he made answer and said, that the prow made head upon a place called, the Rainet spicubere; he mislaid the omen and preface of that place, and commanded the pilot to passe by, and leave it: and so he put his fleet within the bay of Lepis, and there set his army a shore. And these were the affairs of Africk for that year. The acts ensuing, reach to that year, wherein M. Servilius Geminus, who then was Generall of the horse; and T. Claudius Nero were made Consuls. But in the end of that former year, when the Embassadors of the confederat Cities of Greece made complaints, that their territories were waited by the Kings garrisons: and when they sent their Embassadors into Macedonia, for to demand satisfaction and restitution, they could not be admitted unto the King, nor have audience; and moreover, they gave intelligence, that there were four thousand armed fouldiers transported over into Spain, under the conduct of Seipio to aid the Carthaginians: and certain summes of money likewise sent with them: the Senat gave order, that Embassadours should be addrest unto the King, to give him to understand,

As that the LLI of the Senat took all this to be done against the tenure and form of the league. So there were sent C. Terentius Varro, Ch. Manlius, and M. Arelinus. And three gallees of five course of oars they were allowed.

This was a year of special note; for a great scare-fire; whereby the publick cliff was burnt to ashes down to the ground: also for much abundance of rain and many floods, and exceeding cheapes of victual. For besides that all Italy was open by reason of a general peace throughout, M. Fabius Faler, and M. Fabius Bute, Adiles of the chair, divided the great store of corn that was sent out of Spain among the people, street by street; and let the price at four Asles the Modius. The same year Q. Fabius Maximus departed this life; a man of great years and exceeding old, as that be true which some writers report, that he was Auger 42 years. But certain it is, that he was a man worthy of great and honourable a surname, yea, and if it had begun first in himself. He surpassed the dignities of his father, he was equal in honor to his grand-father: Rullus his grand-father, I must needs say, had more titles of victories, and of greater battails: but one enemy of his, Anubal, may countervail them all, as many as they were. Howbeit, this man was counted more wary and advised, than hardy and forward: and as a man may well doubt whether by natural disposition he loved to take leisure in all his actions, or that it was a policy of his agreeable to the way properly then in hand; so verily nothing is more certain than this, that as the Pote Ennius saith:

This only man by wise delay, Risor'd our state fall'n to decay.

C His son Q. Fabius Maximus was invested or installed Augur in his place, and for Bishop in his room (for two faceted dignities he had) Ser. Sulpicius Galba was chosen. The Roman plaies were exhibited one day; and the Plebeian Games thrice wholly renued by the Adiles M. Sextus Sabinus and Cn. Tremellius Piscus. They both, were made Pretors; and with them C. Livius Salinator, and C. Aurelius Cotta. The solemn election of the Magistrats for that year, whether Cn. Servilius the Consul held, or (because of important busines in Tuscany, about the examinations of the conspiracies there of certain great men, by commission from the Senate, which might keep him there) P. Sulpicius the Dictator by him nominated; it is uncertain, by reason of the variety and difference of writers in that behalf.

In the beginning of the year next following, M. Servilius and T. Claudius, after they had assembled the Senat in the Capitol, moved concerning the Provinces. And for asmuch as both of them desired Africk, they were willing that Africk and Italy, should be put to the choice of a Lottery. But by the especial travail of Q. Metellus, the Province of Africk was neither granted nor denied to either of them. And the Consuls were commanded to deal with the Tribuns of the Commons, that if they thought so good, they would prefer a bill unto the people, to know whom they would have to war in Africk. So all the tribes in general gave their voices with P. Scipio. Nevertheless, the Consuls (for so the Senat had decreed before) cast lots for the Province of Africk. Thus Africk fell unto T. Claudius, namely, that he should sail over thither with an armada of fifty ships, all gallees of five ranks of oars, and be joyed in equal communion with Scipio. And M. Servilius had Hetruria allotted unto him. In the same Province Cn. Servilius also was to continue in government, in case it pleased the Senat to stay the Consul in the City. Of Pretors, M. Sestius by lot had the rule of Gallia, with order, that P. Quintilius Varus should make over unto him the Province and two legions. And C. Livius took the charge of the Brutii with the two legions, which the year before were commanded by P. Sempronius the Vice-consul. Cn. Tremellius was appointed to govern Sicily, and to receive of P. Villus Tappulus the Pretor of the former year, that Province and two legions. And ordered it was, that Vilius as Propretor, should keep in obedience and defend the coast of Sicily with twenty ships of war, and a thousand fouldiers; and that from thence M. Pomponius should in the twenty ships behind embark one thousand and five hundred fouldiers, and transport them over to Rome. Unto C. Aurelius Cotta was the civil jurisdiction of the City assigned. All the rest continued still in their government, and had their commissions newly signed, according as they had either provinces or armies under their hand. And with sixteen legions and no more, was the State of Rome that year maintained. Now to the end they might begin all enterprises in the name of the Gods and proceed therein with their grace and favour, order was given, that the Consuls before they went out to war, should first offer those games and plaies, and sacrifice those greater beasts which T. Manlius Dictator in the year that M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintius were Consuls, promised by solemn vow, in case the Commons weal continued for five years following, in the same good estate as then it was. So the games were exhibited in the great Cirque or show-place four daies together, and the sacrifices slain accordingly, as they were vowed to the Gods.

But all this while, as mens hope, for their fear all increased daily more and more, whiles they could not certainly resolve with themselves, whether they had more cause to rejoyce, that Anubal after sixteen years had abandoned Italy, and left the possession thereof free unto the people of Rome; or to be afraid, for that he had passed over into Africk with the safety of his army. For why? the place was only changed, and the danger all one. And surely Q. Fabius late deceased, no vain Prophet of so great a perill and hazard, was wont to foretell, and this was ever his saying. That Anubal would be a more dangerous enemy at home in his own country, than if he had been abroad in a forraign Land. And Scipio should find, that he had to deal neither with

"Syrphax (King of a rude, untought, and barbarous country, who was wont to lead armies offhale
 "grooms, and little better than water-bearers and camp-slaves to keep one place, and not re"move) not with Asdrubal his father in law, a Captain of all others most light of foot, and re-
 "died to run away, nor yet with tumultuary armies taken up in huff and raised suddenly, con"fiding of a rabble of ruffical clowns and peasants armed by the halves; but with Annibal, born in man"ner within the camp, yea, and in the royal pavilion of his father; a most valiant Captain, bred "and brought up amongst armed men; who long ago was no sooner a child, but he was a soldier,
 "and before he came to the prime and flower of youth, became a General: who growing to be
 "old in a continual course and train of victories, hath filled Spain and France from the one side
 "to the other, and Italy from the Alpes to the narrow seas, with the marks and memorable monu"ments of worthy and noble exploits: and leadeeth still an army of as long standing and continu"ance in warfare as himself, hardened and beaten to endure all those things which hardly one "would believe, men could abide and suffer; embrewed and bathed a thousand times in the blood of "Romans, and carrying with him the spoils not of common soldiers only, but also of most brave
 "Generals themselves. Scipio should be sure to encounter and meet in battail those who with their "own hands had slain Pretors, and killed Consuls of Rome; all bedight and goodly to be seen in "mural and vallare coronets; for their good service in scaling of walls, and mounting over rampiers
 "those I say who at their pleasure have ranged through the won camps and forced Cities of the "Romans. Neither at this day have the Magistrates of the people of Rome so many bundles of rods,
 "with axes bound before them, as Annibal hath taken from the Roman Generals who he hath slain,
 "So can it be left shew and carry before him, Casting and tossing these doubts and fears in their minds,
 "they themselves entreated their own care, and doubled their dread in this point also, that whereas
 "they were wont for certain years to make war in sight of home, in diverse and sundry places of "Italy, with a lingering kind of hope, without regarding any issue thereof like presently to enforce
 "Scipio and Annibal, Captains matched together (as one would say) to make a final end & tryal of,
 "had set all mens minds awork to expect the event now or never. And even they also who had re-
 "posed exceeding confidence, and grounded no small hope of victory in Scipio, the more their spir-
 "its were amused upon it, and desirous to see a speedy effect, the greater was their care and doubt "of the issue. The Carthaginians for all the world were likewise affected and disquieted in mind.
 "One whiles, beholding Annibal, and considering his noble and worthy acts, they repented that "they fled for peace. Another while again, when they looked back and remembered, how twice
 "they had been defeated in battail, Syrphax slain themselves driven out of Spain, chased and humiliated
 "out of Italy, and all this by the valor and policy of one man Scipio; they trembled for fear of him,
 "as if he were the fatal Captain born for their ruin and utter destruction.

Now by this time was Annibal come as far as Adrumetum; from whence, after he had bellowed
 "some few dayes in refreshing his sea-fick soldiers, he was routed with fearful postures "brought news, how all about Carthage was full of enemies and hostility: whereupon he made "long journeys till he came to Zama, This Zama is a Town distant from Carthage five dayes jour"ney. From thence he sent out espials, who being taken by the Roman warders, were brought be"fore Scipio, and he caused them to be delivered unto the Tribuns or Marshals, with command"ment, that they should be led throughout the camp: and suffered without all fear, to see whatso"ever they desired. And when he had asked of them whether they had perused and considered "everything to their content, and enough to serve their turn; he sent them back again to Annibal,
 "with a safe conduct to accompany them. Annibal took no pleasure at all in hearing of any thing
 "that they reported: for (among other particulars) they brought news that Malcaniss chanced "that very day to come thither with six thousand foot and four thousand horse. But most of all,
 "he was troubled and cast down with the resolute confidence and assurance of the enemy: which "no doubt (he thought) arose not of nothing. And therefore albeit himself was the only cause "of that war, and by his arrival had disturbed the truce concluded, and the hope of peaceable cov"enants: yet supposing, that a more indifferent accord might be obtained, in case he sued therefore "while he was entire and unfoiled, rather than after he were vanquished and overcome; he addre"ssed a messenger or purveyor unto Scipio, requesting that he might confer and commune with him.
 "Whether he did this of his own accord, or by direction from the publick Council of the State, I "have no reason to set down or avouch for certain, either the one or the other. Valerius Antius
 "writeth, That he was by Scipio defeated in the first battel, wherein were slain in field 12000 armed "men, and 1700 taken prisoners, whereupon himself in person came as Ambassador, with other ten "Orators into the camp unto Scipio. But howsoever it was, Scipio refused not to embrace; and so,
 "both Generals of purpose advanced forward and approached with their camps, to the end they "might be nearer one to the other when they should meet in conference. Scipio made choice of a "plot of ground not far from the City Nadagara: which as it was handsome and meet in "other respects, so especially in this, that it had a watering place within an arrow shot. Annibal
 "took an hill four miles from thence, sure enough and commodious otherwise, but only that they "were far from water. In the mid way between they chose a plain, open on every side, where they "might discover and see all about them, that no ambush there were laid: and after they had caused
 "their armed footsiders to retire a like distance from either party, then came together with one
 "truch-man or interpreter apace, not only the greatest and bravest Captains of their time, but al"so equal to the mightiest Kings or Emperors of realm or nation that ever had been afore them

The enter-view of Scipio and Annibal.

A in any age and remembrance of man. For while they stood one beholding the other, and said "never a word, ravished and astonished with a mutual admiration: and at last Annibal began and "spoke in this wise. "If the Gods by destinies have appointed, that I who first levied war against "the Romans, and who first often have had the victory as it were in mine own hands, must needs
 "of myself and mine own motion, come now first likewise to sue for peace: glad I am and well "pleased, that it is my good hap to meet with you above all other men, at whose hands I should "seek the fame. And certainly, you also for your part among many your singular and excellent "leader, may I conceive this for none of the least, namely, That Annibal (unto whom the Gods "have vouchsafed the upper-hand over so many noble Captains of the Romans) hath yielded the
 "backen; and given place unto your self; now that you have had the honor to end this war,
 "more notable and renowned at the first for your losses and overthrows than ours: and that "fortune (as it is fallen out) hath made this prey (with me) who at the beginning took "arms when your father was Consul, gave him battail first of all other Roman Generals, and am "now come unarmed since his son to crave peace. Verily much better it had been, and simply the "very best, that the Gods had inspired into our fore-fathers this mind, That both you might "have contented your selves with the Dominion of Italy, and we likewise of Africa. For truly, "Sicily and Sardinia both, are nothing sufficient to make amends and satisfaction, and it were but "only of your part, what recompense of so many brave deaths, so many pusillan armies, and so many "famous Captains that ye have lost. But faults done and past may well be blamed and reprov-
 "ed, when they can not be corrected and reformed. So greedily were we on both sides to conquer
 "the lands of others, that in the meantime we have hazarded our own. Neither had ye war in "Italy only, or we again in Africa alone: but both ye have seen the ensigns and armies of ene"mies laid at your gates, and in manner under your own walls: and we likewise from Carthage
 "have heard the noise and bruit of the Roman camp. Now then, that which we have caused most
 "to detest and abhor, and you to wish above all other things in the world; the treaty of peace is "fallen out in time of your better prosperity, and more favourable aspect of fortune unto you.
 "We againe the agents therein, whom it most standeth upon and importeth that there should "be peace; and who are assured, whatsoever we conclude, that the States and cities from whence
 "we come, will approve and ratifie the same. There needs no more but a willing mind, well "affected and inclined to those courses which tend to peace and quietnes. For mine own part,
 "and while age hath taught me, who am returned an old man into my country, from whence
 "I came a child: another while prosperity and adversity both, hath schooled me, that I would "now rather be ruled by reason, than I wayed by fortune. But I fear me greatly, that you as well in "regard of youth, as also of your continual felicity and fortunate train of success, are over-hasty
 "and stout; for to yield unto any peaceable wayes. For commonly he fore-calleth no variable "chances, who never tasted of adverse fortune. And the same are you at this day, that sometimes
 "I was at Thermapyus and at Cannae. You being hardly come to charge, which is meet for war-
 "like, had the charge and command of an army: and look what enterprises you took in hand
 "most successfully, the same you ever exploited as happily. You pursued the vengeance of fathers "and uncles death, and wan by the calamity of your house and family a notable name and reputa"tion of singular virtue and piety. Spain full and wholly you have recovered and conquered a"gain: four armies of Carthaginians you have chased from thence: no sooner were you created "Consul, but when all other mens hearts failed them to defend and keep Italy, you failed never"theless, hither over into Africa: and after you had defeated here two armies, forced and burnt
 "in one hour two camps of your enemies, taken Syrphax prisoner, a most mighty and pusillan
 "Prince, vanquished many cities both of his Kingdom and of our dominions: you pulled me a league
 "my head out of Italy, whereof I had been now sixteen years possessed. Well may your hasty "mind affect victory rather than incline to peace. Full well I know of what spirit and stomach
 "you are, more respective to grandeur and honor, than to your good and profit. And the time
 "hath been, when I also had the lightesome countenance of fortune lovingly smiling and shining "upon me. And were we so blessed of God as to have our right wits and perfect senses in time of "prosperity, we would consider and think not of things only which have hapned, but of those
 "also that might happen. But if you should forget all other, I alone might serve as a sufficient "example & mirror of accidents of fortune whatsoever. For, whom not long since you either saw
 "or might have seen encamped between the river Anio and your City, and ready in manner to "take the walls of Rome; you see me now after the loss of my brethren, two right valiant warriors
 "and most renowned Generals, even here before the walls of my country little better than be"sieged, making means in humble manner to avert and avoid those dangers from mine own City,
 "with which enemies I terrified yours. Well, the greatest and happiest fortune is left to be "ruled, and never is it worse relying on her, than when she is so free & boundless. Now that you
 "G both are and we fade, whiles you are afore and we sink; peace, unto you that giveth it, is a glo"rious and goodly matter; unto us that crave it, more necessary than honorable. Better it is yet and "later of the twain, to enjoy a certain peace, than hope for a doubtful victory. The one lieth in "your hand to effect, the other as it pleaseth the Gods to dispose. Beware therefore, how in once "you hazard the felicity of so many years, And as you consider your own strength & forces:
 "I wish upon the power of fortune: let before your eyes the alternative course of Mars
 "in war. You shall see armor and the edge of the sword; you shall see the bodies of men as well of

of Annibal to Scipio.

"one side as the other and no where less than in war do events answer to our hope and expectation. And make full account of this, that you shall not gain so much overflow of honor, if haply you should win a field) above that which by granting a peace you may presently have in hand and be possessed of as you shall forgo and lose of the principal, in case you should do amiss and take the foil. One hour's misfortune is able to overturn all the honors and triumphs trophies as well past & gotten already, as in future hope to be obtained. In knitting and concluding a peace, O P. Cornelius, all lieth in your power. Remember that once and come to the trial of a battle, you must take your hap as God shall appoint. If M. Attilius in times past being conqueror, would have granted peace unto our fore-fathers at their suit and earnest petitions, rare and singular example had he afforded of virtue and felicity, and few comparable unto him: but not having the grace to see when he was well; not able to let a gage to his prosperity in some measure, and in due time; not willing to refrain and stop the pride and haughtiness of his good fortune, the higher he was heaved, the fouler was his fall; and the more he mounted, the greater was his overthrow. It is for him (I confess) that giveth peace, to capitulate and set down the covenants and conditions, and not for him that craveth the same. And yet peradventure we might not be thought unworthy, to set upon our own heads a fine and forfeiture. We refuse not therefore but are content, That all shall be yours, for which the quarrel and war first began: Sicily, Sardinia, Spain, all the Ilands whatsoever lying in the Sea between Affrick and Italy. And we Carthaginians holding our selves enclosed within the bounds and coasts of Affrick (since the will and pleasure of God is so) can abide to see you to rule and govern in foreign lands and strange seas, I cannot deny, but that you have good cause to suspect the Carthaginians for their faith & truth, whose late desire of peace and attendance about the same, was not so plain and simple as (should have been: Yet Scipio, take this wish: That it importeth much to the assurance of keeping and observing peace once intertained, to consider who the persons be that seek and crave the same. And even your own Senators and LL. of the Council, as I hear say, were moved not a little to deny and reject the motion of peace, for this cause, that our embassy seemed unto them not so honorable as it ought to have been. But now I, even I, no worse a man than Annibal, beseege you for peace; which as I would not seek, unless I thought it profitable; so I will intertain it in regard of that profit for which I sought it. And like as when I had once begun the war, so long as the Gods impeached and envied me not, I maintained it so, as no man of ours had cause to be weary thereof: so will I endeavour that none shall repent of the peace obtained by my means. When Annibal had thus said, the Roman General made answer again in this sort, "I knew full well, O Annibal, that the Carthaginians upon the hope of your coming, have both disturbed the assurance of the present truce, and also troubled the hope of the future peace. Neither do you your self dissemble so much, in defaking all out of the former conditions and capitulations of peace, save only those things which long since have been in our power and possession. But as you have a great care, that your fellow citizens should know & perceive, what heavy burdens they are by your means discharged and eased of; even so must I endeavour and labour, that the points which then they covenanted and agreed upon, they deduct not this day out of the articles and conditions of peace, for the hire and reward of their falsehood and treachery. For unworthy you are to have the overturn and possibility of any peace at all, ye seek also, that fraud and deceit may turn to your profit and commodity. Neither began our predecessors first to make war for Sicily, nor we since for Spain. But as then the danger wherein our allies the Mamerins stood: so now the ruin and destruction of Saguntum, moved us unto take arms off justly, even for pity and compassion. That you began the quarrel and provoked us first, your self confesses, and the Gods do witness: who, as in the former war, they granted and gave the issue, according to right, equity, and justice: so they do in this, and so they ever will. For mine own part, I remember well, and think upon the frailty of mankind, and the ticklishness of this world: I consider also the power of fortune and what she is able to do: I know likewise, that all our actions whatsoever, are subject to a thousand hazards and inconveniences. But as I would acknowledge my self to have dealt proudly and outrageously, if before I passed over into Affrick, when of N you yourself well nigh you abandoned Italy, when you had embarked your army, and came of your own accord to seek peace, I had then rejected you and cast you off: even so at this time, when I have haled and drawn you into Affrick by strong arm, as it were to tie an issue in law (all the hailing, all the shifting and resistance you could make to the contrary notwithstanding) am not bound to have any respective regard at all of you. Wherefore, if besides those points and capitulations, under which the peace at that time was like to be concluded (and what those were you know as well as I can tell you) you bring with you any recompence and amends for our ships, which being charged with victual and munition, you took perforce from us in time of the cessation of arms: as also for the outrage and violence committed upon the persons of our Embassadors: there is some reason that I should consider thereupon and be advised by my Council. But if you think hardly thereof also, as being thereby too fore pressed: look for battle, you that could not like of repose: provide for war, since you would abide no peace. Thus without any condition of accord they left parting: & being returned to their own companies, they related unto them, how their conference came to nothing, and all their words were but wind, and did no good: and therefore the matter was to be determined and tried by dint of sword, and they to trust to that fortune which the Gods had appointed for them. So soon as they were come into their camps, both

"of them made proclamation, that the souldiers should huckle themselves, make ready their armour, pluck up their spirits, and address themselves to a final trial of the quarrel: where, if they hoped well, they were to be victors, not for one day, but for ever and aye. For before the morning next at night, they should know, whether Rome or Carthage should give laws unto all nations of the earth. And as neither Affrick nor Italy, but the whole world shall be the prize and guardon of the conquerors: so they, whose hap were to lose the field, must make account of danger and damage, equal to the winnings and gain of the other. For as the Romans had no way to escape, nor place of safe retreat, being in a strange and unknown land: so Carthage (having laid all upon this one cast) if they now misde, made account that all was gone, and present destruction at hand. So the next day there advanced forward to this doubtful and dangerous trial, two most noble and renowned Captains, of two right mighty and puissant states: two most valiant and hardy armies came forth into the field, resolute that day either to win the purs or lose the shield: to gain more glory to their country, or else to lose all that ever they had gotten. Thus while the two hosts, and each of their minds were perplexed and distracted: and beholding one while their own forces, and another while their enemies power: measuring rather by their eye, than weighing by reason their strength, they had at once presented unto them, objects of joy and content, as well as of sorrow and heaviness. And look what the souldiers themselves could not think upon, those things their leaders put them in mind of, suggesting unto them by way of admonition and exhortation, whatsoever was thought expedient and good. Annibal rehearsed his noble acts achieved in Italy for the space of sixteen years, he reckoned up how many Roman Captains he had slain, how many armies he had defeated and put to the sword: and ever as he met with any souldiers of note and mark, or some worthy and memorable battail, he put them in remembrance of their honourable service and good deeds: Scipio related the conquest of Spun, recounted the fresh foughten fields in Affrick, alleged the very confusion of the enemies: who neither for fear could do other but seek for peace, nor yet upon an inbred liallood imprinted in their hearts, continue long in the same. Besides, he inserted the communication and speech of Annibal had with him in secret and apart from others: which according as he was disposed to devise, he might turn at his pleasure to his purpose. And inasmuch as the Gods had shewed unto them as they went out into the field the same signs and tokens of birds, by direction whereof their fathers before them fought in times past before the Ilands Agates: he offered and presaged that the war was come to an end, all dangers and troubles overblown, that the spoil and pillage of Carthage was at their devotion, and they at the point to return home unto their country, their parents, wives, children, and domestic Gods. And this he spake with such a lofty gesture of his body, with so pleasant and lovely a countenance, withal, that a man who had seen him, would have thought verily he had achieved the victory already. Then he embattailed first his Hastati (or spears) in the vanguard, behind them the Principes; and the rearward he guarded and fortified with the Triarii. Neither marshalled he whole cohorts thrust thick and close together, in the head of the battail before their ensigns, but divided them into Squadrons, distant a pretty way asunder one from the other: to the end there might be room and space to receive the Elephants of the enemies, that they should not break the array and ranks. As for Latinus (whom he had employed before as Lieutenant, but that year in quality of a Questor by a special order and direction from the Senat, and not by choice of lot) him with the Italian Cavalry he put in the left point: and Masinissa, with the Numidian horsemen in the right. The open waies and void spaces between the Squadrons stored, placed in the front before the ensigns, he filled with the Velites or Javelottiers, who at that time were light armed souldiers: with this commandment, that presently upon the violent charge given by the Elephants, they should either retire behind the files, or else run to a side, both on the right hand and the left, and joyn close to the foremost ranks, and make the Elephants way to run upon their shot from the one side and the other. Annibal to strike a terror into the enemies, first arranged the Elephants in the front, who were in number four-score, and more than ever he had before in any battail. Then he embattailed the aid-souldiers of the Ligurians and Frenchmen, with the Baleare slingers and the Mores intermingled amongst them. In the main battail he placed the Carthaginians and Affricans, with the legion of the Macedonians: behind whom (leaving a little space between) he let in array the battailon of the Italian souldiers in the rearward for succour: and those were most part of them Brutii: who followed him more perforce and by constraint, than of any good will, when he departed out of Italy. The Cavalry also he displayed and spread round like wings about the two points: whereof the Carthaginians kept the right, and the Numidians the left. Sundry and divers were the exhortations throughout the army, amongst so many men: whose language was dissimilar, whose complexions far unlike, whose manners and conditions were divers, who differed in laws and customs, whose armours were not all one, whose raiment and apparel not suitable, and finally, whose quarrel and cause of war was not one and the same. The auxiliaries and aid-souldiers fed themselves with the hope of ready and present payment and wages for the time past, yea, and with a double and triple augmentation thereof to boot, out of the spoil and pillage. The Frenchmen upon a special hatred of their own, and the same deeply seared, were soon kindled and enflamed against the Romans. The Ligurians, who were brought out of the rough and craggy mountains, and whose teeth watered at the fruit (not plentiful fields of Italy, were quickly by him moved to hope after victory. The Mores and Numidians he frightened with the proud and tyrannical rule of Masinissa, under which they should ever after

live. Before the Carthaginians he presented the walls of their native City, their houses and houses of God, the sepulchres and tombs of their ancestors, their children and parents, yea, and their timorous and fearful wives: he set before their eyes either final destruction of all those things and slavery of their persons, or else the empire and sovereign dominions of the whole world: and so mean between these extremities either of fear or hope.

When as the General was most buie this in exhorting the Carthaginians and the Captains of the strangers, amongst the soldiers of their own Nations, and that for the most part by means of interpreters, intermingled for the same purpose with them: the Trumpets sounded, and the horns blew from the Roman host. And such a wonderful shout arose from thence, that the Elephants turned upon the Mores and Numidians of their own side, especially in the left point of the battail. Whom M. Janniss seeing once affrighted, he soon redoubled their fear: and riding upon them with a hot charge, laid naked the battail of footmen on that side, and clean without the aid of their Cavalry. Howbeit, some few of the Elephants driven without fear full upon the enemy, made foul work amongst the ranks of the light armed Velites, and overthrow a number of them, not without many a wound and much hurt done to themselves. For the Velites leaping again nimbly to the Squadrons, after they had made way for the beasts, fearing they should be trodden underfoot by them, let fire their javelins at them from both sides, lying open as they did like boats to the shot on either hand. Neither lost they any time, who were in the vanguard before the Ensigns, nor gave over flinging their darts at them, until they were driven by a volley of shot lighting upon them from all parts, clean out of the Roman battail: and then they turned head also upon the very Horsemen of the Carthaginians in their own right point, and forced them to run away. Lulius for his part, seeing the enemies in disorder and sore troubled, charged upon them with his Hories, and encreased their fright. So as now the Carthaginian battail was disurnished and stript of their Horsemen on both wings. By which time the Cavalry joyned battail, whose hope was now quailed and strength abated, and therefore not able to make their parts good. Besides another thing there was, a small matter to speak of, but yet in fighting-time and in the very conflict, of great consequence and importun e. The shout and cry from the Romans was ever alike and consonant in all parts, and there o'the greater and more terrible: but the enemies made dissonant noises, according as they uttered in language, being as they were, of many and sundry Nations. The manner of the Romans fight was true and steadfast: by reason of the peltic of their own bodies, and the weight of their armour, bearing still a d pressing hard upon the enemies: but they on the other side, shewed more swiftness and agility than force and violence. And therefore at the very first shock the Romans incontinently enforced their battail to retire and lose their ground. Afterward they fell to flourishing and knocking them with the pikes and bosses of their bucklers: which done, they let foot forward a good round pace, and gained some ground of them, marching on still, and no man seemed to make head against them: whilst they that were hindmost in the files, perceiving once that battail to go on and wind ground, still put forward the foremost, which was the very thing that availed much, and was of great efficacy to put the enemies to flight. But the second battail which consisted of Africans, and Carthaginians, were so far from fearing and upholding the auxiliary strangers thus dimaching: that contrary-wise, for fear lest the Romans by killing them in the forefront (who stood to it lustily and made resistance) should come as far as to them behind, they likewise retired and gave backward. Whereupon the aid-souldiers also suddenly shewed their hin-parts and turning their face upon their own fellows: some of them retired for refuge into the second battail: others fell to killing of them that would not receive them within their ranks: and good reason they had, for as a while before they had no help at all of them, so then they were altogether excluded and shut out from them. So as now the Carthaginians had to deal at once in two skirmishes shuffled together, whilst they were compelled to dole and come to hand fight, both with their enemies, and also with their own fellows. Yet notwithstanding for all they were either so affrighted, or so angry with them receive them they would not in no hand into their battail: but keeping their ranks and files close together, they cast them to N side to the wings and the void ground without the place of conflict, and all because they would not intermingle any souldiers thus scared upon running away and many wounds, with that battail which stood still sure enough, and as yet unfoiled. But the place where a little before the auxiliaries were ranged, was so full of slain bodies, and weapons and armour thrumbled one upon another, that the Romans had welneer more ado to pass that way now, than they should have had through the press of the enemies standing thick together. And therefore the foremost of the Hastati following after the enemies, every one as well as he could over the heaps of bodies and armour on the earth, and through the slippery filth of the blood, made a pellmell of their own carriages, and confusion of their ranks. Whereupon the ensigns also of the Princes began to wave, when they saw the battail afore them to be wandering and inconstant. Which Scipio when he once perceived, commanded in all haste to found the retreat unto the Hastati: and when he had withdrawn as many of them as were wounded and hurt, and bestowed them in the rearward, he brought the Princes and the Triarii to the out-wings and flanks thereof: to the end, that the middle battail of the Hastati should be more sore and strong. By this means there began a new skirmish. For now were they come to their very enemies indeed: such as for armour and weapons of all sorts, for practise and experience of warfare, for fame and renown of worthy

A worthy exploits, and last of all for greatness either of hope or peril, were equal and comparable unto them. But both in number and also in courage, the Romans were superiour, for that already they had discomfited the Cavalry, put to flight the Elephants, beaten back the vanguard, and were ready now to encounter with the main battail. Now Lulius and M. Janniss having had the horsemen in chase a good way, whom they had compelled to flee as is before said, returned in good time, and charged hotly upon the tail of the enemies battail. And this assault of theirs it was, that struck the stroke, this did the deed and amazed the enemies. Many of them were environed and killed in the place, many fled and were scattered over the plains and open fields, and by the horsemen who had taken up all the avenues, and ranged all about, were caught up here and there, and so slain. Of Carthaginians and their Allies, were killed that day above twenty thousand, and welneer as many taken prisoners: of military ensigns there were gotten a hundred thirty three, and eleven Elephants besides alive. Of the conquerors there died about two thousand. Annibal with some few horsemen made shift to escape out of the tumult and heat of the execution, and fled to Adramentum, having assailed and tried all means possible, both in the very conflict, and also before the battail, ere he departed and left the fight. And this praise and commendation he won even by the confession of Scipio himself, and all others that were expert warriors, that with singular skill that day he ordered the battel, and marshalled the field. For the Elephants he had placed in the forefront, whose adventurous force and intollerable violence in giving the onset, might empeach the Romans from following their colours, and keeping their arrais: the only thing wherein they reposed their greatest hope and confidence. Then, before the main battail of the Carthaginians, he set the auxiliaries and aid-souldiers, of purpose, that being a confused rable and medley of all sorts of nations, such as were not bound by allegiance, but tied only by gain and wages, should have no liberty to retire themselves, and escape by running away: who also, as the sordid hope, bearing the furious heat of the first brunt, might weary the enemies with charging upon them, and if they did no other good, yet with receiving many a wound in their bodies dull and turn the edge of the enemies sword. After this in the battel, where all his hope was, he placed the Carthaginian and African souldiers: that being otherwise in all things else equal to the enemies, they might in this regard have the odds, in that they were to fight with them wearied and wounded, when they themselves were in heart and lusty. As for the Italians, who also were divided from the rest by a good space between he removed far off into the rearward, as doubtful whether they were friends or enemies, Annibal having done this doughty deed and work, as it were for the last proof of his virtue and valour, fled to Adramentum, and was from thence sent for to Carthage: whither he returned in the 36 year, after that he first departed thence a very child, where in the Council house he confessed and said, "That overcome he was not only in a battel once, but also in the main war for ever hereafter: protesting in plain terms, that now there was no other way but one to save themselves, and that was peace, if they could obtain it.

Scipio immediately after this battail, having forced by assault and rifled the enemies camp, returned with a huge booty to the Sea and his ships, being advertised afore by a messenger that P. Lentulus was arrived at Utica with five ships of war, and a hundred Hulks laden with provision of all kinds of victual. And supposing it good policy now that Carthage was troubled and thoroughly affrighted, to come upon them with all terror on every side: so soon as he had dispatched Lulius away to Rome, with tidings of this victory, he commanded C. Otavianus to lead the legions by Land against Carthage. Himself in proper person, after he had joined this new fleet of Lentulus, unto the old Armado of his own, weighed anchor and departed from Utica, and sailed directly to the Haven of Carthage. He was not far from thence, when there met him a ship of the Carthaginians, garnished with insules, ribbands, and white flags of peace, and belcet with bunches of Olive: wherein were ten Orators embarked, the best men of the City, sent by the advice and motion of Annibal to crave peace. Who as they approached the hin-deck and poop of the Admiral ship, put forth the vails and tokens of suppliants, praying and beseeching the protection and mercy of Scipio. Who had no other answer made them, but that they should repair to Tunes, whither he intended to remove. Then himself after he had well viewed the situation of Carthage, not so much to have the full knowledge thereof at this present, as to terrifie the enemies, returned to Utica, whither he had called back Ottavius also. As he marched forward from thence toward Tunes, he had intelligence given him, that Perminia the son of Syphax was coming to aid the Carthaginians with a power of more Horsemen than Footmen: whereupon, part of the army together with the whole Cavalry was sent: whereof the light horse and van-couriers charging the vanguard in their march, after a light skirmish discomfited the Numidians: and having stopped all passages every way men the Horsemen, so as they could not get out and flee, there were upon a fifteen thousand men of them slain, 1200 taken prisoners, 1500 Numidian Hories also were gotten from them alive, and 72 military ensigns. The young Prince himself in the midst of the tumult and conflict, with some few escaped, then encamped Scipio near Tunes, in the same place where he lay before: and thither repaired unto him thirty Embassadors from Carthage. And they verily, as they were in harder case and greater distress, made much more pitiful entreating than before: but in their audience found less favour and mercy by a great deal, for their late treachery and falsehood to fresh in remembrance. Now albeit when they were set in counsel, all of them had just cause to be angry, and thereupon were provoked to destroy & rase Carthage: yet upon better advisement and consideration, how great and difficult and enterprize, and what a long

Yet notwithstanding for all they were either so affrighted, or so angry with them receive them they would not in no hand into their battail: but keeping their ranks and files close together, they cast them on side to the wings and the void ground without the place of conflict, and all because they would not interminge any souldiers thus scared upon running away and many wounds, with that battail which stood still sure enough, and as yet unfoiled. But the place where a little before the auxiliaries were ranged, was so full of slain bodies, and weapons and armour thrumbled one upon another, that the Romans had welnear more ado to pass that way now, than they should have had through the pelfs of the enemies standing thick together. And therefore the foremost of the Hastati following after the enemies, every one as well as he could over the heaps of bodies and armour on the earth, and through the slippery filth of the blood, made a pell-mell of their own ensigns, and confusion of their ranks. Whereupon the ensigns also of the Principes began to wave, when they saw the battail order them so wandering and inconstant. Which Scipio when he once perceived, commanded in all haste to found the retreat unto the Hastati: and when he had withdrawn as many of them as were wounded and hurt, and bestowed them in the rearward, he brought the Principes and the Triarii to the out-wings and flanks thereof; to the end, that the middle battail of the Hastati should be more sure and strong. By this means there began a new skirmish. For now were they come to their very enemies indeed: such as for armour and weapons of all sorts, for practise and experience of warfare, for fame and renown of

A worthy exploits, and last of all for greatness either of hope or peril, were equal and comparable unto them. But both in number and also in courage, the Romans were superior, for that already they had discomfited the Cavalry, put to flight the Elephants, beaten back the vanguard, and were ready now to encounter with the main battail. Now Lulius and Masaniassa having had the horsemen in chase a good way, whom they had compelled to flie as it were before, returned in good time, and charged hotly upon the tail of the enemies battail. And this assault of theirs it was, that struck the stroke, this did the deed and amazed the enemies. Many of them were environed and killed in the place, many fled and were scattered over the plains and open fields, and by the horsemen who had taken up all the avenues, and ranged all about, were caught up here and there, and to slay. Of Carthaginians and their Allies, were killed that day above twenty thousand, and welnear as many taken prisoners: of military ensigns there were gotten a hundred thirty three, and eleven Elephants besides, alive. Of the conquerors there died about two thousand. Annibal with some few horsemen made shift to escape out of the tumult and heat of the execution, and fled to

Adrumetum, having assailed and tried all means possible, both in the very conflict, and also before the battail, ere he departed and left the fight. And this praise and commendation he won even by the confession of Scipio himself, and all others that were expert warriors, that with singular skill that day he ordered the battel, and marshalled the field. For the Elephants he had placed in the forefront, whose adventurous force and intollerable violence in giving the onset, might empeach the Romans from following their colours, and keeping their arrais: the only thing wherein they reposed their greatest hope and confidence. Then, before the main battail of the Carthaginians, he set the auxiliaries and aid-souldiers, of purpose, that being a confused rable and medley of all sorts of nations, such as were not bound by allegiance, but tied only by gain and meely, should have no liberty to retire themselves, and escape by running away: who also, as the foremost hope, bearing the furious heat of the first brunt, might weary the enemies with charging upon them, and if they did no other good, yet with receiving many a wound in their bodies dull and turn the edge of the enemies sword. After this in the battel, where all his hope was, he placed the Carthaginian and African souldiers: that being otherwise in all things else equal to the enemies, they might in this regard have the odds, in that they were to fight with them wearied and wounded, when they themselves were in heart and lusty. As for the Italians, who also were divided from the rest by a good space between, he removed far off into the rearward, as doubtful whether they were friends or enemies. Annibal having done this doughty deed and work, as it were for the last proof of his virtue and valour, fled to Adrumetum, and was from thence sent for to Carthage: whither he returned in the 36 year, after that he first departed thence a very child. Where in the Council house he confessed and said: "That overcome he was not only in a battel "once, but also in the main war for ever hereafter: protesting in plain terms, that now there was "no other way but one to save themselves, and that was peace, if they could obtain it."

Scipio immediately after this battail, having forced by assault and rifled the enemies camp, returned with a huge booty to the Sea and his ships, being advertised afore by a messenger that P. Lentulus was arrived at Utica with five ships of war, and a hundred Huls laden with provision of all kinds of victual. And supposing it good policy now that Carthage was troubled and thoroughly affrighted, to come upon them with all terror on every side: so soon as he had dispatched Lulius away to Rome, with tidings of this victory, he commanded Cn. Octavius to lead the legions by Land against Carthage. Himself in person, after he had joined this new fleet of Lentulus, unto the old Armado of his own, weighed anchor and departed from Utica, and sailed directly to the Haven of Carthage. He was not far from thence, when there met him a ship of the Carthaginians, garnished with insules, ribbands, and white flags of peace, and beset with branches of Olive: wherein were ten Orators embarked, the best men of the City, bent by the advice and motion of Annibal to crave peace. Who as they approached the hind-deck and poop of the Admiral ship, put forth the vails and tokens of suppliants, praying and beseeching the protection and mercy of Scipio. Who had no other answer made them, but that they should repair to Tunes, whither he intended to remove. Then himself after he had well viewed the situation of Carthage, not so much to have the full knowledge thereof at this present, as to terrifie the enemies, returned to Utica, whither he had called back Octavius also. As he marched forward from thence toward Tunes, he had intelligence given him, that Vermis the son of Syphax was coming to aid the Carthaginians with a power of more Horsemen than Footmen: whereupon, part of the army together with the whole Cavalry was sent: whereof the light horse and van-carriers charging the vanguard in their march, after a light skirmish discomfited the Numidians: and having stopped all passages every way with the Horsemen, so as they could not get out and flie, there were upon a fifteen thousand men of them slain, 1200 taken prisoners, 1500 Numidian Horses also were gotten from them alive, and 72 military ensigns. The young Prince himself in the mids of the tumult and conflict, with some few escaped. Then encamped Scipio near Tunes, in the same place where he lay before: and thither repaired unto him thirty Embassadors from Carthage, and they verily, as they were in harder case and greater distress, made much more pitiful entreating than before: but in their audience found less favour and mercy by a great deal for their late treachery and falsehood so fresh in remembrance. Now albeit when they were set in council, all of them had just cause to be angry, and thereupon were provoked to destroy & raze Carthage: yet upon better judgement and consideration, how great and difficult and enterprife, and what a long long, piece of service it was to besiege a City so strong and so well fortified: and for that Scipio himself was troubled in mind with the expectation of a successor, who should come to win the credit and honor of finishing the war, which indeed was gotten by the travail and hazard of another, all their hearts were turned and inclined to peace. The morrow after the Orators were called again before them: and after they had been well checked, rebuked, and plainly told of their treachery and warned withal, that after so many losses and overthrowes which they had received, they should now learn to be wise, and at length believe that there were Gods in Heaven, and that an oath was to be regarded, these conditions of peace were tendered and offered unto them. Item, In what Cities was capitulated, That they might live free, according to the form of their own Laws: Item, What Cities, what territories (and within what bounds and limits) they held and were possessed of before the war began, the same they might keep still. Item, That Scipio and the Romans from that day forward should not wait and spoil the country. Item, That the Carthaginians should deliver all renegade traitors, all fugitive persons, all captives and prisoners, yea, and yield unto them all ships of war with brazen heads, above ten triremes or galleys of three ranks of oars. Item, That they should put into their hands all those Elephants which they had already tamed and manned and should break and tame no more of them. Item, They should make war neither in Affrick, nor without Affrick, but by order and warrant from the people of Rome. That they should make restitution and amends to Masaniila for all harms, and enter into league with him. Item, That they should find corn and money for the maintenance of the aid-souldiers: until their Embassadors were returned from Rome: yea, and tender payment of ten thousand talents of silver by even portions in fifty years. Item, That they should put in a hundred hostages at the pleasure of Scipio and none of them to be either under fourteen years of age, or above thirty. Last of all, they would grant a truce upon this condition, That the ships which were taken during the time of the former cessation of arms, should be restored back again, with all things else that were therein: otherwise no truce for the present, nor hope of peace hereafter. These articles and conditions the Embassadors were willing to return home withal. Which after they had related in the general assembly of the people, Gisco mounted up the pulpit to dissuade peace, and had audience given him with great applause of the multitude: who as they were heartless and unmeet for war, so they were as peevish and unkind, and could not long continue in repose. Hereafter, Annibal took great indignation, and was highly displeased, that in such a time, those things should either be delivered or heard: and he made no more do, but stepped to Gisco, laid hand upon him, and pulled him down from the pulpit out of which he spake: whereat the people were moved and grumbled in great discontent to see so strange a fight and unusual, in a free City. Then Annibal, as he was a meek martial man and could not skill of civil affairs, nor well away with these citizens' liberty. "I woe, quoth he, from you when I was but nine years old, and now after 36 years I am come again. All military skill and knowledge, which fortune sometime in my private matters, and other whiles in publick affairs, hath taught me from my childhood, me thinks I have learned sufficiently many for the rights and privileges for the laws, customs and fashions of the City and the common Hall I must be informed and instructed by you. Thus having pleaded ignorance for his excuse, he disordered at large of peace, arguing how reasonable and equal, yea, and how necessary it was. The greatest point of difficulty in all the capitulations ministered unto them was this, That touching the things above said which were taken during the abstinence of arms, there was nothing now forth-coming and to be seen but the bare vessels: and no easy matter was it to seek up the rest. Now when as they that gained the peace were convinced and put down by reason, agreed it was, that the ships should be redelivered, and the men likewise be sought out and found: as for all the rest that was wanting, there should an estimate be made according to the value, at the discretion of Scipio, and so the Carthaginians to make all good in money. Writers there be that have delivered, how Annibal presently from the field sped him to Sea, and there finding a ship ready prepared for him, straight-ways embarked and went directly to King Antiochus: Alas, when Scipio demanded above all other things that Annibal should be yielded into his hands, answer was made, that Annibal was not in Affrick. After that the Embassadors were returned to Scipio, the Quaestors or Treasurers were commanded to draw an extra according to their books upon record, of all such things as were in the ships, and appertained to the City: and look what belonged to private persons, the owners thereof were willing to declare and testify. In consideration and recompence whereof, there was a sum of money set down, amounting to 25000 pound weight of silver, and the same to be paid presently out of hand by the Carthaginians. Thus a truce was granted to them for three months: with this clause annexed over and besides. That during the said term they should send their Embassadors to no other place but only to Rome: and what Embassadors soever came to Carthage, they should not let them depart before they had certified the Roman General both who they were, and what their message and errand was. Then with the Carthaginian Embassadors were sent to Rome, L. Veturius Philo, M. Marcius Ralla, and L. Scipio, brother to the General. At that time there came such store of grain and victuals out of Sicily and Sardinia, and thereby corn was so cheap, that the Merchant was fain to leave corn behind him to satisfy the shipmen and mariners for the portage and carriage thereof.

Now there had been much trouble and fear at Rome upon the first news and alarm, that the Carthaginians had taken arms again: and T. Claudius had commission to conduct a fleet with all speed

A speed into Italy, and from thence to pass over into Affrick: likewise the other Consul was commanded to stay still at Rome, until it were certainly known in what terms all matters stood in Affrick. But T. Claudius went but slowly to work, either in preparing and rigging an armada, or in putting it to sea: because the LL. of the Senat were of opinion, that as touching the peace and the conditions thereof, it was rather at the disposition of Scipio than of the Consul. Moreover, there were certain prodigious signs reported even presently before the very rumour of the foresaid rising and insurrection, which caused men to fear greatly. At Cumes, the circle and compass of the sun appeared less: and it rained a good shower of stones. Also in the territory of Vesuvius, the earth felt, and sunk, and made huge hollow chinks, in so much as trees were quite swallowed up under the ground. At Aricia the market-place and the shops all about, likewise at Frangus the wall of the City in divers places, yea, and the gate, were smitten with lightning from Heaven: and in mount Palatine it rained stones. This wondrous sight laid rehearsed, was expiate after the ancient customs, by keeping a Novendial sacrifice and fast for nine days: the rest by killing of greater sacrifices. Among all these were unusual deluges and inundations of waters, which troubled the minds and consciences of men: for the Tiber to swell and rise so high, that by reason that the shew-places of the Cereus was overflowed, preparation was made for the letting forth of the games Agollinarius, without the gate Collina, near the chappel of Venus Erycina. But upon the very day when the plaies should be exhibited, it grew to be so fair weather of a sudden, that the pageant and pompous train of the shew, which was going to the gate Collina, was called back and conveyed into the Circus: and word brought, that the water was fallen and gone clean out from thence: so the people were more joyous, and the patimes celebrated with greater rejoyce, for that the usual and ordinary place served again for the solemnity to be performed.

Claudius the Consul at last departed from the City of Rome, and went to sea: where between the havens of Cyssa and Laurissus, he was overtaken with a terrible and fearful tempest that arose and put him in exceeding fear. From thence he came to the Populonia, and there staid until the tempest was overblown and gone. Then he fell with the Ile * Iluu, and from Iluu he failed to Corfica, and from Corfica he passed over to Sardinia: where, as he doubled the point and was passing the trace of the mountains called * Infantis: there arose a far more cruel gulf, and in places of more peril and hazard, which scattered the fleets. Many of the ships were weather beaten and fore-shaken, many lost their tackling quite, yea, and some were creakt and split. Thus the Armado being much rotted and torn, arrived at length at Carades: where, whilst the ships were drawn up into the dock to dry Land, and there repairing, the winces came upon them, and they turned about. And so T. Claudius (as a private person, by reason that no man renewed his commission for a farther time): brought the Armado back to Rome. But M. Scrotilus, because he should not be called home to the City for the solemn election of Magistrates, had he declared Dictator, Cn. Servilius Geminus, departed into his Province. And the Dictator chose P. Atilius Patrus General of the Horsemen. Oftentimes went the writs out for publishing of the election, but by reason of tempests it held not, nor was performed. And therefore when the old Magistrates left their office after the Ides of March, and none was substituted in their room, the City was clean without any Magistrates of state to sit in the ivory chair. L. Manlius Torquatus a Bishop, that year died. In his place was invested C. Sulpicius Galba. The Roman games were thrice exhibited anew by L. Lucius Lucullus and Q. Fulvius Ediles of the chair. The Clerks and Scribes belonging to the Ediles, together with their beadies and summoners, were detected for carrying forth certain money out of the treasure and chamber of the City: and being thereof convicted, were therefore condemned, not without some touch and discredit of Lucullus himself the Edile. P. Rilius Tuberos and L. Lictorius Ediles of the commons, for that there was some error and default in their election, resigned up their places, after they had represented the playes, and in regard thereof solemnized the feast of Jupiter, and set up besides in the Capitol three images made of the silver that was forfeited and raised upon the fines of the persons condemned aforesaid. The Dictator and General over the Horsemen, by order from the Senat exhibited the games called Cereales, to the honour of Ceres.

When the Roman Embassadors and Carthaginians together, were come out of Affrick to Rome, the Senat assembled to give them audience in the Temple of Bellona: where L. Veturius Philo after he had declared (to the exceeding joy of the LL. of the Senat) that they had fought a battle with Annibal (the last that ever the Carthaginians were like to fight) and that this grievous and lamentable war was now come to an end, he went on still and related, that Vermina the son of Syphax was vanquished and subdued: which was no small increase of the other exploits so happily achieved. Then he was commanded to go forth from thence directly to the assembly of the people, there to impart these glad some news unto the multitude. Whereupon (for exceeding joy and in token of thanksgiving) all the Temples in the City were set open, and solemn processions decreed for three days. Now when as the Embassadors of the Carthaginians and King Philip (for they also were arrived) required to have a day of audience in the Senat: the Dictator by direction from the Senat, returned them this answer, That the new Consuls should satisfy their request. After this, was the solemn assembly holden for the election of Magistrates: and Consuls were created Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Atilius Patrus: for Pretors, first M. Junius Pennus, who was allotted to have the civil jurisdiction in the City: then M. Valerius Edo, unto whom the Britian country fell by lot to govern: next, M. Fabius Buteo, whose hap was to rule Sardinia, and

* Elba,
* Mainomona,
* Pileum, Cannet, * Agostoderni.

and P. Atilius Tubulus, to be L. deputy of Sardinia. Concerning the Dumovices wherein the Carth and the Carth were to be employed, it was not thought good to determine any thing, before the Embassadors of King Philip and likewise of the Carthaginians, had delivered their embassages: for as they saw the end of one war, so they foresaw the beginning of another. Cn. Lutatius the Consul was inflamed with an ardent desire of the Province of Africk: for if he was considered, he wished an early victory: and if it were at the point of an end, he gaped at the honor of finishing the same, and hoped to have the name; That determined it was whilst he was Consul. And therefore he protested plainly, that he would suffer nothing to pass before that the Province of Africk were assigned to him. His colleague (a sober, temperate, and discreet man) gave his consent for he saw full well, that as the contending for that glory with Scipio, was unjust and unreasonable, whilst he would be overmatched, and never able to import and carry it away from him. Q. Mucius Scaevola then went about to compass that, which was commenced and assented in vain the year before by T. Clabellius the Consul. For when by warrant from the Senat a bill was proposed unto the people, wherein their pleasure was to nominate for government of Africk, all the 35 Tribes gave their voices and awarded that Province to P. Scipio. Much contention there passed sundry bickraments both in Senat-house and before the people, in the debating of this question: but in the end (they grew to this point, to refer all to the judgment of the Senat) with their oaths (for so it was agreed upon) thus concluded and gave this order. With their oaths, namely, which of them should have the rule of Italy and who the charge of a fleet of ships at sea. Item, to whether of them twain belie the navy, he should fall over into Sicily and if peace might not be fully concluded with the Carthaginians, then to cross over into Africk; where the Consul should war by Sea, and Scipio by Land, by virtue of the same commission and authority that he had already. Moreover, if the conditions of peace were accepted of both parties, then the Tribunes of the Commons should propound unto the people, as touching their will and pleasure, whether the Consul or P. Scipio should conclude the peace; and which of them (if these victorious army after conquest obtained) were to be brought back out of Africk should have the conduct thereof home again. Also, if they nominated Scipio for to make the peace, and bring away the army likewise, then the Consul should not cross over from Sicily to Africk: for the other Consul who had the government of Africk, he should receive of M. Fabius the Pretor, two legions. So P. Scipio had his commission fulfilled again for to remain in the Province of Sicily, with the same forces which he there had. M. Fulvius also the Pretor in the Brutian country was allowed those legions whereof C. Livius had the command the year before. It was further more agreed, that P. Atilius the Pretor should take the two legions in Sicily of Cn. Tremellius; and that one legion which P. Lentulus the Pretor had under his conduct, was appointed to M. Fabius of Sardinia. And M. Servilius the Consul of the former years continued also in his government with his own two legions for Hetruria. As concerning the provinces of Spain, L. Cornilius Lentulus and L. Manlius Acidinus had been there for certain years, the said Consul was to deal with the Tribunes, that if they thought it good, they should propound unto the Commons, for to know their minds whom they would appoint to govern Spain: and that he whosoever it was, should lead out of two armies enrol one entire legion of Roman soldiers, and of the allies of the Latination make up fifteen cohorts or regiments, and with the strength of them jointly, keep in obedience and defend the province. Item, that L. Cornilius and L. Manlius should bring over the old soldiers into Italy. Unto Cornelius the Consul was assigned a fleet of fifty ships, to be deducted and drawn out of two other Armadoes: the one of Cn. Octavius which was in Africk, the other of P. Villius which guarded the coasts of Sicily: and to choose thereunto what ships he would: and that P. Scipio should keep those fifty ships of war which he had already. And in case his pleasure was that Cn. Octavius should be Admiral over them still, like as heretofore: then Octavius was to continue in government for that year as Vice-pretor: but if he made Lentulus the Admiral, then Octavius should depart and come home to Rome, and bring back with him those ships that the Vice-consul had no use or need of. M. Fabius likewise had ten gallees of service allowed him into Sardinia. And the Consuls were appointed to muster and enrol two legions of citizens, that with the power of fourteen legions, and an hundred ships of war, the affairs of Rome that year might be managed.

These things thus ordered, they began to debate in counsel about the Embassadors of Philip and the Carthaginians: and thought good it was to admit the Macedonians into place for to have audience. Divers and sundry speeches they made, whilst they laboured partly to clear that point as touching the complaints that the Embassadors sent from Rome made before the King, for the foraging and spoiling of their confederates: and partly complained themselves of the allies of the people of Rome, laying much to their charge: but far more bitterly accusing M. Aemilius, for that he being one of the three Embassadors sent unto them, laid behind and took matters of soldiers' eyes, and against the covenant comprised in the league, made war upon them, and oftentimes gave battle unto their Captains and Governors in open field: partly also they determined, that the Macedonians and their Captain Sopater, who had served in the wars of Antioch for wages, and were taken prisoners and kept bound in prison, might be enlarged and set at liberty.

To

A To these points M. Furius, sent of purpose from Aurelius out of Macedonia, made answer briefly in this wise, That Aurelius who was left behind, for fear that the associates of the people of Rome, wearied with rodes and incursions into their territories and other injurious oppressions, might revolt unto the King: never departed out of the confines of the associates aforesaid, and endeavoured only, that those robbers and foragers of the country should not invade and over-run their lands, and go clear away without any harm. As for Sopater, he was a state and peer of the realm, and one nearly allied unto the King, who lately was sent into Africk with four thousand Macedonians and with money, to aid and assist Antioch and the Carthaginians. When as the Macedonians being required what they could say to their challenges, framed but a doubtful and intricate defence, before they had well made an end they received this for their answer: That since the King fought war, if he proceeded and went on still, he should shortly have his hands full but forasmuch as he had broken the league in two points, first in offering wrong to the allies of the people of Rome, and molesting them by way of war and hostility: and secondly, in helping their enemies with men and money, they deemed thus much of it, that not only P. Scipio both did & doth well and justly, in keeping them still in prison as enemies, who bare arms against the people of Rome, and were taken captive: but also M. Aemilius performed good service to the State, and a great pleasure to the Senat, in defending the Allies of the people of Rome by force of arms, when by right of league he could not. When the Macedonians had their dispatch, and were sent away with this heavy answer, then the Carthaginian Embassadors were called in.

When they beheld their reverent age, and the dignity of their personage (for they were the chief and principal men simply of their City) then every man was fully persuaded for his own part and said, That now they talked no longer, but meant in deed and good earnest to crave & have peace. But the chief and most portly person of them all was one Asdrubal, in his country and among his citizens (surnamed Hadur, a man that ever periwaded peace, & opposed himself against the Barchine faction. And therefore he had the more credit and authority, when he derived the blame from the Common-wealth, and laid all the fault upon the willfulness and greedy aversice of some few. Who after he had used diverse and sundry speeches, one while excusing and clearing the crimes, another while confessing some things objected, left it they had denied certain truths, they should with more difficulty have obtained pardon and peace: now and then also giving the LL. of the Senat an admonition and warning by the way, to use their property and good fortune modestly and with moderation; he added moreover and said, That if the Carthaginians would have been ruled by him & Hanno, and had been so wise as to have taken their time and the opportunity when it was, they should themselves have given those conditions of peace, which now they are constrained to crave. But for men to be fortunate and wise both at once is a rare and special gift, and seldom seen. And here it is that the people of Rome (quoth he) is invincible, because in prosperity they can remember to be wise, and to take the best way for themselves. And certainly, a wonder it were, if ever they should do otherwise. For those commonly who happen to meet with some new good success, and have not been used thereto before, overthrow and pass themselves too much in excessive joy, which they have not the grace to govern with sobriety and discretion: whereas the people of Rome have ever been accustomed to the continual felicity of joyous victories, inasmuch as they are grown into a distule of taking pleasure and delight in them (so common they are) and have encroached their dominion & Empire, more (in manner) by sparing and pardoning those whom they have conquered, than by the very conquest of them indeed.

The speech that the other Embassadors made, was more pitiful and lamentable, whilst they recounted before the Senat from what high estate, and to how base condition they were fallen: who but a while since held by force of arms, as it were the whole world, & had nothing left them now but the bare walls of the City of Carthage, within which they were shut up, and could see nothing either by land or sea, which they might rightfully claim as their own. Nay, the very City it self and their houses, they were to enjoy no longer than the people of Rome is willing, and forbear to proceed by rigour and extremity against the same, since there is nothing else behind to work upon. Now when as the LL. of the Senat seemed to incline to mercy and compassion one Senator there was amongst them (by report) who upon a deep and inveterate hatred of the Carthaginians (treachery, spake out aloud and said, What Gods will they regard and swear by in making of a new league, who have broken their oath, and taken their name in vain whom they called to witness in the former? Mary (quoth Asdrubal) even those and no other that are so sharp revengers and heavy enemies to the breakers of league and covenant. So when all their minds were inclined to peace, Cn. Lentulus the Consul, who had the government of the navy, opposed himself against the decree of the Senat for to cross the same. Then M. Atilius, and Q. Minucius, Tribunes of the Commons, preferred a solemn bill unto the people, in this form: Pleaseth it you, and will you grant, That the Senat shall resolve and determine, that peace may be concluded with the Carthaginians? Pleaseth it you to choose and appoint who shall be the man to make that peace, and who shall bring the army out of Africk? As concerning peace, the tribes every one as they were demanded their voices, granted affirmatively (His rogatus) that Scipio should conclude it, and also bring away the army. By virtue of this Act passed by the people, the Senat made a decree, that P. Scipio by the advice and counsel of ten Commissioners, should conclude an accord with the people of Carthage, under what conditions he thought good. After this

the Carthaginians rendered thanks to the LL. of the Senate, and requested that they might enter into the City, and talk with their fellow citizens and country-men, who had been taken captives a long time; and lay in the common gaol and prison. For there were amongst them some of their kinsfolk and friends, noblemen of birth and of good quality; others also, unto whom they were to deliver some message and credence from their kinsmen. When they had spoken and commended with them, they came with a new petition and made earnest suit, to give them leave to ransom and redeem as many of them as they would: whereupon they were willing to give them their names; and when they had named said upon two hundred an order was granted out of the Senat, that the Roman Commissioners should take over with them into Affrick unto Scipio two hundred of those captives whom the Carthaginians would make choice of; and declare unto him from the Senat, that in case the peace were fully agreed upon and finished, he should deliver those two hundred to the Carthaginians, freely without paying any ransom. Now when the heralds of arms were appointed to go into Affrick; for to confirm and establish the peace according to the solemn order, at their own request there passed an act of the Senat framed in this form and tenor. In primis, That they should carry with them every one by himself, certain flint stones of their own, and likewise Vervens. Item, That the Roman Pretors should command them solemnly to pronounce the league, and then they to ask of the Pretor sacred herbs or Vervens. A kind of grass or herb this is, which was wont to be gathered from off the Capitol hill, and given to the Heralds.

Thus were the Carthaginians dismissed and sent from Rome: who being come into Affrick to Scipio, concluded peace with the same capitulations as is above said. And so they delivered up their galleys and ships of war, their Elephants, the renegade traitors, the vagrant fugitives, and thousand prisoners. Among whom was Q. Terentius Cuncto, a Senator by his calling. As for the ships, so soon as they were lancht forth into the deep, Scipio caused them to be set on fire and burnt. Some report that they were five hundred in number, one with another, of every fort, and all directed and guided by oars. Presently were they set a burning: a dolorous sight and heavy spectacle (no doubt) to the Carthaginians for to behold, as if Carthage it self had been on a light fire. The renegade traitors and rebels were punished more grievously than the fugitives. As many of them as were of the Latin Nation lost their heads: all that were natural Romans, were crucified and roundly trussed up on the gallows. Forty years before was the peace last made with the Carthaginians, when Q. Lutatius and A. Manlius were Consuls. The war began three and twenty years after, while P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. And the same ended in the eighteenth year after, P. Cornelius, and P. Aelius Pater being Consuls. Many a time after, Scipio by report, would say, that the willful and covetous desire of T. Claudius first, and afterwards of Cn. Cornelius, was the only stay and let, that this war ended not with the final ruin and utter destruction of Carthage.

When as the Carthaginians, who by long and continual wars were grown bare & poor, thought the levy and contribution of money for to furnish out the first payment, lay heavy and sore upon them; inasmuch as in their Senat-house, there was great sorrow and heaviness, yea, and piteous weeping; it is said, that Annibal was seen to laugh a good while. And when A. Hannibal rebuked him for laughing in that public lamentation of the City, considering that himself was the cause of those tears. "If qd. Annibal," as we see by our eye the outward disposition of the face and countenance, so we could look within & behold the affection of the mind, ye might soon perceive, that this laughter of mine, which ye so much blame, proceedeth not from an heart that is glad and joyful; but rather senseless, stupidified, and attonied with the exceeding griefs and calamities that have happened. Yet is not it so unreasonable and impertinent to our present condition, as these tears of yours, and weeping that you make, is absurd and nothing to the purpose. Then should ye have wept and shed tears, when our armor and weapons were taken from us, when our ships were set on fire, when we were interdicted and forbidden to make war with foreign nations; for then had we our deadly blow, then our backs and hearts were broken. And never think that the Romans have proceeded hardly against you, in comparison of the hatred that ye N bare one to another. No great City and mighty State can long continue and rest in quiet. It have no enemies abroad, it findeth some at home: much like unto strong and lusty bodies, which seem to live enough against all outward accidents and causes of sickness, are overcharged with their own strength and fullness of humours, and thereby subject to most deadly maladies. So much, forsooth, and no more we feel of the publick miseries & common calamities, as toucheth and concerneth our selves in particular: wherein nothing pincheth us more, nor goeth nearer to the quick, than to forgo our money, and part with our pence. And therefore when Carthage was conquered and depoyled of all her ancient honors, when ye saw her disarmed and stripped naked, when ye saw her forlorn of all the armed nations of Affrick; no man then sighed, no man grieved thereat; but now when the tribute imposed, is to be paid out of your private purses, ye O keep a weeping and wailing, as in some publick funeral and mortuary carried forth. Buriall, I fear me greatly that ere it be long, ye shall find and feel, That your weeping this day hath been for the least loss of all the rest. Thus spake Annibal to the Carthaginians.

Scipio having assembled his whole army together, before them all, restored Masini to his father's Kingdom; and over and besides, ended him with the possession of the City Cirra, and other Towns and territories which belonged to the realm of Syfax; and were now in subjection to to this people of Rome. Nates Cn. Officiarius he gave order to conduct the fleet into Sicily and there to make it over to Cn. Cornelius the Consul. The Carthaginian Embassadors he would forgo to Rome; that those acts and capitulations which were concluded by him with the advice of the Roman Commissioners, might likewise pass under the approbation of the Senat, and the consent of the people; and to be ratified and confirmed for ever.

Thus Scipio having obtained peace both by sea and land, and embarked his army, sailed toward Sicily; so arrived at Lilybæum. From whence he sent away a great part of his army by sea; and himself passed by land through Sicily, which now was joyfully as well for the peace concluded, as the victory achieved. Where all the way as he went, not only the people came forth in multitudes out of the Cities to do him honour, but numbers also of the country peasants out of the Villages, filled all the high-ways along until he came to Rome: where he entered the City, riding in the most stately and magnificent triumph that ever had been. He brought into the City Chamber 100033 pound weight of silver; he divided among his soldiers out of the spoil four hundred Attas a peece. Syfax by his death rather disappointed the people of a goodly shew and pageant in the triumph than diminished any whit the glory of the triumph: he died at Tybur not long afore, to which place he had been removed from Alba; howbeit his death was not obscure, by reason that he was solemnly carried to his buriall, with the pomp of a publick funeral at the charges of the City. But Polihius a writer of good account, reporteth, That this King was led in the very triumph, As Scipio rode triumphant. Q. Terentius Cuncto followed after with a cap of liberty set upon his head, and ever after so long as he lived, he honoured him (as becoming it was) and acknowledged him the author of his freedom. But as concerning his surname Africanus, I cannot for certain learn, whether it were the favour of his soldiers first, or the affectionate love of the people afterwards that brought it up, or rather began upon some of his own house and lineage that counted and flattered him therewith: like as in our fathers daies Sulla was surnamed  Felix*, and Pompeius,  Magnus*. This is certain that he was the first General that ever took his name of the country and nation by himself subdued, and thereby was renowned. But by his example afterwards, others nothing comparable to him in victory and conquest won goodly titles and glorious inscriptions to their Images, and honoured their houses with noble titles and additions.

The one and thirtieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the one and thirtieth Book.

The causes of the war begun again with Philip King of Macedony, which had discontinued, are set down to be these: In the time of the holy feast of Ceres, two young men of Acarnania, who had not been professed in these sacred mysteries, came to Athens; & chanced among other of their countrymen to go into the Chappel of Ceres. For which, as if they had committed some heinous fault in the highest degree, they were by the Athenians executed. The Acarnanians moved with indignation for the death of their neighbours, required aid of Philip to be revenged for them: Some few months after peace granted to the Carthaginians, in the five hundred and fifty year from the foundation of the City of Rome, when the Embassadors of the Athenians, who now were besieged by Philip, craved aid of the Senat, and that they be assisted and resolved to help them, notwithstanding the Common gain and loss (by reason that they thought the continual troubles of so many wars were grievous and heavy unto them) yet so far prevailed the authority of the Nobles, that the people also gave their consent to succour their confederate City. This war was committed to the managing of P. Sulpitius the Consul: who led an army into Macedony, and fought certain battels fortunately against Philip, which were performed by horse-service. The Athenians being invested and beleaguered round about by Philip, following the example of the Sagaritians, slew their wives and children, and their own selves after them. L. Furius the Prator overthrew in a pitch field the Gauls, called Insubres, that rebelled, and likewise Amilcar the Carthaginian, who began to make war in those parts, where Amilcar was slain, & with him five and thirty thousand men. Moreover, this book containeth the expeditions and voyages of King Philip and Sulpitius the Consul. And the winning of certain Cities by them both, Sulpitius the Consul warred with the help of King Attalus and the Rhodiens, L. Furius the Prator triumphed over the Gauls.

Full well apaid am I likewise, that I am now come to an end once of the Punick war, as if myself had been in person there, and born my part in the toil and danger thereof. For albeit nothing it is forme, who have undertaken and professed to boldly to write a compleat and full story of the Romans, to be wearied in the several parts of so great a work: yet when I think think and consider; how three score years, and three (for so many are reckoned from the first Punic war, to the end of the second) have taken up no fewer books, of mine than four hundred eighty eight years before, even from the foundation of Rome, unto the Consulship of this Appian Claudius, who was the first that was made upon the Carthaginians; and that of force already, that like as they who being once entered into the Gallies, both the sea, are trained on hill, and venture to wade into the sea, even so, the stronger I go forward, the deeper I step, and am carried away in a vast Ocean, and horrible gulph, (as it were) which cannot be founded; and that my work groweth still upon me in my hands, which I have sent away apace, and said matters as the first, I might have thought by this time should have decreed.

The Carthaginian peace was no longer required, but the Macedonian war straightway ensued: nothing comparable to the Punic, it required the hazard and danger, the same state Captains for direction, or prowess of the soldiers; but if a man consider the Nobility and reputation of the ancient Kings, the fame and antiquity of the nation, the greatness of their territory and dominion, who in times past had conquered and held by the sword much of Asiatic, and the better part of Africa, I dare well say, as noble and renowned, if not more, but the war commenced against Philip ten years almost before, had ere three years end been laid down and discontinued by treaty of the Ætolians: who as they gave occasion to enter into arms, so they wrought a composition of peace. But afterwards in process of time, when the Romans by reason of peace with the Carthaginians, had nothing to do, and were at leisure; and yet bearing an inward grudge, and having a displeasure to Philip, as well for his faithless peace with the Ætolians and other allies and confederates of that country, as also for aid both of men and money lately sent into Affrick to Antibal and the Carthaginians; behold, the Athenians, whose territories he had clean wasted and spoiled, and whom he had driven within their City walls, impudently then with their prayers and persuasions them to take arms and renew the war afore said. And much about the same time that arrived Embassadors from King Antalus also from the Pæthodians, giving notice that divers Cities and States of Asia were solicited likewise by Philip to band against the Romans; These Embassadors had their dispatch, and received this answer, That the Senate would have a careful eye to the affairs of Asia. But the entire treaty and consultation concerning the Macedonian war was wholly referred and referred unto the Consuls, who then were employed in the war with the Boii. In the mean season three Embassadors were addressed unto Ptolemy the King of Egypt, to wit, C. Claudius Nero, M. Aemilius Lepidus, and P. Semprenius Tuditanus, with this commission: First, to signify and let him understand, that Antibal & the Carthaginians were subdued; secondly, to give thanks unto the King for continuing so fast and faithful unto the Romans in this difficult and adversity, when other of their allies, and even their next neighbours forsook and abandoned them: last of all, to request him, that in case they should be forced by wrongs and injuries offered, to wage war against Philip, he would vouchsafe the same mind full and his wonted affectionate favour toward the people of Rome.

Near about this time, P. Ælius the Consul being in France, advertised that the Boians because his coming had made rodes into the lands of the friends and allies of the Romans, presently he had levied and enrolled two legions upon the rumour of this tumult, and trouble: and joining therunto four cohorts of footmen out of his own army, sent C. Appian Colonel or Captain of the Confederates, with this power to suddenly raised, and with commandment to march through that part of Umbria, which is called the Tribe Sappina, and to invade the territories of the Boii, whilst himself in person led his forces the open way traversing through the mountains, and came thither. Appian being entered into the confines of the enemies, at the first had a good hand, and sped well in foraging the country with safety of himself. But afterwards, having made choice of a meet place near unto a Castle called * Mutulum, for to cut down and reap the corn; (for so the fields were ready for harvest) but yet, without spies sent out to discover the coasts about, without setting strong and sufficient guards, which being well appointed and armed, might defend the unarmed that were busy in their harvest work; he chanced himself and all his forragers and reapers to be surprised at unawares by the Frenchmen, and assailed on every side. Whereupon they also that were armed fled in great fright; and 7000 men straggling here and there over the corn fields, were slain; and among them C. Appian himself their leader. The rest for fear were driven to put themselves within their Camp: from whence without direction and guidance of any certain Captain and only upon a general consent of the souldiers, the next night following they abandoned their hold, left much of their baggage behind them, and through blind forests, chafes, and wild mountains (in manner unpassable) they came in the end to the Consul: who, after he had performed in his Province no memorable act, save only that he wasted the borders and frontiers of the Boii, and made league with the Ingauni (a nation of the Ligurians) returned to Rome. So soon as he had assembled the Senat, all the whole house with one voice called upon him to treat and consult upon no other matter before they had determined of King Philip; and the complaints made by their allies: so he proposed that out of hand to be debated in Council. And the Senat in a frequent number there met, passed a decree, that P. Ælius the Consul should send whom he thought good with commission and authority for to receive the Armies, which Cn. Octavius was to bring out of Sicily, and therewith to cross over into Massania. So M. Valerius Levinus the Vice-Prætor, was sent: and when he had taken the charge of the fleet, com-

A City of eight and thirty fall, at the hands of Cn. Octavius about Pico, he passed the seas to Messina. Now when M. Aemilius the Lieutenant was come, and had informed and advertised him, what hostile armies, what numbers of ships the King had prepared and gotten together; how partly himself in person by going about not only to all the Cities of the Confederates, but also the Islands in the sea; and partly by sending his Embassadors every way, had solicited unto war; and raised much people to take arms: shewing moreover, that the Romans were not to enter into that war without preparation of greater forces; and that more speedily, for fear lest if they made slow haste and lingered, Philip might enterprise that adventure which Pyrrhus (a Potentate and Prince of a far lesser Dominion) had done before: it was thought meet, that Aemilius should dispatch his letters to the same effect unto the Consuls and the Senat.

In the end of this year, when a motion was propounded in the Senat-house as concerning the taking out of lands unto the old souldiers for recompence of their good service; who, under the conduct and fortunate government of Scipio the Pro-Consul, had brought the war in Affrick to the end, the Senat enacted a decree, that M. Junius the Prætor of the City, if he thought it good, should create ten Decemvirs as surveyors, for to measure out and divide among them the lands in Samnium and Apulia, so much as had been forfeit and confiscated to the people of Rome. And these were they; namely, P. Servilius, Q. Cæcilius, Mecellus, Cneus and Marcus, named Servili, and both named Gentili, Lucius and Aulus, both Hofitii, and furnished Cato likewise, P. Villius Tappulus, P. Fabius Flaccus, P. Ælius Pæmus, and Q. Flaminius.

At the same time P. Ælius the Consul, called the assembly and high Court of Parliament for election of Prætor Officers: and for Col, were created P. Sulpicius Galba, and C. Aurelius Cotta. After them were the Prætors chosen to wit, Q. Minucius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Fabius Gillo, and C. Servilius Pulcher. The Roman stage-plays were that year exhibited with great state and magnificence, and especially by L. Valerius Flaccus, and T. Quinctius Flamininus, Ædiles of the Choir, and for whose great games were represented new. These Ædiles distributed and divided most faithfully among the people a mighty deal of corn, which Scipio the Pro-Consul had lent out of Affrick, at four Ales the Modius: whereby they won great love and favour of all men. Also the Plebeian Games were thrice let forth all whole again by the Ædiles of the Commons, L. Appian Enlio, and Q. Minucius Rufus. This man from his Ædileship stepped to the Prætor place. And by occasion of those plays there was a solemn feast celebrated in the harbour of Jupiter.

In the 124 year from the foundation of the City, which P. Sulpicius Galba, and C. Aurelius were Col the war with King Philip began, within four months after peace granted to the Carthaginians. And before all other matters this affair was propounded in the Senate by P. Sulpicius the Col, upon the Ides of March, the very day on which at that time they used to enter upon the Consulship. Where by the Senat it was decreed, Imprimis, That the Consuls should sacrifice with greater beasts to what gods themselves thought good, with a solemn prayer in this form: That what soever the Senate and people of Rome minded and intended to do, either concerning the affairs of the Common-wealth, or the undertaking and enterprise of this new war, the same might speed well and happily in the end, to the behoof of the people of Rome, their allies, and especially the nation of the Latines. Item, That after sacrifice and divine prayer they should confer with the Senat about the estate of the City, and the government of the Provinces. At the same time it fell out very fitly to provoke and stir up their minds unto war, that shortly letters were brought from M. Aemilius the Lieutenant, and from M. Valerius Levinus the Vice-Prætor: by also a new Embasie of the Athenians arrived; the one importing, and the other reporting, that the King drew near and approached their confines; and within a while would be not only Lord of their lands and territories, but also Master of their City, unless the Romans let too their sleeping hand. After that the Consuls had openly pronounced and declared, that the sacrifices were performed rightly and according to order, and that the Gods gave ear unto their prayers, and accepted thereof: and the four souldiers and bowmen likewise out of their learning, made answer and shewed, that the inward of the beasts were as they should be, and signified happiness; namely, the enlarging of their confines and borders, with the achieving of victory and triumph. Then were the letters above said of Valerius and Aemilius read, and the Athenian Embassadors had a day of audience. After this, there passed an Act of the Senat. That thanks should be rendered unto their allies, for that they being long tempted and solicited for to revolt, yet notwithstanding had not failed in their allegiance, nor forsaken their fealty, no, nor forsworn; when the Consuls had their Provinces allotted unto them; and when the Consul whose favour it should be fit to go into Macedony, had proposed unto the people, That Antibal should be given to Philip King of Macedony, and open war proclaimed against him. Now it fell out unto P. Sulpicius to take that charge in Macedony, who preferred and presented a bill unto the people in this manner: Pleaseth it you, and is it your will, that war be proclaimed and denouncing against King Philip and the Macedonians within his Realm and Dominion for the wrongs offered and the war levied by them upon the friends and allies of the people of Rome? Unto the other Consul Aemilius befall the Province of Italy. Then upon this the Prætors cast lots for their Provinces, Cn. Servilius Pulcher had the jurisdiction of the City, Q. Fabius Gillo was to govern the Province of Sicily, Q. Minucius Rufus of the Brittish, and L. Furius Purpureo of France.

The Oration
of P. Sulpicius to the people of Rome.

The foresaid bill as concerning the Macedonian war, in the first Parliament assembled about it, was in manner by all the centuries in the formost scrutinies nipped & staled denied. Which thing, partly men of themselves were forward enough to do, as being over-wearied with long and sore wars, and worn out for very intricaments of tedious travel, and painful perils: and partly Q. Fabius a Tribune of the Commons, failed not to set them on: who taking the old course and way of blaming and accusing the nobles, had laid to their charge, that they fowed the seeds of war till, and ceased not to raise war upon war, to the end, that the commons might never be at rest, and enjoy the repose of peace. The LL. of the Senat took this to the heart, in such fort, that the Tribune was shaken up and much reviled in the Senat-house with most opprobrious and reproachfull terms: and every man did his part to encourage the Consul to publish a new assembly and scrutiny, for the proposing of the same bill: to challenge and rebuke the sloath and idleness of the people: yea, I and to open and shew unto them what great damage and loss, how much shame and dishonour they should incur by these delays before the war began. Then the Consul having assembled the people for this purpose in Mars field, before that he cited the Centuries to give their voices, called them all together and made a speech unto them in this wise: "It seemeth (quoth he) that you are ignorant, my Masters and Citizens of Rome, that the matter put to question is not, whether ye would have war or peace, (for Philip will not permit that to be at your disposition and pleasure, who already prepareth mortal war both by sea and land) but whether ye would rather choose to transport the legions into Macedony, or receive your enemy here within Italy. And what difference there is between the one and the other, you have had sufficient proof and experience (if ever at any time before even in this last war, especially with the Carthaginians. For who is he that maketh doubt, but if we had with speed relieved the Saguntins besieged, who fled unto us for help, and earnestly craved for our protection, like as our ancestors and progenitors in due time assisted the Mamertians; we should have turned the whole violence and force of the war into Spain, which by our long driving off & lingering delays we entertained in Italy, to our great loss and grievous calamity. Neither need we to doubt of this, but that we have hitherto lost Philip in Macedony, (who without question had combined with Annibal by means of letters and entreaties of Embassadors, for to have passed over into Italy before this time) only by sending of Lavinus with a fleet, to begin with him at home, and to make war in his own kingdom. Deter we then to do that now, when Annibal is chased out of Italy and the Carthaginians are defeated; which then we did, when we had the same Annibal our enemy within Italy? Go! we on still and suffer the King by winning the City of Athens (like as we permitted Annibal by forcing of Saguntum) to try and see our slackness and cowardise: we shall have him i westra you arrived in Italy, not at five months end, as Annibal was after his departure from Saguntum; but within five daies, after he is dislodged once & under sail from Corinth. See can ye will not compare Philip with Annibal, no, nor the Macedonians with the Carthaginians; yet I am sure ye will make them matches, and equal with King Pyrhus: so far forth I say, as one man excelleth another in valour, and one nation surpasseth another in power. Epirus hath never been accounted, nor is at this day, but the smallest appendant to the kingdom of Macedony, and of least importance. But as for Philip, the whole and entire signory of Peloponnesus is under him, and Lord he is of Argos it self a City nobled as well by the death of Pyrhus, as the ancient name and renown that goeth off it. Compare now again the times of our state. How much flourished Italy in those daies more than now? Our affairs were then much more found and unfoiled: our Captains safe, our armies all, so many as they were, untainted; whom the Carthaginian wars afterwards consumed: yet as puissant and great as we were, Pyrhus assailed us, he put us to trouble and sorrow enough, yea, and came in train of victory to shake our free hold, even well-near to the City of Rome. So as not only the Tarentines, and all that tract of Italy, which they call the greater Greece, banded with him in such sort, as a man would have thought they had followed the very language and those of their name; but the Lucans also and the Brutians, yea, and the Samnites revolted from us, and rebelled. And are ye of believe that these will be quiet and remain in loyalty and obedience? Philip once were passed over into Italy? yes many will they, there is no question: for they stood fast afterwards, and continued true in the Punic war. Nay, never make reckoning that these States will not revolt from us so long as they know any on unto whom they may turn and range themselves. If ye had thought much of it, and been loath to pass over into Affrick in truth at this day ye should have had Annibal and the Carthaginians your enemies (still in Italy. Let Macedony therefore be the seat of war rather than Italy: let our enemies Cities and lands be destroyed with fire and sword. We have found well by good experience, that our fortune is better, and our forces more puissant abroad in forrain parts, than at home in our own Country. Go to therefore in the name of God to the scrutiny and give your voices; and those things that the LL. of the Senat have devised to do, grant ye the same, and yield your assent. Ye have not only the Consul, author of this advice and counsel, but also the immortal gods (who as I offered sacrifice and prayed devoutly unto them, that this war might redound to the good and benefit of my self, of the Senat, of you, of our allies, of the Latine nation, and finally of our armies and armados) have vouchsafed me all the signs and tokens of comfort and joy, and assured me that all shall be well and according to our hearts desire. This Oration of his once ended, they went presently to deliver up their voices, and gave affirmatively for the war, & suffered it to pass according, as he had propounded. Then by an order from the Senat, there was a solemn supplication

A for three daies proclaimed: and in all Churches and Chappels, and before every shrine & altar the gods were prayed unto, that the war (which the people had allowed of) against K. Philip might be well achieved, and have an happy end. Moreover, the Consul Sulpicius conferred with the heralds, and asked their advice. Whether they would ordain, that the war to be denounced against King Philip should be intimated to himself in person: or though it sufficient to be proclaimed within the confines of his dominion, at the next frontier town of all, where he kept a garrison and guard: they pronounced again, That it mattered not, but the Consul should please himself, and do full well in the one and the other. Then the Consul was permitted by the LL. of the Senat to chuse whom he would, so he were not a Senator, for to send as a messenger or pursuivant of arms, to give the King defiance, and to publish war. After this it was debated in Council, how the armies should be disposed as well of Consuls as Prators. The Consuls were commanded to enroll two legions, and to discharge and call the old armies. Sulpicius, who by a decree was to manage this new war of so great name and consequence, was allowed to take with him out of that army which Scipio the Vice-Consul had brought out of Affrick as many voluntaries as he could procure: but in no case to urge any old soldier against his will. Albeit it was decreed, that the Consul should allow unto the Prators L. Furius Purpureo, and Quintus Minutius Rufus 5000 men apiece of the associates of the Latine nation: whom they should employ, the one in the Province of Gallia, and the other in the Brutians country to defend those parts and keep them in obedience. Q. Fulvius Gelo was himself likewise commanded to chuse out of that army which P. Aelius the Consul commanded, as many as had served fewest years, until he made up the number of 5000 all of the allies & Latines; which should be a garrison to keep in order and safety the Province of Sicily. M. Valerius Falto, Prator the year before, and L. deputy of the Province of Campany, had his Commission signed anew, to continue for the term of one year longer, and as Vice-Prator to pass over into Sardinia, with direction to chuse out of the army there 5000 of the allies and Latines, such as had served least time. And the Consuls were commanded to take up two legions of Citizens, which might be sent to any place, as need should require, considering that many nations in Italy tainted and infected with the fellowship and company of the Carthaginians during the wars and ever since, were swelled with anger and despite against the Romans. Thus the Common-wealth for that year was to the employment of six Roman Legions.

Amidst these preparations for war, there arrived Embassadors from K. Ptolemy, giving intelligence, that the Athenians had craved aid of their King and Master, against Philip. And although they were confederate as well with him as the Romans, yet the King would send into Greece neither a fleet of ships, nor an army of men, defensive, or offensive to any, but by authority and consent of the people of Rome. In case therefore the Romans were resolved, and sufficient withall of themselves to defend their allies, he would be willing to sit still and take his repose at home. Otherwise, if the Romans were rather disposed to rest and take their ease, he would himself be well content to send such forces to the aid of the Athenians, as should defend them easily against all the power of Philip. The Senat returned great thanks unto the King, with this answer, That the people of Rome were purposed to protect their own allies: but if during this war they stood in need upon any occurrence that might happen, they would give knowledge thereof to the King: as being assured and making full account, that all the puissance and wealth of his kingdom was a sure prop and trusty pillar of their State and Common-wealth. This done, by order from the Senat the Embassadors had given them for a reward five thousand Askes apiece. Now whilst the Consuls were busy in taking musters, and providing all things meet for the war, the City very devout and given much to religion, in the beginnings especially of all new wars, after they had performed their supplications aforesaid, and done their devotions at every altar and shrine: because nothing might be for-let and left out, that at any time heretofore had been done; ordained that the Consuls, unto whom the Province of Macedony fell, should vow solemnly to exhibit to the honour of Jupiter, the great games and plaies, and a rich present beside. But Licinius the High Priest staid this publicke vow for the time that it went not forward, alleging that it was not lawful to make a vow of an uncertain sum of money not determined: & if such money might not serve for the use of war, it ought presently to be let by and laid up safe, and not be mingled and shuffled with other monies: and unless that were duly done, the vow could not be paid and performed according to the order of holy rites, Albeit the thing it self and the person of the man that moved this scruple, troubled and troubled them much, yet they would needs that the Consul should propound the matter to the college of the Priests and Bishops, to know their resolution, whether a vow might not directly be made of an uncertain peece of money. The Bishops set down their opinion and judgement, that it might be well enough, yea, and better than otherwise. Whereupon the Consul pronounced the vow, according to the very same form of words (as the High Priest entided and spake before him) which aforesaid they were wont to use, in making the quinquennial vows from five years to five: save only thus much, that he vowed and promised to represent the plaies, and to present oblations unto Jupiter, amounting to such a sum of money, as the Senat should set down when the vow was to be performed. So many times before had the great games been vowed, and a determinate sum of money ever assigned: but these were the first that were not limited within any certain flint and compass.

Now when all mens minds were wholly bent upon the Macedonian war, behold on a sudden, when they feared nothing less than such a thing, there arose a rumour of French troubles and tumults.

cumulus for the Insulars, the Cenomans and Boii, having solicited and raised up by way of infection the Sallii, the Ilvations, and other States of Liguria, under the conduct of Amilcar the Carthaginian, who in those parts laid behind with the remnant of Asdrubal his army, were seized of Placentia; and after they had sacked the City, and for very spiteous anger burnt a great part of it, leaving hardly two thousand persons of all sorts, which amidst the fire and ruins thereof, chanced to save themselves, crossed the river Po, and advanced forward to the spoil and pillage of Cremona. But the inhabitants of that Colony, having heard of the military and calamity befall upon their neighbour-City, had some respite and time to shut their gates, and to bestow their guards upon the walls: so as, they should at least live be besieged or ever they were forced, and might be able to dispatch messengers unto the people of Rome, L. Furius Purpureo was governor of that Province for the time; who having by order from the Senat dispatched all the rest of the army but only five thousand allies and those Latins, abode with that power in the next country to that Province, about Ariminum. He then addressed his letters unto the Senat, signifying in how bad terms the province stood, namely, that of those two Colonies, which all the time of the Punick war had escaped those great storms and tempests of troubles, the one was won by the enemies and put to the laccage, the other now besieged, and at hand to be lost: neither would his forces be sufficient and able to help the distressed Cremonians, unless he should willingly cast away five thousand allies, and expose them as a prey unto forty thousand of the enemies (for so many they were strong to have their throats cut, and to be hewn in pieces: and by great loss and overthrow of his to give more heart and courage to the enemies, who are now in their ruin, and pushed up with pride for the ruin of one Roman Colony already). Upon the reading of these letters, there went forth a decree from the LL. of the Senat, that C. Aurelius the Consul should send out precepts for the army to be ready at Ariminum that very day, on which he appointed them to the Rendezvous in Hetruria; and that either himself in his own person, if it might stand with the good of the State, would go with a power to suppress these French commotions, or else write to L. Furius the Prator, that when the Roman Legions presented themselves unto him out of Hetruria, he should send in their lead his own five thousand allies for the guard of Hetruria in the mean time, and make a journey himself in person to raise the siege before Cremona, and to set the Colony free that now was beleaguered. They thought good besides to dispatch Embassadors into Affrick, who should go to Carthage; and afterwards to Masaniissa in Numidia, to Carthage, for to intimate unto them, That Amilcar, a Citizen of theirs, left behind in France, (and whether he were of the army of Asdrubal before or afterwards of Mago they knew not for certain) waged war there against the covenants in the League contained: that he had assembled certain forces of French and Ligurians, to enter into arms against the people of Rome; and therefore, if they had any love to entertain peace, they should call him home, and deliver him to the people of Rome. Over and besides they had in commission to give them to understand, that delivery was not yet made of all the runagate rebels, but many of them, by report, were retired to Carthage, and there went up and down, and conversed openly: which persons were, after diligent search made, to be attached and apprehended, that they might, according to the tenor of the accord, be sent home again, and delivered into the hands of the Romans. And thus much concerning their message to the Carthaginians. Now they had in charge besides to congratulate with Masaniissa, and to declare what joy they took in his behalf, namely, for that he had not only recovered the inheritance of his fathers kingdom, but also enlarged his dominion, by conquest of the most flourishing part of the Realm of Syphax. Moreover, commanded they were to signify unto him, that they had undertaken to war upon King Philip because he had befriended and aided the Carthaginians; and by offering and doing wrong to the friends of the people of Rome, even at what time as all Italy was full of troubles and wars, enforced and put them to it, so to send their armies and their armados into Greece, and so by disembarring and dividing their forces into sundry places, was the principal cause that they were so late ere they passed over into Affrick: requesting him for the maintenance of this war, to send over certain aids of Numidian horsemen. These Orators had great gifts and honourable presents given them for to carry unto the King, to wit, divers pieces of purple border'd with gold and silver, a purple robe of State, with a rich cassock or coat wrought in palm-tree work, with a royal Scepter of Ivory, also a robe embroydered before with purple, with an Ivory chair of state. Last of all, they are willed to make promise unto the King, that if he could think upon any thing needfull and expedient either to establish his kingdom, or to advance his royal estate, the people of Rome would endeavour respectively for his good demerits to compass the same to the utmost of their power.

There arrived also about that time Embassadors from Vermina the son of Syphax, and presented themselves unto the Senat, excusing the error, and pretending the youth of the Prince, clearing him of all fault, and laying the whole blame upon the fraud and treachery of the Carthaginians, promising for their King and Master in this wise, That like as Masaniissa of a professed enemy was become a friend to the Romans, even so would Vermina do his best, and gain himself, that in all offices of friendship toward the people of Rome, neither Masaniissa, nor any other should surpass and go beyond him; and making petition in his name, that the Senat would vouchsafe to give him the titles of King of Ally, and Friend unto the Romans. These Orators had this for their answer, That not only Syphax, his father before him, of a confederate friend, suddenly without any cause at all proved an enemy to the people of Rome; but also himself had practised already in his

A young years, and laid the first ground of his warfare in annoying and troubling the Romans by war; and therefore he was to seek pardon and crave peace at their hands, before he might be invested by them with the terms of King of Ally, and Friend for the honour of that title the people of Rome were wont to vouchsafe to none, but those Kings only who had deserved singularly well of them. Many there should be certain Roman Legats in Affrick, unto whom the Senat would give order to minister and tender unto Vermina certain conditions of peace, according to a large and absolute commission that they had from the people of Rome. To do what they thought good. And in case the King misliked ought in those capitulations, and were desirous to have any article added, put out, or altered, he must recour again to the Senat, and demand the time. So there were Legats or Commissioners sent into Affrick with such a Commission above said, namely, C. Terentius Varro, Sp. Lucretius, and Cn. Octavius, and each of them had a gallee directed with five rows of oars.

After this were the letters read of Q. Minutius Prator in the Province of the Bruttii, importing thus much, That the consecrated money of Proserpina at Locri was by night stolen out of her treasury: but to say who should do the deed, they had no presumptions to give light and lead them directly. The Senat took the matter in very ill part, and grieved exceedingly. That sacrilegious men fell still to Church-robbing, and would not give over: and that the late and fresh example of Pleminius (so notorious as well for the heinous fact as the fearful punishment) was not able to terrify them and give them warning. So C. Aurelius the Col. was enjoined to write unto the Prator into the Bruttians country to this effect: That it was the Senats pleasure, that due enquiry and examination should be had of the Treasury thus robbed, after the same precedent and course that M. Pomponius the Prator took three years before. And look what money could be found, it should be laid up duly in the place; and what was not forth-coming, it should be supplied and made good again. Also (if he thought meet) that there should be certain purgatory sacrifices, according as the Bishops before ordained in the like case, for the expiation and satisfaction of the violating and defiling of the Temple. Moreover, there chanced about the same time divers prodigious tokens from many places to be reported. In the Lucans country the rumor and voice went, that the welkin was on fire; and at Privernum, while the sky was bright and fair, the sun appeared red all day long. At Lanuvium, in the Temple of Juno Sospita, there was heard in the night-season a mighty great noise, Nay, and more than this, in sundry places (as men say) were many monstrous and strange births seen. In the Sabins country one child was born, and no man knew what to make of it, male or female: and another likewise was found of sixteen years of age, a very Hermaphrodite of doubtfull sex between both. At Frisino there was a lamb yearly with a swines head: and at Sinussa a sow farrowed a pig with the head of a man. In the Lucans country there was spoken upon the common ground a colt with five feet. All these monsters were ugly to see and abominable, and holden for great defects and errors of nature working strangely out of kind. But above all others, those births both male and female, (or rather neither) were most abhorred and detested, and order was given presently, that they should be cast into the sea: even as of late daies when C. Claudius and M. Livius were Consuls the like deformed monster was thither had away and drowned. Nevertheless the Decemvirs were commanded to turn over and peruse the books of Sibylla, to know what such prodigious monsters might portend: who by their learning and out of those books, gave direction to make the same sacrifices which last of all for the like uncouth sights were made. Moreover, they gave commandment, that certain hymns and songs should be chanted throughout the City by three several quires, of nine virgins in every one; and an oblation to be offered by them with all devotion to queen Juno. C. Aurelius the Consul carried all this to be performed according to the order and direction of the Decemvirs.

And as in our fathers daies Livius composed the ditty of the hymn, so at that time P. Licinius Tegulatus made and set down a form of song which they could sing. Thus when all things were expiated, and satisfaction made accordingly for the appealing of the wrath of the gods, (for even at Locri also the sacrilege was found out by Q. Minutius, and the money missing was raised out of the goods of the offenders and guilty persons, and bestowed there again in the treasury) as the Consuls were minded to take their journey into their Provinces, there repaired many private Citizens unto the Senat, unto whom the third payment was due that year for the loan of money, which in the time of M. Valerius and M. Claudius Consuls they had lent out and disbursed, because that the Consuls had made them answer, That the stock of the City Chamber was hardly able to defray the charges of a new war, which required maintenance of a mighty Navy and of passable armies, and therefore flatly denied them, and said, That they had not wherewith to satisfy and make present payment. The Senat could not endure that they should have this occasion to make complaint: considering, that if the Common-wealth would still employ the money upon the Macedonian war also, which was granted in loan for the Punick war,

G this would be the end of it, that (one war following thus in the neck of another) their own money which was lent upon a curse and benevolence out of their private purses, should be little better than confiscate for some forfeiture, and fall to the Exchequer and common Chest of the City. These private persons demanding nothing but reason and right, and the City withall not able to discharge her debt, the Lords set down a middle and indifferent course between honesty and profit: and that was this: That so far much as many of these men said, that the City had much land upon sale, and they were to buy and make purchase, therefore the common grounds grounds lying and being within fifty miles of Rome every way, should be granted unto them in fee farm, and the Consuls to set down an estimate of their value and worth, and charge them with a chief rent or tribute of three farthings an acre by the year, to testify only that they were the Cities lands: to the end that if any man hereafter (when the City should be abroad and in case to repay the former debt) were desirous to have money rather than land, he should restore the lands and possessions again into the Cities hands and receive his money. These private Citizens (who were the foreaid creditors) accepted gladly of this offer and condition. And hereupon this land was called by the name of Trientia and Tribunia, because it was let out and granted in lieu of a third part of the lone money. Then P. Sulpicius after he had pronounced his vows above said in the Capitoll, and departed out of the City in his coat of arms, with the Licitors and Uthfers afore him, arrived at Brundisium: and so with the old voluntary souldiers drawn out of the army that was returned from Africa, (whom he had enrolled into legions) and ships choen out of the fleet of Cornelius the Consul: he loosed from Brundisium, and the next day after landed in Macedonia: where attended him the Embassadors of the Athenians: who humbly besought him to deliver them from the siege that invested their City. So C. C. C. C. was incontinently sent to Athens, furnished with twenty long ships of war, and a strength of men for the King himself in person besieged not Athens, but even then made her assault upon the town Abydos, as having already given proof of his forces in sea-fight, both with the Rhodians and King Attalus, and in neither battell had good success. But besides the ordinary rounesse and pride engrained in him by nature, he was aloft now and looked high, by reason of the alliance made between him and Antiochus King of Syria, with whom he had parted the riches and Realm of Egypt, unto which they both aspired, upon the news they heard of the death of Ptolemy. Now the Athenians had drawn upon themselves the war against King Philip, upon a small occasion and of no importance: who of all their ancient estate and glory, retain nothing else but great heart and haughty spirit. It fortuned that two young men of Acarnania, who had taken no orders and were not consecrate, entered among the other multitude into the Temple of Ceres, in the time of the feastival daies, and celebration of sacrifices to that goddess belonging: and being altogether ignorant in the custome of that solemnity and religion, and asking some foolish absurd questions, nothing fit for that time or place, were soon bewrayed by their speech and language: who being convened before the Prelates of the said Temple, notwithstanding it was evidently proved and known, that upon an error only & oversight, and not for any ill intent they were come into the Church, yet were they put to death as fellows, and guilty of some hainous fact in the highest degree. The people of Acarnania complained unto King Philip, and informed him of this villainous part and hostile act by them committed: and obtained a grant from him, that they might be permitted with the aid of the Macedonians, to make war upon the Athenians. This army at first invaded the territories of Athens, and with fire and sword made waste & havock of all, and so with a rich booty of all sorts returned unto Acarnania. These were the first quarrels on both sides, that stirred coals and kindled fire between them. Afterwards was defiance given, and open war proclaimed, by the general decrees of both States. For when King Attalus and the Rhodians pursued after Philip, as he retired into Macedony, and were come as far as Egina, then the said King passed over to Pyrraeus, for to renew and confirm the league with the Athenians. Against his coming the whole City went forth with their wives and children to meet him on the way: the Clergy with their rich vestments and goodly ornaments were ready to receive him as he entered the City: the very gods themselves in a manner abandoned their shrines to give him entertainment. Immediately was the people summoned to a general assembly, that the King might deliver his mind before them all: but afterwards, upon more sage advice, it was thought to stand better with the honour and Majesty of a Prince, that he should set down in writing what he thought good, rather than in open place, either to blush himself in recounting his favors and good turns done unto the City, or in hearing the acclamations of the multitude in token of joy, to be ashamed and ashamed of their grofs and unmeasurable flattery. But in his letters which he sent unto the assembly, and were there openly read and published, first he made a rehearsal of the benefits that this confederate City had received at his hands. Secondly, he discoursed of the worthy exploits which he had performed against Philip. And finally he knit up all with an exhortation, that whilst they had himself, the Rhodians, and especially the Romans to friend them, they should put themselves in arms and begin war: as who, if they now forsook the enterprise, and let slip the present opportunity, should hereafter seek in vain to find it, which once they had so rectfully lost. Then had the Rhodian Embassadors audience given them, who lately had done the Athenians a great pleasure, in recovering and sending home unto Athens four long foists, which newly had been boarded and taken by the Macedonians. Hereupon with general accord they decreed to denounce and wage war against King Philip. But first they did King Attalus incredible honour beyond all measure, and then likewise to the Rhodians. Then and never before there was some speech moved of adjoining unto the ten ancient tribes, one other tribe, which of the Kings name should be called Attalus. Unto the City of the Rhodians they gave in token of verne, a Crown of beaten gold. And like as beforetime the men of Rhodes had granted free Burgeoisie of their City to the Athenians, so they of Athens now endured the Rhodians their liberties and franchises. This done, K. Attalus returned to his fleet in the rode of Egina. The Rhodians then weighed anchor, and from Egina sailed to Crea. From whence along the Islands, they passed to the Rhodes: and

Archipelago.

And in their voyage confedered themselves with them all, excepting Andros, Paros, and Cythera, which were guarded by garrisons of the Macedonians. In Egina King Attalus made his abode a certain time, and entered into no action, by occasion of messengers whom he had sent into Andros, and Embassadors that were expected from thence. But as he could not prevail with the Etolians, & persuade them to take arms, contenting themselves with the peace that in some sort they had concluded with Philip: so himself, and the Rhodians (who, no doubt, if they had pressed and followed hard upon Philip might have gained and enjoyed this glorious title, That they alone of themselves had delivered Greece from servitude) by inferring him once again to cross the seas as far as Hellestus, and to possess himself of the commodious and important towns of Greece, thereby to re-enforce his power and gather more strength, gave food and nourishment to the war, and in the end let the Romans go away with the honour, both of managing and also of finishing the same. Philip carried with him yet a more princely mind and Kingly courage: who, although he was not able to match and make his part good so much as with Attalus and the Rhodians his enemies, yet was he nothing at all daunted with the thundering threats of the Roman war: but sent Philoteles, a Captain of his, with a power of two thousand foot and two hundred horse, to invade and spoil the territory of the Athenians, committed his Armado to the charge of Heraclides, to set sail for Maronea, and himself in person marched by land thither with another regiment of two thousand footmen lightly appointed, and two hundred men of arms. Maronea he forced at the first assault. But as for Egina, after he had with much labour and travail laid siege thereto a long time, in the end he was Master thereof through the treason of Ganymedes, a deputed C. L. Governor there for King Ptolemy. After this he surprised and won other Cities, as Cypris, Duriscus, and Serrheum. From thence he advanced forward to Cherfus, where he gained Alexus and Alopecomnestus, which willingly surrendered: Callipolis also and Madytus, with some other peeces of base account and reckoning. But the Abydens shut their gates against the King, and would not suffer so much as his Embassadors to set foot within their Cities. There lay Philip a long time before the town and beleaguered it: and surely had not Attalus and the Rhodians forsaken the time, it might have been saved and the siege raised. Attalus sent thither three hundred souldiers and no more to lie in garrison, and the Rhodians one galley only with four banks of oars out of the navy when it rode at Tenedos. And afterwards when as Attalus himself was thither come at what time as the townsmen could hardly hold out any longer against the siege, he made them a shew only near at hand of some help: other relief would he afford none to his allies either by land or sea. The Abydens at first planted their engines and artillery along the walls, and with shot from thence not only distressed their enemies, and kept them from approach and entrance, but also annoyed them as they lay in harbour with their ships: but afterwards, seeing part of their walls ruinat and laid open; and perceiving besides that the enemies had undermined and were come under the ground as far as the inner countermure, which the inhabitants in great haste had raised within, forthwith they sent Embassadors to the King to treat and article about some conditions for delivering up the City. The townsmen capitulated and demanded, that the Rhodian Galley afore said, with all her mariners, and the garrison also of King Attalus, might be sent away in safety, and themselves permitted to depart the town every one with a single suit only of apparel. But Philip made answer again, that they had no peace for them at all, unless they would quit the place, and simply commit themselves unto his mercy. This Embassage related unto them, set them in such an heat and choler, that partly for spite and indignation, and partly upon despair, they fell into the like rage that the Saguntins did in times past. All the dames and wives of the City they commanded to be shut up within the Temple of Diana: their young-boys and maidens that were free-born, the sucking babes, together with their nurses, they caused to be bestowed within the common place of public exercise: their gold and silver they took order to be brought into the market place: their rich attire, their costly apparel and furniture, to be cast into the two Gallies, the one of Rhodes, and the other of Cyzicus, which rid in the haven: and last of all, that their Priests should be brought forth with their heads for sacrifice and altars erected in the midst of the place. There first were certain men chosen of purpose: who so soon as they perceived the battailon of their contrimen defeated and slain, fighting before the breaches of the wall, immediately should run upon their wives and children, and kill them without mercy, cast away into the sea their gold and silver, and all the furniture above said that was in the Gallies, and let the edifices and houses as fire, as well public as private, in as many places as possibly they could. For the performing and execution of these premises, they were bound by an oath ministred unto them: the form whereof, with a cursed malediction thereto annexed, they pronounced word for word from the Priests mouth. Then, as many as were of lawful age to bear arms, (ware likewise, That not one of them would depart out of the battell alive, but with victory. Thus remembering the oath they had taken, and how they called the gods to witness, they fought so resolutely, that whereas the night would have parted the combat, the King terrified with their furious rage, first gave over the conflict. The chief and principall men of the City, whose charge was to play the more cruel and horrible part in this tragical act, seeing there remained but few alive after this skirmish, and those grievously wounded and dried out of heart for weariness: the next morning early by day-break sent their Priests with their infules and robes of office, to tender the City unto Philip. Before the town was fully yielded, M. Emilius the youngest of those three Roman Embassadors which were sent to Alexandria, hearing of the

the straight siege of the Abydens came by the consent of the other two unto Philip. Where he laid open their grievances and made complaint. That he had warred upon Amisus and the Rhodiens, and namely, even then besieged and assailed Abydos most forcibly. And when the King answered that Abydos and the Rhodiens without just cause on his part offered, began first to molest and trouble him. What (quoth Amisus again) were you molested and troubled first by the Abydens too? Philip who was not wont to be told the truth so plainly, thinking this rejoinder of his more bold and more pertinent than to be offered to a King. Your youthfull age, quoth he, Amisus, and above all the Roman name make you hardy and audacious. But I would advise you all, first to remember your covenants, and to entertain peace with me. For in case ye once begin with me, and put me to it: I do you understand, that I also am fully resolved to make you all the smart, and know, that the realm and nation of the Macedonians is no less renowned with arms of arms than the Romans, Philip having dismissed the ambassadors, and seized upon all the gold and silver that lay on an heap together, lost all the booty of men of quality that might have yielded him a round ransom. For the multitude of common people fell into such a fit of rage and madness, that all of a sudden they imagined those who let their lives in the conflict were rewarded: and so calling one in another's teeth their perjury, and charging the Priests especially, that they were forsworn in delivering them alive unto the enemy whom they had devoted and appointed to death: they ran at once from all parts to the pitifull massacre of their own wives and children: and when they had to done, they made no more ado, but by fire, by sword, by drowning, hanging, and one way or other, they wrought a quick dispatch and clean riddance of themselves also. The King attemped to see them thus hurried, said the bloody his own soldiers, saying, that he would allow the Abydens three daies to dye in. During which term of time, the conquered Abydens exercised more fearful cruelty upon their own persons than ever the conquerors would have put in practice in the height of their heat and cholerick fury. Inasmuch as there was not one of them came alive into the enemies hands; but such as either fast tied with bonds, or otherwise by some forcible means were staid from being their own hangmen, and the butchers of their proper bodies. Philip after he had placed a garrison at Abydos returned into his own Realm. Now when this miserable calamity of the Abydens had distressed Philip to enterprize war against the Romans, like as Annibal afore him took heart by the wooll destruction of Saguntum to do the semblable: behold, he was encountered with posts that brought news, how the Consul was in Egna already, and had withdrawn his land-forces to Apollonia, and bestowed his servants at sea in Car-L issa, there to winter.

In this while the Embassadors who were sent into Africa had their dispatch and this answer from the Carthaginian. First, as touching Amisus, the General of the army and forces in France, they could no more but banish his person, and confiscat his goods. Then concerning the fugitive traitors and rebels, which were run from the Romans, they had sent home again unto them as many as they could search out and come by: and to that purpose they would address Embassadors themselves unto the Romans, to satisfy the Senat in that behalf. And presently they sent to Rome two hundred thousand Modii of wheat, and other two hundred thousand into Macedony to the army there. From thence the Roman Embassadors went forward to the King in Numidia. To King Masaniassa they delivered the presents which the Romans sent, and declared unto him their commission: at whole hands they received a thousand Numidian horse, whereas he offered them two thousand: himself took order for their embarking, and so dispatched them into Macedony with provision of two hundred thousand measures of wheat, and as many of barley. A third Embassage they had to Vermisus, who met the Embassadors as far as the utmost marches of his Realm, and to their disposition and discretion referred the drawing and penning of all conditions of peace as they would themselves: saying withall, that he held any peace whatsoever, that he should have with the people of Rome for good and just. So there were presented unto him certain articles and conditions of peace, and for the ratifying thereof he was enjoyed to lend his Embassadors to Rome.

Much about the very same time L. Cornelius Lentulus the Vice-Prator returned out of Spain: N who having declared in the Senat his valiant and fortunate exploits, that for many years together he had conquered in Spain: and in consideration thereof, demanded that it might be lawful for him to enter the City in triumph: the Senat judged that his noble acts deserved no less than he sued for: but they had no such precedent from their ancestors, that he should be allowed to triumph. They had warred neither as Dictator, nor Consul, nor Prator: and as for Lentulus, in quality of Vice-Prator only, and not of Consul or Prator he took upon him the charge of the Province of Spain. Howbeit, in the end they came down to this point, that he should ride into the City on horseback as Ovant. But T. Sempronius Longus, Tribune of the Com, interposed his negative, alleging that they had as little example to shew for that; and no precedence or custom at all of their ancient predecessors. But in fine the Tribune gave place to the general accord of the LL, O and was content to be over-ruled. So after the order let down by the Senat, L. Lentulus entered Rome in that solemnity and pomp before named. He presented in shew of the pillage that he had got, 4400 pound weight of silver, 2450 pound weight of gold. To his soldiers he distributed out of the Spoil 1200 Asles apiece, and 1200 Asles apiece.

Now was the army of the Consul transferred already from Arretium into Ariminum, and five thousand Lance allies were sent upon their march into Germa. Therefore, L. Furius departed from Ariminum.

Ariminum made haste by taking great journeyes to come against the Gauls who then laid siege to Cremenna, and encamped within a mile and an half from the enemy. Means and opportunity he had to do a notable exploit, and win a good hand of the enemies; it immediately upon his first coming might have assailed their Camp: for they wandered to and fro in lattering wine up and down the Country, a foraging, and had left no sufficient guard for the defence of their Camp. But he feared greatly that his soldiers were weary and tired: because the Companies marched apace thither to exceeding great haste. Howbeit the Gauls being called back by the hooping and hollowing of their fellows, let go their booty which they had in manner as good as in their hands, and returned to the Camp, and the morrow after ranged themselves in battell array. The Romans were not behind for their parts, albeit they had hardly time enough to let themselves in order, the enemies ran so suddenly and made such haste to fight. The right wing (for the army of the allies was divided into wings) was placed in the vanguard: the two Roman legions in the reeward: M. Furius led the right wing, M. Caelius had the conduct of the legions; and L. Valerius Flaccus (all three Lieutenants) commanded the Cavalry. The Prator kept with him two Lieutenants, C. L. L. L. and P. T. T., by whose means he might look about from every part, and be ready to oppose himself against all sudden attempts whatsoever of the enemies. At the first the Gauls hoped that with their numbers they should be able to tread down and trample under their feet that right wing of allies which was in the forefront: and to that effect they reduced their multitudes into one place, and charged upon it with all their might and main together. But seeing this enterprize sped not well, they endeavoured to environ the corners and sides, and to compels the enemies round about: which they thought they might soon do, being so many as they were in comparison of so few: which when the Prator perceived, to the end that he also might spread out his battallions at large, he displayed the two legions in the reeward, so as he compassed on both hands that wing which fought in the vanguard: and therewith vowed two Chappels to Jupiter, if that day he might be so fortunate as to vanquish his enemies. To L. Valerius he gave direction, that of one side he should with the Cavalry of the two legions, and on the other side with the horse belonging to the allies charge upon the wings of the enemies, and not suffer them in any case to enclose the battell about. Herewithall himself also, eipping the middle battallion of the Gauls to be but thin; by reason they were stretched out from thence to the corners and points of each hand, commanded his souldiers to keep close together, to advance forward and break through their ranks. So were the wings of the Gauls by the souldiers discomfited, and they in the midst repulsed back & chased by the footmen: and when the enemies thus at once on every hand were beaten down and killed, they shewed their backs, and fled as fast as they could to the camp. The horse pursued them in the rout and chase: and anon the legionary footmen made after also, and gave an assault upon their Camp. There escaped from thence not out six thousand: slain there were and taken prisoners above 25000, with severall banners and ensigns, and more than two hundred French wagons; charged and laden with much pillage. In this conflict, Amisus the General of the Carthaginians lost his life, and three Noblemen of the French, Leaders of mark and name. The Placentine captives, to the number of two thousand men of free condition, were delivered again to them of their own Colony. This was a goodly victory: and upon the letters which came with tidings thereof to Rome, received therewith great joy: and ordained it was, that a solemn procession should be held for the space of three daies. Of Romans and allies one with another, there died in this battell two thousand: most of them were of that right wing, upon which the enemies in the beginning of the conflict most of all discharged their fury.

Albeit the Prator had brought the war to a good pass, and in manner finished it, yet the Consul also C. Aurelius, having accomplished his necessary affairs at Rome, made no stay but took his journey into France, and received the victorious army of the Prator. The other Consul who came into his Province but a little before the end of Autumn, wintered about Apollonia. The Romangallies which from the Armado that lay in dock at Coryra, were sent as is aforesaid to Athens with C. Claudius, were no sooner arrived at Pyreneum, but they mightily comforted the allies, whose hearts were well-nigh done: for neither were there any more invaders now by land as there were wont to be from Corinth side by the way of Megara along into their territories: and the men of war and Pyrats ships which from Chalcis had made not only the seas dangerous to the Athenians, but also the maritime & sea coasts, durst not now approach nearer than to the cape of Sunium, nor venture into the open main sea from out of the Straights of Euripus. Over and besides, there came in to them three Rhodian gallies with four banks of oars: there were also three open ships of Athens well rigged and appointed, for to keep the quarters that lay along the river. Claudius was well appaid, and thought he had got enough for the present, in case the City and Territory of Athens might be sufficiently guarded by this fleet. But see, there presented unto him an occurrent besides of far greater importance and consequence. Certain banished persons of Chalcis, expelled from thence by the wrongs and violence of those that sided with King Philip, advertised him, that the City of Chalcis might be easily surprised without any conflict or resistance at all: for, not only the Macedonians ranged abroad every where up and down, because there were no enemies near at hand to fear; but also the townsmen presuming upon the garrison of the Macedonians, neglected the guard of the City. Upon the assurance of their words, he set forward: and although he was arrived at Sunium with so good speed, that he might with ease have sailed to the entrance of the Straights of Euboea, yet for fear of being being discovered (when he was once got past the cape) he kept his fleet within the bay still until night: and at the shutting in of the evening he weighed anchor and lanch'd forth, and having a calm sea, he arriv'd before Chalcis a little before the break of day, and presented his forces against those parts of the City that were least peopled: and with the help of some few souldiers he scaled and got the Tower that stood next with the wall about it, while in some places the Wardens were found asleep; and in others not at all to be found. Then they advanced forward upon those parts that were more inhabited, and stood thicker with houses: where, after they had killed the guard and broken open a gate, they received into the town all the rest of their souldiers. Whereupon there was running now on every hand into all parts of the City, and much hurry and confusion; which was the greater, because the enemies had set fire on the houses about the market place. The Kings garners also were of a light fire, together with the arsenal and armory. Where there was exceeding store of provision, of engines, of artillery and other ordnance and instruments for war. After this they fell to execution and to massacre in every place, as well those that fled as those that made head: so as they mist not one that was of age meet to bear arms, but either he was killed or put to flight. Sepater likewise the Acarnanian Captain of the garrison was there slain. All the pillage was first brought and piled up together in the common place of the City, and afterwards embarked. The common Goal besides was broke open by the Rhodians, and the prisoners and captives let out, whom Philip had there lodged as in a place of surety guard and custody. Then they overthrow the Images and statues of the King, and brake their necks: which done, they founded the retreat, went a shipboard and returned to Pyraeum, from whence they came. But if the number of Roman souldiers had been such, that they might have kept Chalcis still with a garrison, without quitting and abandoning the defence of Athens, a great matter had been got in the very beginning of the war: to wit, the City of Chalcis and the passage of Eurippus had been taken from the King. For as the narrow pass of Thermopylae stoppeth the waies into Greece by land, so the streights of Eurippus maketh all force by sea. Philip at that time lay in the City Demeirias: where, after he heard the news of the calamity befall upon a confederate City, albeit now it was too late to help when all was lost: yet because he would be revenged (which is a thing that cometh near to the nature of aid and succour) he went forth immediately with five thousand footmen lightly appointed and nimble, and three thousand horsemen, with all the speed and haste he could to reach near unto Chalcis: making full reckoning that the Romans might be surpris'd on a sudden: but being disappointed of this hope, and thither come where he could see nothing else but a pitious spectacle of a friend City half ruin'd and still smoking, and so few people left alive, that they hardly were able to bury their dead, he returned as hastily as he came: and having pass'd over Eurippus at a bridge, he led straight to Athens by the way of Bavaria, with a deep perswasion and hope, that a like enterprise unto the Romans should have the like issue. And verily he had not mist of the semblable effect, correspondent to his designs, but that a certain watchman (one of those whom the Greeks call Hemerodromos, that is, posts and carriers that in one daies space will run and rid a mighty deal of ground) descried from a watch-tower the Kings troops marching: whereupon he ran out afore, and came to Athens ere midnight. There were they all asleep, and as reckless as they of Chalcis were a few daies past, which was the loss of their town. The Pretor of the Athenians, and Diopippus the Captain of a regiment of hired strangers and aid souldiers, awoke at this so fearful and sudden tidings and got up, assembled the souldiers into the market-lead, and commanded to sound alarm from the highest place of the City, that all men might take knowledge that the enemies were near at hand. By which means they ran every man from all parts to the gates and up the walls. Within few hours after, and somewhat before day-light, he approached the City: and seeing many lights every where, hearing also a noise of people running to and fro (as in time of such a tumult) he staid his march, and commanded his souldiers to sit them down and rest themselves, intending to proceed by overt and open forces, face cover and crafty courses sped no better: and so at length he came before Dipylus. This Dipylus is a gate, standing in the very front of the City, greater and wider a great deal than the rest. Both within and without that gate are large and broad streets, so that both the inhabitants within may marshall an army, and lead in battell array from the common place directly to the gate, and also the enemies without have room at will to conduct a power as well of horse as foot, by means of a spacious cauley or high-way, which reacheth out almost a mile in length from the foresaid gate, and leadeth to the place of exercise or school called Academia. At this quarter of the City the Athenians, together with the garrison of Attalus, and the regiment of Diopippus, issued forth, and entered the cauley abovementioned, having first within the gate set their men in order of battell. Which when Philip saw, he made full account, That he had his enemies as he would himself to do his pleasure with them, and that now he should have his fill of a massacre and slaughter that he had wished for so long (for there was not a State or City in all Greece that he maliced more than this of Athens.) And therefore he exhorted and encouraged his souldiers, that they should have their eye upon him ever as they fought, and know well this, that where the King was, there should the banners and cornets be displayed there should the strength and force of the battell be: and so he set spurs to his horse, and ran with full career to charge the enemies. Thus was he not only carried away with heat of choler, but ravished also with a desire of glory, esteeming it a goodly thing, and a matter tending to his great honour, for to be seen fighting in the view of a great multitude of people that had taken up and filled the battlements of the walls

(as it were) to behold a solemne spectacle. Thus being advanced a good way before the main battell, accompanied with some few men of arms, he rode among the mids of the enemies; where he bare himself so valiantly, that as he mightily heartned his own men, so he affrighted no less his enemies. Many a one he wounded with his own hand, reaching at them that were near, levelling at those that were farther off, and drove them afore him like sheep, and followed hard upon them in perion to the very gate; where he made foul work among them, thronged and crouded as they were together in the stright of the passage, for half they made to escape, and committed a grievous slaughter. And albeit this was but an unwise and rash adventure of his; yet he rectified himself in safety, without farther danger of his person, by reason that they who were placed in the corners of the gate, forbore to shoot and lance their darts, because they would not hurt their own side, intermingled among the enemies. But after this, when the Athenians kept their souldiers within the walls, Philip founded the retreat, and pitched his tents at Cynsarges, where there was a Temple of Hercules, and a school of learning, and a grove standing about it. As for Cynsarges, and the school Lyceum, and whatsoever was either religious, or pleasant and desirable about the City, was burned. And not only the edifices, but the sepulchres also and monuments of the dead were defaced and call'd down: in which furious heat of anger, nothing was spared, were it sacred or profane, without regard of God and man. The next morning, when the gates were first kept shut, and afterwards let open again upon a sudden, because the garrison of Attalus entered into the City from Egina and the Roman from Pyraeum side: Philip dislodged and removed back from the City almost three miles. From whence he went to Eleusis, hoping to surpris the Temple at Cumawares, together with the Town and Cattle, which both environeth the Temple, and also commanded the lame. But when he perceived that the corps de guard was not neglected, and that a fleet battell was coming from Pyraeum to succour them, he gave over this design, and led his army to Megara, and so straight forward immediately to Corinth, and having intelligence, that the Achaes held a general Diet and counsel at Argos, thither he came unlooked for of the Achaeans, and put himself amongst them at the very session and assembly. Consultation there was; about waging war with Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedaemonians: Who seeing, that the Seignory of Achaia was taken from Philopamenes, and conferr'd upon Cycliades, a Captain not to be named and compared with him, and perceiving also that the aids which the Achaeans had, were fallen from them and gone, took their advantage, renew'd the old quarrel, and made fresh war upon them, passing the villages and territories of the borderers, yea, and threatening the good Towns and Cities also. Now whilst they sat, devising and consulting together what number of souldiers should be levied and enrolled out of every several State and City, for to withstand this common enemy, Philip frankly promised to ease them all of that care as touching Nabis and the Lacedaemonians: and not only to impeach them from spoiling the lands of their Allies, but also to lead his army out of hand into the very territory of Laconica and Sparta, and thither to turn the whole terror of this war. This kind speech and friendly offer of his, being with a general applause of them all accepted. "Mary, this you must (quoth he) take withal, that good reason it is, whilst I myself am content to defend and maintain your country by my forces, mine own territories in the mean time be not disurmished of their garnisons and left naked: and therefore, if ye think it good, provide me as many souldiers as may suffice for the guard of Oreum, Chidea, and Corinth, that thus making all sure behind me, I may be secured from danger that way and with more resolution prosecute the war against Nabis and the Lacedaemonians. The Achaeans smell'd him quickly & knew full well to what end this gracious promise of his and frank offer of aid against the Lacedaemonians tended. His only drift was to draw forth of Peloponessus the youth and flour of the Achaeans as a pledge and sure hostage, for to engage the whole nation so far as they should be interested in the war that he had with the Romans. Cycliades the Pretor of the Achaeans thinking it bootless, and no good policy, to discover so much and to enforce that point against him, interred only this speech and said, That it was not lawful by the customs and ordinances of the Achaeans, to propose other matters to parle of, than those for which they were assembled together: and so after the order enacted for levying and waging a battell against Nabis, he dissolved and brake up the assembly, which he now had held right stoutly and with the liberty of the place, who otherwise, before that time was taken ever for no better, than one of the Kings flatterers and favorites. Thus Philip put besides the great hopes that he had conceived, levied some small number of voluntary souldiers, and returned to Corinth and the land of Attica.

During the time that Philip was in Achaia, Philotes a Captain under the King, departed out of Evbea with two thousand Thracians and Macedonians, for to wait and spoil the confines of the Athenians; and over against Eleusis passed over the forrest and hill Cytheron, from whence having sent out the one half of his forces every way to prey upon the plain country, he fast himself down close with the other half in a convenient place for an ambush, to the end, that if peradventure they should make out from the Fort at Eleusis, and set upon his souldiers as they drove booties, he might suddenly arise and charge upon the enemies at unawares, spread and scattered all abroad. But this ambushment was discovered. And therefore after he had called the souldiers back who were run all abroad a foraging, he put them in order well armed & appointed to besiege and assault the Fort of Eleusis, against which he led all his forces: but after much hurt and many a wound received from them, he retired, and joined with Philip as he returned out of Achaia. The King also himself in person, assisted to force and batter the said hold: but the Romans ships coming from Pyrrhus, and a fresh garrison received into the place, caused him to retire to give over the enterprise. After this the King divided his power, and sent one part thereof against Athenes, under the conduct of Philocles, and himself with the other marched to Pyrrhus: that while Philocles kept the Athenians within the City, by approaching their walls, and threatening to besiege and assault it, he might himself with facility win and gain Pyrrhus, wherein there was left but a small and slight guard. But he found as but a peevish service about the affluence of Pyrrhus, as before at Elusine, by reason of the same soldiers in manner that defended as well the one as the other. So on a sudden he departed from Pyrrhus, & marched directly toward Athenes. From whence he was repulsed and chased by a sudden fall both of horse and foot made from the heights of the wall half ruined; which wall stretching out, as it were, two arms, joyntly from the Pyrrhus to Athenes. So he left battering and assaulting the City, and parting again his army with Philocles, he went out to forage and spoil the country: and as in his former passage he exercised himself in demolishing the tombs all about the City, to because he would leave nothing entire and safe, he commanded the chapels of the Gods, which were consecrate in every village and hamlet, to be pulled down, rased, and burnt.

The country of Attica was marvellously beautified and embellished (as it were) with godly peeces of work in that kind, (by reason as well of the store they had of native marble, as also of their industrious and excellent workmen) which ministered matter and occasion unto him of this outrage and madness. For not contented and satisfied with the ruin of the Temples, and casting down of images, he commanded that the very stones should be broken and barreled in peeces, that left being whole and found they might serve to make up and stop the breaches of the ruins. And after that his fell mood and anger was not so much satisfied and satiate, as it wanted matter to work upon in that place, he departed out of his enemies country into Bœotia, and performed no other deed in Greece worthy of remembrance.

Sulpicius the Consul at that time lay in camp between * Apollonia and * Dyrrachium, neer the river Apus: and having caused T. Appianus the Lieutenant to come thither, he sent him with part of his forces to walt the borders of his enemies, * Apollonia after he had foraged the frontiers of Macedony, and forced at the first assault certain holds, as Corraghæus, Gervhenium, and Orygellum, came with his army before Antipatria, a City seated in the narrow straits of a certain passage. And first he called forth the principal and chief citizens to a party and assailed to persuade and induce them for to commit themselves under the protection and safeguard of the Romans: but afterwards, seeing they trusted upon their greatness, the strong wall and situation of the Town, and therefore made no reckning of his negatives, but rejected them, he assailed it by force of arms, and won it in the end. All that were above fourteen years of age he put to the sword: the whole pillage he dealt amongst the soldiers: the walls he rased, and let fire on the Town. The fear of like misery was the cause that Codrus, a Town of good strength and well fortified, was yielded to the Romans without assault, or any sword drawn. There he left a garrison: and after that, he forced Illyria, a Town better known for the fame that in carth of the other famous Ilum in Asia than for any thing else. As the Lieutenant returned with a great booty to the Consul, one Athenæus a Captain under the King, charged upon the tail of the army, and disordered the hindmost, and impeached their passage over the river: but the Lieutenant at their cry and sudden affright rode on all back, caused them to turn again and make head, set them in battail ray, and bestowed all their bag and baggage in the mids upon a heap. The Kings soldiers not able to abide the violence of the Romans, were many of them slain, and more taken prisoners. So the Lieutenant having retired his army in safety, was immediately sent back unto the Consul to the Armado.

The war being thus begun, and the exploit of this first expedition happily performed, the Princes, Potentates, and LL, that bordered upon the Macedonians, repaired into the Roman camp, to wit, Pleuratus the son of Scerdetius, Aminander King of the Achamans: and from Dardania, Bato the son of Longarus. This Longarus had waged war sometime in his own name and quarrel with Demeetrius the father of this Philip. These States offering and promising their aids unto the Consul, had this answer from him, That for the Dardanians and Pleuratus, he would use them, when he entered with an host into Macedony. As for Aminander, he gave him in charge the while to solicit the Ætolians to war. The Embassadors of Attalus (for they also were come at the same time) he dispatched with this order, That their King should attend the coming of the Roman fleet at Egina, where he wintered: with which and his own jointly together, he should assail Philip at sea like as he had done beforetime. Embassadors also were addressed to the Rhodiens, that they likewise should have their hand and be seen in this war. Philip for his part forewore not to make preparation (for now by this time was he come into Macedony) and sent with part of his forces for to keep the heights of the passage of Pelagonia, his son Perseus, a very child of young years, having chosen certain of his trusty friends, to direct and govern his tender age. As for Sciatius and * Peparethus, two Towns of no small importance he destroyed, for fear the enemy's fleet should seize upon them, and with their pillage content and pay themselves. He sent likewise Embassadors to the Ætolians (a nation inconstant and unquiet by nature) that they should not upon the arrival of the Romans, change their allegiance. Now the Diet or general council of all the States of Ætolia, which they call Panætolium, was to be held at a certain day appointed. And therefore to prevent and meet with all dangers, both the Kings Embassadors made hast to be present thereto, and also L. Furius Purpurio presented himself there, as sent Embassador from the Consul.

A Consul, The Athenian Embassadors likewise were at this assembly. And first the Macedonians (with whom a league was but lately concluded, and therefore fresh in remembrance) had audience, who said, "They had no new matter to speak of, seeing there was no new occurrence and business fallen out: only this, that upon what motives and considerations they were entered into an accord and peace with King Philip, (as having experience that the alliance with the Romans never did them good) for the very same they should maintain it still, being once concluded & confirmed: Or, love ye rather (quoth one above the rest of the Embassadors) to imitate the Romans licentiousness or their levity, I know not whether? who, as they gave order and commandment, that your Embassadors being at Rome, should receive their dispatch and answer in these terms: Come ye now to us indeed my matters of Ætolia, when without our consent and warrant ye have made peace with Philip? so likewise at this present are ready to require that ye should band with them, and war upon Philip. They pretended aforesaid that they took arms against him, by occasion of you, in your quarrel and defence: & now they forbid you to be in peace with Philip. At first, they entered into Sicily for to aid and succour Messana. A second time they went thither to set free and deliver Syracusa out of the oppression of the Carthaginians. And now at this time they hold in possession both Messana and Syracusa: and all Sicily entire they have made it tributary, yea, and reduced it into the form of a Province, to be ruled under their ward, and the jurisdiction of their Deputies and Magistrates. In good faith, I assure you, that as ye according to your laws & customs hold your Diets & Councils at Naupactum, by your own Magistrates elected and created among your selves, wherein ye have liberty to make choice both of friends and enemies whom ye will and to entertain either peace or war at your pleasure: so, as writs are sent out to the States of Sicily for their knights and burgesses, to assemble in Parliament at Syracusa, at Messana, or Lilybaeum. And the Roman Pretor it is and no other that summoneth them thither, as also to their Assises and Sessions: at his commandment & not otherwise they are cited to general Councils. Him they see sitting on high in his tribunal seat, guarded with Lictors, attended upon with Ulfers, there to hear and determine causes, and from aloft to pronounce hard sentences and proud awards. His rods threaten their backs and sides, his axes are ready to chop their heads from their shoulders: & from year to year new Lords still they choose and lend among them. And this dealing, none of them either can or ought to marvel at: for why they see Cities of Italy, by name Rhegium, Tarentum, and Capua, (to speak nothing of their neighbour Towns, by whole fall they arose, by whose ruins Rome grew mighty) subject likewise to the same rule and government. As for Capua, the very sepulcher and tomb of the Comnation (now that the natural people thereof are either dead and buried, or driven out as exiled persons) remaineth at this day as a monster and wonder in nature, resembling a headless and limbless dismembered trunk of a body: a Town (I say) without Sent, without Commonalty, without Magistrates: where more cruelty was shewed in leaving it to itself thus abandoned, and in this manner to be inhabited, than it had been clean rased and laid even with the ground. Meer folly it is and without all sense and reason, to believe or hope, that if these strangers and aliens born (who differ more from us in language, in customs and laws, than they are distant and disjoined by space between of land and sea) be once seized and possessed of these places, that any thing will continue long entire in the present state. The Kingdom of Philip ye will say is a block in your way and seemeth to prejudice your freedom & liberties: yet he being made your heavy friend, and that through your own fault and desert, required no other thing at your hands for amends, but peace: and even now desireth nought else but your allegiance, and the faithful observance of the same. Acquaint foreign legions once with this your country: you take the yoke of servitude upon your necks for ever. Accept the Romans once for your Lords: too late it will be then and in vain for you to seek Philip again, and with him your ally. Small matters and momentary occasions may well cause the Ætolians, Acarnanians and Macedonians, (men of one language) to fall out, and as slender motives, will soon make them friends again: a little thing between them at a jar, and as little ringeth them in tune. But all Grecians both are and ever will be at war with Barbarians: enemies they are by nature, which is perpetual and immutable: and not by occasions which alter every day. But where I begin my speech there will I leave & make an end. In this very place you the same men, agreed three years past to have peace with Philip: and the self-same Romans as they mistook then and disavowed that peace, so now they will needs disquiet and trouble it after it is once passed and accorded. And since the case still is all one, and fortune hath made no alteration, I see no reason why ye should vary and change your minds. After the Macedonians, the Athenians entered in place, for the Romans were well contented therewith, and would needs have it so: "These Athenians having suffered many wrongs and indignities at the Kings hands, had juster cause of complaint, and more reason to inveigh and agitate matter against his cruelty and outrageous dealings. First, they bewailed the piteous spoil & miserable sackage of their territories: neither complained they so much and found themselves grieved, in that they had sustained arms and suffered hostility from an enemy, (for there be certain laws and rights belonging unto war, by virtue whereof, to give and take, to suffer harm and to do harm interchangeably, is an ordinary matter and allowable: As for example, the burning of standing corn in the field, rasing and pulling down of houses, harrying and driving of booties both of men and cattail, rather pitiful calamities, than shameful indignities to endure.) But this is the point say they, and hereof we complain, That he who termed the Romans,

"mind he carried against the Temple of Ceres Eleusina: and no better affected was he to Jupiter "and Minerva in Pyrrhus. But being repelled by force and arms not only from our Temples, "but also from the walls of our City, he wreaked his anger and raged against those Chapels and "religious houses, which had nothing for their defence, but only the reverent regard of the Gods, "whereof he had none. Hereupon, they prayed and humbly besought the Aetolians, to have com"passion of the Athenians, and to enterprise the war, under the conduct first of the immortal "Gods, and then of the Romans, who next to the Gods are most powerful and mighty. Then "the Roman Embassadors spake in this wise. "The Macedonians first, and after them the Athe"nians, have altered the whole course and form of my speech. For, whereas my coming hither
"was to complain of the injuries done by Philip to many Cities of our allies and associates: the "Macedonians by accusing the Romans first, have put me too hardly to my shits, that I need "rather employ my wits in making a defence of our selves: than in framing an accusation against "others. The Athenians again in reckoning up and recounting the impious, abominable, and in"human parts of King Philip committed against the Gods, both above and beneath, what have "they left behind for me or any man else to object against him besides? What they have laid,
"you may well think, and truly suppose, that the men of Chios, Abydos, Enos, Mareone, Thespi, "Purros, Samos, Larissa and Messene; those also here of Achaia, complain of the same, yea, and
"of more grievous and cruel enormities: as whom he had greater means to annoy and hurt. As "for such things as he hath laid to our charge, if they deserve not honor and glory, I confess they "cannot be answered and defended. Reproached us he hath with Rhegium, with Capua, and Syracuse.
"I cannot deny, but during the war of Pyrrhus we sent a legion to Rhegium, theretole
"in garrison at the instant prayer of the Rhegians themselves, who requested us to lend them.
"This legion I confess, most wickedly and treacherously seized upon the City, and possessed it "to their own use, for the guard and defence whereof they were first sent. A vowed we (I pray "you) that act of theirs? Nay, punished we not by arms that lewd legion and urgratious? And "when we had them in our power and at our devotion forced not we them to make amends and "satisfaction to our allies, with the smart of their back and sides, and with the loss of their heads "in the end? And when we had done, restored we not unto the Rhegians their City, their "Lands, all their goods whatsoever together with their liberties, franchises, and laws? As for "the Syracusans, when they were oppressed by strange and foreign tyrants, we judging it to be a "great indignity, relieved and succoured them: and after we had been (for three years space)
"most wearied and toiled out with continual siege and unceasing assault both by land and sea of "their City, so exceeding strong and so well fortified: we seeing that the Syracusans themselves "made choice rather to be in servitude under those tyrants, than to be taken by us, gave them "their City again both forced and freed by the same armies. Neither deny we that Sicily is now "Province: and that the Cities which took part and sided with the Carthaginians, & jointly with "them accorded to wage war against us, are tributaries unto us, and pay us yearly rents and pen"sions: nay, we are so far from not taking this upon us, that contrary-wise we would, that both
"you and all nations besides well knew, that every one received at our hands that measure of for"tune that he duly deserved. And now as touching the Capuans, should we repent that we have
"chastised them in such sort, whereof they themselves verily can not complain? These men, after "we had maintained war against the Samnites in their quarrel and defence, for the space well near
"of seventy years, to no small defence of ours, and with many a loss and overthrow, after we had "linked them unto us first by league and alliance, then by marriage and affinity, and last of all, by "freedom and bourgeoisie of our City: these men I say, in our adversity, were the first, all other "nations of Italy, that villainously massacred our garrison there, and revolted unto Annibal: and "then for very spite and indignation that they whereby we besieged, sent Annibal to assault the City "of Rome. And if we had proceeded in that rigour against them, that we had left neither City "(standing nor any one person of them living, who could take offence thereat, and justly say, That "they had been more hardly entreated and dealt withal than they deserved? There were more of "them, that upon touch and prick of guilty conscience for their lewd and wicked deeds, made "them-

"themselves away and so perished, than were by us executed and put to death. As for the rest, we "took from them indeed their Town, we deprived them of their possessions and livings, yet so, as "we left them both lands to occupy, and place to dwell in: the guiltless Town itself we suffered "to stand till safe and found, that whoever at this day seeth it, can not find the least token or "show of a City either forced or won. But what I speak I of Capua: seeing we have afforded unto "Carthage (a City conquered and subdued) both peace and also liberty? Inasmuch as we have "caused rather to be afraid, left by remissness and over-willingness to pardon those whom we have "vanquished, we give occasion to many more to be so bold as to trie the hazard and fortune of "war against us. And thus I had to say in defence of our selves. Now somewhat I have to speak "against King Philip, whose horrible murders committed upon those of his own house, even his "nephew King Siolo and friends: whose loose life and unbridled lust (more unkind and inhuman in "manner than his cruelty) ye know better that are nearer unto Macedony. As for you, my ma"sters of Aetolia, we have for your sakes begun war with Philip, and you again without us have "concluded peace with him. It may be you will alledge, that whiles we were occupied in the "Punic war, ye were forced and compelled for fear to take such conditions of peace at his hands,
"who was the stronger: we likewise pressed with greater affairs and troubles) forbore to pro"tect and follow that war, which by you first was laid down & given over. At this present, seeing
"by the grace and goodness of the Gods the Punic war is come to an end, both we have em"ployed and bent all our forces against Macedony, and ye also have good occasion and opportuni"ty offered to reenter into amity and alliance with us, unless ye had rather perish with Philip,
"than vanquish with the Romans.

When the Roman Embassador had ended this Oration, the Aetolians generally were inclined "and affected to the Romans: but Damocritus their Pretor (corrupted as the speech went with a "sum of money received from King Philip, and made for him) gave assent neither to the one party
"nor the other, but said, "That in counsels of great weight and importance, there was nothing "more hurtful and prejudicial, than haft-for repentance (qd. he) follow it never so soon, when a "thing is once done, yet it cometh too late and booteth not: considering, that rash counsels can "not be revoked, hasty and headlong courses cannot possibly be recalled, nor matters once past be "reduced again to their former state. As for the proper time of that resolution now in hand, "whereof my self am of advice, that the due maturity & full ripeness should be expected: it might
"now at this present be set down and concluded upon, for seeing that by our laws & ordinances
"provided it is that we may not treat of any affairs concerning peace or war, but in the general "councils called Panetolai or Pylai: therefore for the present I would have you to ordain and "decree, that your Pretor without fraud or covin might call and hold a Diet or court of Parlia"ment, whensoever he is minded to treat of war or peace: and whatsoever then and there shall be "proposed and determined, it may stand in as good force, strength, & vertue, as if it had passed in "a full Panetolai or Pylai council. Thus the Embassadors being dismissed and sent away in "suspense, and nothing decided and concluded, he said, That he had performed a singular piece of "service to his nation and country. For now they would fide and take part with those, whose "fortune it were to speed better in the field. Thus went matters in the assembly of the Aetolians.

E Now Philip with all diligence prepared for war, both by sea and land. His sea forces he assem"bled together unto Demetrias a port in Thessaly, making account, that Attalus and the Roman fleet "would in the beginning of the next spring depart from Egina. Over his navy and all the sea coasts
"he appointed Heraclides Admiral, like as he had done aforetime. Himself levied and gathered his "land-forces, supposing verily that he had debared and bereft the Romans of two great means of "aid; to wit, the Aetolians of the one side, and the *Dardani*ans of the other; in that the narrow "streights and passage of Pelagonia was stopped and made fire against him by his son Perseus. The "Consul on the other side made no preparations for war, but was on foot and in action already,
"conducting his army through the confines of the Dassaretians, and transporting with him out of "his wintering harbor all the provision of grain, whereof the country yielded him sufficient to the "F maintenance of his soldiers. The great Towns and Villages were surrendered unto him, partly for "love and partly for fear: some were forced by assault, others abandoned by the inhabitants, and
"were found desolat, by reason that the barbarous people were retired into the mountains near by,
"to save themselves: and at Lingum near the river Bevus he encamped: from whence he sent to pur-
"vey for corn of the farmers and bairns of the Dassaretians. Philip saw well enough that the "country all about was in an hurry, and the people in great fear and fright; but being uncertain to "what place the Consul intended to march, he sent out a comet of light horsemen as espials to dis"cover what way the enemies took, and whither they pretended to go. The Consul likewise for his "part was as doubtful: well he wist that Philip was dislodged from the places where he had winter-
"ed, but in what quarter he journeyed, he knew not: and therefore he also had set forth certain "horse in espial to scour the coasts. These two bands or troops from divers and contrary parts, en"countered in the end in one way, after they had a long time wandered at adventure through the "country of the Dassaretians. Both parts knew well by the noise they heard a far off, as well of men
"as horse, that enemies approached: and therefore they had both horse & armour in readines, before
"they were in sight one of another: so soon as ever they were within their interview, they made "no stay, but charged immediately and joyned issue. It fortuned, that for number and valour both,
"they were equally matched: as being choice and elect men of either side: whereupon they fought for certain hours alike, until such time as their own weariness and the fatigues of the day had wearied the battal in doubtful victory. Of the Macedonians there died 40 horsemen; and of the Romans five and thirty. And for all this neither brought the Macedonians any better intelligence of their King, nor the Romans to their Consul, of the place where the enemies were incamped. But certain fugitive traitors gave advertisement thereof: who commonly in all wars upon a running head and light humour that naturally they have, are given to hearken after news, and to enquire in what terms enemies stand. Philip imagining that it would avail somewhat both to punctuate the affectionate love of his soldiers, and also to induce them more cheerfully and readily to undertake all hazards for his sake, in case he seemed to have a careful regard to bury those horsemen which were slain in the journey and expedition afore said, commanded their bodies to be brought into the camp, so the end that all men might see what honour he did them in their funerals. But he saw how nothing is more uncertain, nor where of a man may make less reckoning than the minds and affections of the multitude. That which was thought would have made them more willing and forward to enter into any danger and jeopardy whatsoever, even that, wrought a contrary effect and caused them to be most fearful and backward. For they who were used to fight with Greeks and Illyrians, and to see men's bodies wounded with push of pike, galled with arrow, and pierced with lance here and there, in this or that part, after they beheld once their fellows so butchered mangled with the Spanish curuleaxes and cutting swords, the arms cut away from the body, the heads either smitten clean off by the neck, or cloven down right, and lying on the shoulders; their panes ripe with the bowels open, and guts drawing after; with other deep wounds and broad slashes, most hideous and fearful to behold; then they saw all full well (fearful creatures as they were), what manner of weapons, and what kind of men they were to deal against. Nyas the King himself was terribly afraid, who had not as yet encountered with the Romans in any letch. Whereupon he sent for his son to come back with the garrison that he had in the regions of Trigonia, thereby to increase and strengthen his own forces; and so laid open the way into Macedonia, for Phlegetas and the Dardanians. Himself in person with a power of 30000 foot, and 4000 horse, guided by the fugitives afore said, marched toward the enemy, and about a quarter of a mile or somewhat less from the Roman camp, possessed himself of a little hill near to Athacum, which he fortified with trench and rampier. From whence, when he beheld the Romans encamped hard under him he wondered (by report) to see not only the whole body of the camp, with the form and order thereof in general, but also how every part was ranged and set out in detail, both in the manner of quartering and pitching their pavilions, and also in the proportion of the wayes for breadth and length between. And having viewed and considered every thing accordingly: "Believe me (qd. he) there is no man who seeth this, that can either think or say, it is the camp of a barbarous nation. For two daies (pace the Consul and the King (expecting one another attempts and enterprises) kept their footsides close within their holds. When the third day was come, the Roman General brought forth his whole power into the field. But the King fearing to hazard all so soon upon a cast, drew forth 400 Triballians (which were, as we have said elsewhere, of the Illyrian nation) and 300 Cretensians, all footmen, accompanied with the like number of horsemen; and sent them under the conduct of Athenagoras, one of his courtiers and gallants, for to brave the Cavalry of the enemies, and to challenge them to fight. The Romans, whose main battail was little above half a mile off, put out against them their light armed van-curriers, and as it were, two companies or cornets of horsemen: to the end, that they might be equal with the enemy in number, both of foot and horse. They of the Kings part supposed verily, that they should fight after their old and accustomed manner: namely, that the horsemen should by turns, one while ride forward in the face of the enemy, other while retire again; sometime follow in chase and have use of their darts and weapons, and sometimes turn and fiew their back parts: that the nimbleness and activity of the Illyrians would stand in good stead to make excursions and suddain skirmishes; also that the Cretensian archers should be employed in shooting arrows aloof at the enemies, as they advanced and came forward, or flung out all abroad on every side; but the violent charge of the Romans, no less continual and obstinate, than fierce and eager, put them quite out of this manner of service, and disordered all. For no otherwise than if it had been a set battail between two entire armies, their footmen lightly armed, so soon as they had lanced and let go their javelins from them, took them to their swords, and came to hand fight: the horsemen likewise, no sooner affronted the enemies, but either staying their horses they fought on horseback, or else alighted on foot, and among the footmen maintained the skirmish. By this means neither the Kings Cavalry could match the Romans, because they had not been used to a steady battel; nor his footmen who were wont to traverse their ground, and skirmish, never standing still, and withal in manner half naked for any harness they had, was able to make their parts good with the Roman light appointed footmen, who had their (words and bucklers, and were furnished with armour, as well defensive as offensive. So they could not endure long to maintain fight, but were forced to retire into their camp; and by nothing else saved themselves but by good footmanhip and riding apace. These passed one day between, when the King minding to try a conflict with all his forces of Cavalry, and footmen lightly appointed, had laid in wait by night certain targaters, whom they call Pelissas, in a convenient place between both camps, and given direction and charge unto Athenagoras and his men of arms. That if they sped well in open battel and plain fight, they should on still and follow their good fortune: but if they went by the wayes,
"for

A worse, and were too weak, they should give ground by little and little, and train the enemy to the place of ambush. Well, it fell out so, that the horsemen indeed retired as ordinarily; but the leaders of that cohort afore said of targaters, not attending the signal long enough, but raising their men out of ambush before time, lost the opportunity of playing their part & performing a good service.

The Roman Consul having both obtained victory in open battel, and escaped the danger of a covert train, retired himself into his camp. The morrow after, he came down into the plain field with all his forces, and put them in battel array, having arranged his Elephants in the forefront of the vanguard. And this was the first time that ever the Romans had use in their wars, of this beast; by occasion, that in the late Punick war, they had taken some of them alive from their enemies. But perceiving that Philip kept himself close within his camp, he approached under the very rampier, yea, and reproached him for his cowardice. And seeing for all that, he could not even then be drawn to a battel: considering also, that if he kept there a standing camp long, so near unto the enemy, his provision of corn should be exposed to dangers; for no sooner should the purveyors and foragers be gone abroad into the country, and spread over the fields, but the enemies light horsemen would be ready at their heels to fetch them in, and cause them to come short home: therefore he removed his camp to a place almost eight miles off, called Otholophum, where he might make his provision with less danger. Now when the Romans purveyed for corn and victuals in the territory thereabout, and were come upon a time somewhat near and within danger of Philip, at first the King let them alone, and kept his men within their camp; to the end, that they might be more bold and venturous, and withal, less wary and circumspect: but spying them once straggling afield here and there out of order, he set forward with all his Cavalry, and the auxiliaries of the Candiot, and marched so fast, as the swiftest of his footmen by running might keep pace with the horsemen: thus having gotten between them and home, he pitched down his ensigns betwix the Roman camp and the foragers. Then divided he his forces in two companies, the one he sent forth to courtie and chase them, so dispersed as they were: giving special charge and direction, not to leave any of them alive that they could reach: with the other he staid himself behind, and beset all the wayes, and stopped the passage: by which the enemies were like to retire and have recourse unto their camp. Soon were they killed or put to flight in every place, and as yet not one escaped to the Roman camp, for to bring news of this discomfiture: for, as many as fled chanced upon the guard that the King had set: and more were slain by them, than he let the waies, than those that were sent out to the pursuit and execution. At length some hapned to escape through the midst of the Kings corps de guard, and in great haste and fearful manner came into the camp with a trouble some noise and tumult, rather than any certain tidings. The Consul, after order given to the horsemen; that every man should incurr and rescue what way soever he could, their distressed fellows in this extremity, himself led forth the legions out of the camp, and marching in a foursquare battail on advanced toward the enemies. The Horsemen being spread over the fields in divers places, some lost their right way, being deceived by other outcries heard from a contrary part: other some met with their enemies, and at one instant, the skirmish began in many and sundry places. The band that guarded about the Kings, fought most fiercely and cruelly: for both they were for their own number as full of horse as foot, a full army well-learned; and also most of the Romans light upon them, because they kept the very port and roadway in the mids. In this regard also were the Macedonians the better and had the vantage, because the King himself was present in person to encourage and exhort them: and withal the auxiliary Candiot wounded many of the Romans ere they were aware of them: for why, they were well prepared aforehand, ranged thick and close together, and so fought against them that rode scattering abroad one from another, and without array. And verily, if they could have kept any mean and measure in their chase, they had mightily advanced themselves, not only in winning the honor of that day, but also, in the main point of the whole war. But pursuing them beyond all reason, and without discretion, upon a bloud-thirsty desire that they had of massacre, they chanced upon the Roman Squadrons which were gone before with the Tribuns and Colonels: into match as the Horsemen afore said, who before fled, when they once saw the ensigns of their own infantry, reined their horse heads, and turned again upon the enemy that ran with bridle in horse neck: and so in the turning of an hand, the fortune of the battail changed and came about, and they that ere while made pursuit, now shewed their backs, and fled again. Many of them were slain that came to close hand fight, many likewise of those that ran away. Neither tell they all upon the edge of the sword, for some there were who plunged into bogs and marshes, where both horse and man sunk in the deep mud and mire, and so were swallowed up and perished. The King himself also was in great danger: for his horse being wounded under him and fallen, he also came headlong down to the ground, and hardly escaped, but he had been troden under foot, and mischief as he lay along. One horseman & above the rest saved his life, who hastily leapt himself from horseback, and withal mounted the King (so feared as he was) upon his own horse: who being now on foot, and not able to run as fast as the horsemen that fled away, was with many a stab and thrust soon dispatched by the enemies that came running together to the King when he was seen to fall, and the King after he had ridden in fearful flight about the fenay meers, one while where there was some way, and other-whiles where there was none at all to be seen, chanced at length to come to his camp, when most men were in despair that he could possibly escape in safety. In this skirmish there were 300

Maced

Macedonians slain, a hundred almost taken prisoners; fourscore brave and goodly couriers, with rich caparions and other furniture, together with the spoil of fair armours carried away.

There were that blamed the King for being too rash that day, and the Consul for his slackness. For Philip say they, should have kept him quiet, in rest and repose, knowing, as he did, that the enemies within few dayes would have been brought to extrem want and penury, now that the territory all about was clean spoiled and wasted. And the Consul for his part, when he had foiled the Cavalry and light armed souldiers of the enemies, and as good as taken the King prisoners, ought presently to have advanced against the Kings camp: for never would the enemies so discomfited have stood to it: and to in the minute of an hour, they had been vanquished for ever. This is soon said, but (as most things else) not so soon done. For in case that the King had likewise brought forth into the field all his Infantry, peradventure in that tumult, when all his men were discomfited and driven to flee out of the field to their camp, yea, and to keep within the rampier, for fear of the enemy, ready upon his victory to get over the counterfarp and other fortifications, the King might have been diseized of his hold, and lost all. Again considering, that the whole power of Philip his footmen remained still intire within the camp, the corps de guard before the gates waiting: the sentinels and watch fire in convenient places of the rampier attending: what other good should the Consul have done in advancing thither, but imitated the rash fool-hardiness of the King, who a little before so hotly followed the chafe of the horsemen discomfited? Neither was the Kings first discomfite to be reprov'd and found fault with, when he charged upon the foragers, scattered as they were over all the fields: if he could have seen when he was well, and have used his good hand in measure and moderation. Less marvel it is besides, that he was willing to trye the fortune of a battail: because there ran a rumor, that Pleuratus and the Dardaniens were departed from home, and with a puissant power entered already into Macedony. And if he thus were beset round about with these armies, there was no doubt, but the Romans might have vanquished and subdued him, and never stirred foot for the matter. Philip therefore supposing that upon these two late received foils of the horsemen, he should have but unquiet and dangerous sitting in the same standing camp still: and minding to dislodge from thence, and in his remove to beguile the enemy and not be seen, dispatched a Pursivant at arms or herald unto the Consul a little before sun setting, to crave forsaite of arms, until he had buried his horsemen that were slain: and at the relief of the second watch he deceived the enemy: for leaving many fires through all his camp, he marched without any noise and departed. The Consul had newly slept, and was going to rest, when he was advertised that a Pursivant was come, and what his errand was. And for the present, he made the messenger no other answer but this, that the next morning he would talk with him, and give him audience. But Philip by this means got the advantage of that whole night, and part of the next day, to gain riddance of way in his journey, which was the only thing he sought for. And toward the mountains he took his flight, for that way he wist well the Romans would not follow after, with an army so heavy and charged as it was. The Consul by day break, granted the Pursivant a cessation of arms, and gave him his dispatch: but it was not long after that he was advertised how the enemy was gone: and not knowing which way to follow after, he passed some few dayes in foraging and purveying provision all about the place where he lay encamped.

After this he marched to Synthera, and gathered together all the grain that was to be had about Pellagonia. From thence he went forward as far as to Pluvina, and all this while knew not for certain into what quarter of the countrey the enemies were retired. Philip having first set him down and encamped before Synthera, and departed from thence by crots and crooked wayes, struck a suddain feare into the enemy, whereupon the Romans dislodged from Pluvina, and neer unto the River Ospagus pitched their pavilions. The King likewise rested himself not far from thence, and had cast a trench and raised a rampier along the banks of the River, which the inhabitants call Erigonius. And after he was for certain advertised, that the Romans intended to go to Erydania, he marched aforesaid to seize upon the streights, and to empeach the enemies, that they should not gain the passage that lyeth as it were in a narrow gullet, barred and enclosed on N each side. There he raised in one place a rampier, and cast a trench in another: made barricades here and there, partly by piling stones up on heaps in stead of a wall, partly by felling of trees across, according as either the ground would give leave, or the place afforded matter: And thus stopping up all the wayes by sundry devices and means, he made the place (to his thinking) both unpassable and impenetrable, which of itself by nature was hard enough and troublesome. The countrey all about was for the most part forreits, and full of woods, very incommodious, especially for that manner of battalions and ordinance of array, which the Macedonians call Phalanx; which serveth them in small or no stead at all, unless with their long pikes they may make a pallisade, or stay (as it were) and oppose them before their shields: which they cannot well do, unless they have free scope and liberty of plain and open ground. The Thracians also were souly troubled and cumbered with their spears named Rhomphae, which were likewise of a mighty length, and by reason thereof (catching as they did, and sparring within the boughs and branches of Trees that grew in their way every where about) hindered them very much. There remained the Cohort or band of the Candioti, that seemed of some use for the use employed. And yet the same also as it was able to discharge arrows against both horse and man, and to annoy them so long as they lay open and exposed to shot, if haply they offered

A offered to charge: to they were not of strength sufficient to drive their shafts level, and to pierce thorough the Roman targets: for otherwise there was no part of the body offered it self unarmed and naked for to aim at. And therefore so soon as they perceived that kind of shot to serve them to little or no purpose, they caught up stones which lay all over the valley, and let them flye at the enemy. Which stones, as they light and beat upon their bucklers, kept a great clattering, and with the sound they made (rather than with any hurt besides) kept the Romans for a time from mounting up the bank. But the Romans making no reckoning of these (stones, neither, partly by pay galls and target-fences over their heads, made way directly through the thicket of their enemies: and partly by wheeling a little and fetching some compass about, gained the pitch of the hill, and were got up to the very top: from whence they drove the Macedonians (all affrighted as they were) down the hill, and chased them from their holds and guards: and by reason they had much ado to flee (the ground was so rough and uneven), most of them were killed and cut in pieces. Thus the difficulty of the streights was overcome, and they were possessed thereof, with far less trouble and consist than they looked for and made account of. Then they marched on forward as far as to Erydania, where the Consul after he had put the fields all over to the wast, retired himself to Elimeia. From thence he forced Oresthides, and assailed the Town Celerium, situate as it were, in a demy land: there is a lake that environeth the walls; and one way by land that leadeth to the Town from the main, and the same very streight and narrow, in form of a gullet. At the first when the Town was summoned the inhabitants trusting to the natural strength of the place, kept their gates shut against the Consul, and refused his summons. But after they saw once the ensignes displayed and mark hanging against them, when they perceived the enemies defended under a pavois to approach close to the gate, and the narrow streight and avenue aforesaid, beset with a band of them: before they would encounter and fight, they yielded themselves for the City Pluvium. From Celerium he marched on towards the Dassaretians, and with assault the City Pellum. From thence he carried away the bondslaves, with the rest of the pillage; but all persons whatsoever free born, he left at liberty without paying ransom. The Town he gave them again after he had planned in it a strong garrison: for it stood well, and in every good place, for to make roads and inursions into Macedony. Thus the Consul having ranged over the countrey of the enemies, brought his army back through the peaceable parts into Apollonia, where he began first to make war.

Now the Ætolians the Athamans, and Dardaniens, and many other were rising suddenly at once, some from one place and some from another, had diverted and turned Philip a contrary way. Against the Dardaniens (as they returned out of Macedony) he sent Athenagoras with the footmen lightly armed and appointed, and the greater part also of the horse giving him in charge and direction to follow them hard at their heels as they departed, and to play upon their backs, and cut off the rail of their rearward: to teach them against another time, not to be so hasty to come abroad with an army again. Democritus the Governor of the Ætolians (who in the Diet aforesaid held at Nausipetium perswaded to take a longer time for to combat about this war) had in the next Council or Parliament following, moved the Ætolians to enter into arms; namely, upon the fame that was spread abroad of the horsemens fight before Ololephus: and also upon the coming of the Dardaniens, and Pleuratus with the Illyrians into Macedony: besides the arrival of the Roman fleet at Oreum, and the general voice and bruit that went, how Macedony should shortly be assailed also by sea, over & above to many notions that from all parts about were come already by land. These motives regained Democritus and the Ætolians to friend the Romans again. Who joyning unto them Antimander the King of the Athamans, went forth together for to besiege Cerintium. They within the Town had shut their gates, whether by constraint or willingly of themselves, it was not known for they had the Kings garrison within among them. How ever it was, within few dayes Cerintium was taken and burnt. As many as remained alive after that great defeat, as well bond as free one with another, were with the rest of the pillage carried away. This fearful example caused all the people inhabiting about the marsh of Babe, to abandon their cities, and to retire themselves for security into the mountains. The Ætolians for want of rich prey and booty (which they could not find there) turned from them and marched toward Perrebia. In that quarter they won by force the City Cynthia, and cruelly put it to the ransack. The inhabitants of Mallora surrendered of themselves without compulsion and were received into protection as allies. Out of Perrebia Antimander was of advice and desirous to march against Comphar, by reason that the countrey of Abamanti bordered to neer upon that City, and it seemed easy to be forced without much trouble. But the Ætolians fingers tickled and itched again to be doing with the rich and fertile fields of Thessaly, and thither went they to raise booties and seek pillage. Antimander followed still for company, albeit he liked well neither of these fashions of the Ætolians thus outrageously to make roads and to spoil every where: nor of their manner of encamping at adventure, in what places soever they chanced to come, without all discretion, regard, and care of fortifying and guarding the army. Fearing therefore lest their inconsiderate rashness and supine negligence, might be an occasion that he or his should come to a shrewd turn, and incur some damage, spied his time; and seeing them to incamp in a plain neer to the City Phacadium, he took a little Hill little above half a mile off, where both he and his, might with the help of any small guard, lie in security. Now when as the Ætolians seemed in manner to have forgotten that they were in the enemies countrey, but that they drove some booties: whiles they were some of them wandering and stragling, disbanded and half armed, others within their camp without any corpi du guards; swelling and sleeping all night and day long, and made no difference of the times, Philip came upon them before they looked for him. And it being once known by the report of some that fled out of the fields in great affright, that he approached: then Damocritus and the rest of the Captains began to quake for fear. Now was it about noon-tide of the day, at what time as most of them having taken their full load of wine and viands, lay along fast asleep. Then they fell to awake and raise one another, and to give the alarm: and then they sent out every way to call in those that were spreading abroad in the fields. So much they were astonished, that for half many of the horsemen went forth without their swords, and most of them forgot to put on their cuirasses. Thus being led out in post haste, and hardly in all (soor and horse together) able to make up the number of six hundred, they light upon the Kings Cavalry: for number, armour, and courage much better than themselves: And therefore at the first push were discomfited: for before they were well entered into skirmish, they fled shamefully away toward their camp. Some of them came short thither, and were either slain or taken prisoners, even as many as the Kings horsemen overtook, and gat between them and their other companies. Philip, when he saw his men approach neer unto their camp, commanded to sound the retreat: for both horse and man was weary, not so much with fight as with their long journey and the exceeding speed that they made. Whereupon he gave commandment, that the Horsemen by troops, and the light armed Footmen by their companies and Squadrons should water their horses one after another, and go to their dinner and repast. Others he kept still in armour for a guard attending the Regiment of the footmen, that came but slowly forward, by reason they were heavily armed at all pieces: who being come, they also were enjoined to pitch down their ensigns, and lay their weapons before them, and to take a short bait and hasty pittance, lending two or three at the most out of every band to water the horses. All this while the horsemen, together with the light armed soldiers, stood well appointed and in readiness, if haply the enemy would have given any attempt. The Ætolians bestowed armed men all about the gates and the rampier, intending to guard and defend their strength and fortifications, for now by this time they also that were scattered over the fields, had retired themselves into the camp. And so long as they beheld the enemies to keep quiet, and not stir, and were themselves in a sure hold, they made their bravadoes, and were very lusty: but after that the ensigns of the Macedonians began to advance forward, and march in order of battel well appointed, close unto their tracks: all at once they abandoned their guards and quarters, and ran out at the back part of their camp, and fled to the forehead hill, where the Athenians were encamped. Many of the Ætolians were likewise in this hasty flight killed or taken prisoners. Philip made no doubt, but that the Athenians also might have been driven from their hold, if there had been day enough behind: but the day being spent already first in the skirmish, and afterward in the ransacking of their camp, he let him down upon the next plain, hard at the foot of the hill aforesaid, intending very early the next morning to assail the enemy. The Ætolians feared as much now, as they were before when they quit their own camp, fled scattering away the night following. Here Aminander flood them in very good stead, by whose good guidance and direction, the Athenians being skillful in the coasts of the country, conducted them into Ætolia, over the high mountains, whereas the enemies followed after them in blind and unknown by-ways. Some few of them hapned in this confused and scattered flight to lose their way, and stumble upon the Macedonian horsemen, whom Philip by day light, had sent to cut off the tail of the enemies, so soon as he perceived the hill abandoned. About the very same time, Athenagoras a Captain under the King, overtook the Dardanians as they returned into their country, and at the first put their rearward in disarray. But afterward the Dardanians turned head again, and embattelled themselves: so they fought on even hand, and nothing was won nor lost on any side. The Dardanians began not so soon to advance forward and march on again, but the Kings power, with their horsemen and light armed soldiers came upon them afresh, and put them to great trouble. For they had no such means of help, and were besides furcharged with heavy armour, and withal, the place gave great advantage to those of the Kings part. Very few were slain more wounded, none at all taken prisoners: for the manner of the Dardanians, is not to break out of their ranks and arraies for a little, and upon small occasions; but as they fight close, so they retire together, and part not. Thus Philip having restrained these two nations, by two brave exploits, which were as happily performed as bravely enterprised, recovered the losses again, by him received in the Roman war. There hapned besides another occurrence, which diminished the number of his enemies the Ætolians. For Scopas, one of the chief noblemen of that nation, being sent from Alexandria by King Ptolomæus, with a mighty mass of gold, carried away with him into Egypt six thousand footmen, and certain horsemen, waged for money to serve. Neither had he left behind him any of the flour and youth of Ætolia; if Damocritus had not chafied and rebuked them, and so by that means kept some of them at home; making remonstrances unto them, one while of the war that was toward, and another while of the desolation which was like to ensue thereupon. But whether he did this upon a good zeal and care that he had of his country, or only to cross Scopas, because he had not fed him well with rich rewards and fat presents, it is not known. And thus much concerning the affairs passed between Philip and the Romans for that summer.

The Roman fleet having in the beginning of the same summer committed to Sea from Corynth, together with the Lieutenant An. Apollonius passed beyond the point of the cape Malea, and joyed

A joined with King Attalus, neer Scyllium in the territory of Hermione. Then the whole City and State of Athens, upon hope of present aid and succour, brake out and poured forth at once all the hatred and malice which they had conceived against Philip, and which a long time for very fear they had held in, and therefore kept themselves in good and reasonable terms with him. Now in this City there never want prompt and ready tongues to stir up and provoke the common people to a commotion. And as in all free States generally such kind of men are entertained and born out by the favour of the multitude, so in Athens especially, where eloquence is in most request, and beareth greatest sway. Presently therefore an A.S. was put up and proposed unto the common people, and by them granted and confirmed, That all the Statues and Images of King Philip, together with their titles and titles, likewise of all his progenitors and predecessors, as well men as women, should be defaced, pulled down, and destroyed. Item, That all the festival daies, the sacrifices and sacrificers, which had been instituted and ordained for the honor of him, should be profaned and unhallowed again. Item, That the very places, wherein ought had been erected, or inscriptions graven to his honour, should be held as detestable and accursed: and that from thence forward, it might not be lawful to set up there any of those things that ought to stand, and be dedicated in a pure and clean place. Item, That the publick Priests of the City, in all their prayers, and so often as they praised for the good estate of the people of Athens and their allies, for the preservation of their armies and armadoes; should detest and curse by name King Philip, his children and realm, his forces both by land and sea, with all the race and name of the Macedonian nation. Moreover, it ran on in the decree, That if any man from that time forward, should prefer and propound any thing that might tend to the disgrace and infamie of Philip, the whole people of Athens should approve and allow the same whatsoever, and make an act thereof. Contrary-wise, if any person say or do anything for honour, or to impeach and check his dishonour, whosoever should happen to kill the said party, he should be deemed and reputed, that he had killed him justly and lawfully. Finally, this branch was comprised within the decree, That all things ordained in times past against Pigramus his line and progeny, should be observed and stand in force against Philip. Thus verily warred the Athenians against Philip with letters and words: wherein they are right valiant, and to say truth, good at nothing else. But Attalus and the Romans, having from Hermione shaped their course for Pyreum, arrived there. And after they had journeyed some few daies in Athens, and were laden with a number of decrees, wherein the Athenians recounted the praises and commendations of their allies beyond all measure, like as they had before exceeded in shewing their malice against their enemies: they set sail from Pyreum to Andros. Where, riding at anchor in the bay called Gauvelon, they sent certain men to sound the minds of the inhabitants, Whether they would chuse to yeeld the Town willingly, or rather abide the hazard of a forcible assault. Who answered again, that the Kings Garrison being possessed of the Castle, and keeping it for Philip, they were not their own masters. Whereupon the King and the Roman Lieutenant set their forces on land, and with all preparation of engines and artillery fit for an assault, approached the City divers waies. The Roman standards and their arms, not seen before in those parts, the resolute courage also of the soldiers, who so lustily and nimble came neer to scale the walls, terrified and amazed the Greeks, much more than any thing else. Therefore immediately they fled into the Castle, and the enemies were LL. of the City. Now, after they had for two daies space held out in the fortrels, presuming more upon the strength of the place than the force of their armour and weapons: they and the garrison together, compounded upon the third day to quit the place, so they might be brought with a convoy to Delium, a Town in Boeotia, and every man to have one single suit of apparel. Then the Romans leaving the bare City unto King Attalus, ransacked it themselves, and took away with them all the pillage and ornaments that beautified the same. And to the end, that the Isle should not lie waste and desart, Attalus perswaded the Macedonians in manner all, and certain also of the Andrians, there to remain. Afterwards, they also who by composition were transported to Delium, were by the fair promises of the King drawn away from thence: which they gave ear and credit unto the sooner, for the love of their native country, the miseries whereof they might hardly brook. From Andros they crossed to Cythus. There they spent certain daies in assaulting the City, to no purpose: and seeing the gains would hardly quit their pains, they departed from thence. Neer unto Præsa (which is a place of Ætica within the main) there joined unto the Roman fleet twenty pinnacles of the Illyrians, who were sent to rob and spoil the territory of the Carystians: the rest of the fleet remained at Gereffum, a noble rode and port of Eubœa, until such time as the Illyri were returned from Carystum. Then all together they made sail, and passing the mids of the main sea, they fell with the Isle of Ieus, neer unto Seyrus. There they were staid for certain daies, by reason of the raging North wind: which being once laid and the sea calm again, they passed to Scyros, a City lately pillaged and ransacked by K. Philip. The soldiers ranged over the country, and brought home with them to their ships & whatsoever else was fit for mans food: Other booty neither was there any, nor deserved had the Greeks to be spoiled at their hands. Thence they bent their course for Candæa: and first they rode at anchor neer unto Mendis, a village situate by the sea side, and belonging to that State. From whence having sailed beyond the cape, & desirous to come about with their vessels for to approach the very walls of the City, there arose a tempest & sudden gulf: wherein they had like to have been cast away: but scattered they were asunder: & having for the most part lost the tackling of their ships, they escaped with much ado to land. This tempest at sea, was also a fore-token prefiging unto them, that they were to follow the war by Land, and to give over sea service. For when they had brought all their ships together and let their men ashore, they assailed the Town: but they had the repulse with many a bloody blow besides (for there was within, a strong garrison of the Kings) whereupon they gave over their enterprise, returned back and failed over to Cassianum a City of Pallene. And having doubled the point of Torona, they set their course for Acanthus. There at first they foraged the territory, then forced the Town, and ransacked it. And for that their ships had their tull draught and charge of pillage, they sailed no farther forward, but returned from whence they came to Sebastus, and from thence to Euboea: where leaving behind them their main navy, they put in with ten ships lightly appointed, to the Bay or gulf of Malea, for to parley with the Ætolians about the whole course and managing of the wars. The chief of this embassy sent from the State, was one Siphriscus an Ætolian, who came to Hercules for to treat and confer about these affairs together with the King and the Roman Lieutenant. They demanded of Attalus by virtue of the accord and agreement before made, to furnish them with a thousand souldiers: for so many ought he by right to set out and maintain, whensoever they were to wage war against Philip. But this demand was denied to the Ætolians: in regard that aforetime they likewise thought much to make a rode to spoil Macedony, at what time as Philip kept foul work about Pergamus, burning all edifices before him, as well faced as prophane, when they might have drawn him perforce from thence into his own realm to look unto his proper affairs there. Thus the Ætolians were dismised with more hope than help: for the Romans sent them only wish fair words, and large promises of all things. Then Apollonius with King Attalus returned to the fleet.

After this they laid their heads together, and began to consult about the siege and assault of Oreum. A strong City this was both in regard of the walls, and also of a good garrison, by reason that heretofore it had been once assailed. Now there were 20 sail of Rhodian ships all clovered with hatches and decks, which under the conduct of Captain Agemimbratus, had joined with the fleet of Attalus and the Romans, after the winning and conquest of Andros. These ships they sent to lie in the Bay of Zelephium, (a promontory or cape above the City Demetrias, lying very conveniently over against Isthmia) for this intent, that if the Macedonian ships should come abroad from thence, they might be ready in gard to make sail against them. Heracleides an Admiral for King Philip, lay there at rode with the navy, attending rather some enterprise by opportunity and vantage of the enemies negligence, than by plain and open force. The Romans and Attalus in the mean time planted their ordnance against Oreum at divers parts. The Romans at the Castle side that standeth upon the Sea: The King from the vale that lieth between two founts, where as the City is enclosed also with a wall. And as they assailed in sundry places: so their manner of assailing was much different, and their engines divers. The Romans assayed to approach the wall with tortoises, pavoises and mantlets, and to shake it with the Ram: They of the Kings part used Crossbows, Balists, Catapults, and all manner of engines to fling forth quarrels and darts, yea, and to level and weigh mighty stones of exceeding great weight. They undermined also: and in sum, they practised all means which they saw by experience did good during the former assault and siege. But the Macedonians were not only more in number than the time before to defend the City, but also of better courage and resolutions: by reason that the King had rebuked them sharply for their fault passed: and they remembered well both his menaces, and also his promises for the time to come: in so much as the assailants had small hope to win the Town in haste. Mean while the Roman Lieutenant, supposing that some other exploit might be performed, leaving a sufficient number (as he thought) for the finishing of the Fabricks begun, and other engines of assault, put over to the next places of the continent: where he surprised on a sudden Larissa (not that noble and renowned City in Thessaly, but another, which they call Cremasta) and won it, all but the fortres. Attalus in like sort took Agelone, fearing nothing less than such an accident from them that were busied in besieging another Town. By this time, as the engines and other Fabricks without Oreum were at the point of finishing, and ready to perform the battery for which they were made: so the garrison within was overtoiled with continual pain and travail, spent with watching night and day, and faint with many a grievous wound. Moreover, part of the wall, shaken underneath with a butt and push of the Ram, was already fallen down in sundry places, in so much as the Romans entred by night at the open breaches, and all the way above the Key, and so were possessed of the Castle. Attalus likewise by the break of day, after he saw the banner reared upon the fortres, and the signal which the Romans put forth, entred the City: for now the walls in many places lay along. The garrison and the Townsmen fled to a second citadel that they had, from whence after two days they yielded. The City was the Kings lot: the bodies of the prisoners were the Romans share. Now drew the sun near unto the Equinoctial line in Autumn, at what time the Eurozan gulf called Cala is dangerous, and not well trusted of mariners. Therefore being desirous to be gone into a place of safe retreat, before the troublesome winter weather overtook them, they turned their course and made head to Pyræum, from whence they came: where Apollonius leaving behind him thirty ships, set a compasses about the cape of Malea, and failed to Coreyra. But the King Hayed till so long as the festival days of Ceres continued, because he would be present at the celebration of those solemnities. After the feast ended, himself likewise retired into Asia: but first he sent Agemimbratus and the Rhodians home again. These were the affairs and exploits performed this summer by sea and land, by the Roman Consul and the Lieutenant Generall, with the aid of King Attalus and the Rhodians against King Philip and his allies.

The other Consul C. Aurelius being come into his Province when the war was brought to an end, could not smother and conceal his anger conceived against the Prætor for fighting in his absence. When he had taken order therefore to send him into Etruria, himself with the legions invaded the country of the enemies: where by way of robbing and spoiling he warred: so as he got more prey than prairie. But L. Furius, seeing there was little to do in Etruria, and withal desirous rather than his life of a triumph over the Gauls (which he supposed to obtain with more ease, whilst the Consul was absent, who was both angry with him, and also envied at him) arrived at Rome: before any man looked for him, and assembled the Senat in the Temple of Bellona. Where, after he had declared what acts he had achieved, he requested that he might be permitted to ride into the City with triumph. In great credit and account he was with many of the Senators, both for his noble and worthy deeds, in which regard they honoured him: and also for a special favour and love, in which respect they affected him. But the more ancient and elder Senators denied him triumph, as well for that he had warred with the army of another, as also because he had abandoned his own Province and government, upon a greedy desire to catch a triumph, by waiting his opportunity, and taking advantage: a thing not warrantable by any former precedent or example: And as many of them as had been Consuls said moreover, That above all things he ought to attend upon the Consul his return. "For well might he (say they) being encamped near unto the City, have defended and guarded the Colony only, and so have drawn the time out until his coming, and never needed to have fought a set battell for the matter. And although the Prætor have omitted to do so, yet ought not the Senat to follow his example, but expect the Consul. When as therefore they have heard the Consul and Prætor discoursing and arguing the matter both together face to face, then they should be able to judge better and more soundly of the cause. A great part of the house was of opinion that they ought to look unto nothing else but the good service done, and whether he were lawfully called thereunto, as a Magistrate of himself, to manage his affairs by his proper conduct and the guidance of his own fortune. "For, of the two Colonies (say they) which were opposed at two forts and bulwarks to restrain the sudden impressions and tumults of the French: when the one was sacked and burnt, and the time fire like to leap from it to the other so near, (as from house to house that join together) what could the Prætor have done otherwise in that case? For if there might be nothing attempted without the Consul, it must needs follow that either the Senat did amiss in giving the Prætor the charge of an army (for if their will was that the war should be managed not by the Prætor, but by the Consuls, they might have limited it in the Commission by especial words, expressly forbidding the service to be done by the Prætor, but only by the Consul) or else the Consul hath committed a fault, who having commanded the army to go out of Tuscany into France, came not himself in person to Ariminum to encounter the enemy, and be present in that war, which without him might not be lawfully fought. Over and besides, the occasions and seasons of war attend no staies, and tarry for no politick delays of Generals. And otherwhiles, fight is a man must, not because a man is willing thereto, but because his enemy puts him to it. To conclude, the very battell it self, and the happy issue thereof, ought only to be considered and regarded. The enemies are defeated and slain: their Camp taken and ransacked: the siege raised from the one Colony, and it prevailed: the captives of the other recovered and restored to their friends: and to be brief, in one battell the quarrel is decided, and the war finished. And not only men have rejoiced for this victory, but also there have been precessions for three daies space to the honour of the immortall gods: (For that L. Furius hath managed the Commode well and happily and not ill and rashly. Finally, these French wars fall by a fatal destiny to the house and race of the Furii. By these and such like remonstrances alledged by himself and his friends, the majesty of the Consul absent was over-weighed with the favour born to the Prætor present. And so in a frequent assembly of Senators a decree was granted, That L. Furius should ride in triumph. Thus triumphed over the Gauls L. Furius Prætor, whilst he was in office. He brought into the common treasury 370000 Ales, 170000 pound weight of silver. But neither were there any prisoners led captives in the war, nor spoils carried in pomp before his chariot, nor yet his souldiers followed after: So as it appeared, that all other things besides victory alone, pertained properly to the Consul.

After this were the plaies exhibited with great magnificence by P. Cornelius Scipio, which he had towed in Africk, during his Consulship. Also there passed an order for the lands of his souldiers: That for so long as each one had served in Spain or Africk, he should have two acres for every year: and that these lands should be set out and assigned unto them by Decemvirs for the purpose deputed. Then were certain Triumvirs created for to supply and make up the number of the Roman Inhabitants in Venusia, by reason that during the time of Annibal his war, the strength of that Colony was much enfeebled and impaired. C. Terentius Varro, V. Quintilius Plautinius, and P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Cneus, enrolled new Coloners to inhabit Venusia.

The same year C. Cornelius Cethegus, who governed Spain as Pro-Consul, discomfited a great host of the enemies in the country of the Sedetans. In which battell, by report, were slain 15000 Spaniards, and 78 military ensignes taken. C. Aurelius the Consul, when he was returned out of his Province to Rome against the solemn election of Magistrates, complained, not as though made reckoning he would have done, (that the Senat expected not for his coming, nor that the Consul was not permitted to debate the matter with the Prætor) but found himself grieved, "That the Senat had decreed a triumph so, as the party only was suffered to speak who was to triumph, and none of them might be heard who were present at the battell. And whereas our forefathers ordained, that Lieutenants, Colonels, Marshals, and Centurions, yea, and in one word, the souldiers should bear a triumph: for this end and purpose, that the truth might appear to the world, of all things achieved by him unto whom so great honour was to be done: Was there any one (quoth he) of all that army which fought with the Gauls, I say not a souldier, but so much as a lackey or horse-boy following the Camp, of whom the Senat might enquire, whether the Prætor spake true or false? This done and said, he published the day of assembly for the election above said: wherein were created Consuls L. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Villius Tappulus. After them were Prætors chosen L. Quintus Flaminius, L. Valerius Flaccus, L. Villius Tappulus, and C. Cælius Pamphilus. Grain and other victuals that year were cheap. Great store of corn was brought out of Affrica, which the Ædiles of the chair distributed to the people, at two Asces Modius. They also set forth the Roman games and pastimes right sumptuously; yea, and represented them one day more than ordinary. Moreover, of the silver raised by fines and forfeitures, they made seven brazen statues, which they set up in the treasure-house of the City. The Plebeian plaies likewise were three times recalled all over by the Ædiles of the Commons L. Terentius Maffius, and C. Cælius Pamphilus: Prætor elect, Finally, the funerall games that year were four daies together exhibited in the common place of the City, occasioned by the death of M. Valerius Leuinus; and celebrated they were by his two sons P. and M. who also shewed unto the people a brave spectacle of offenders at the tharp: wherein there were five and twenty couples that ended the lists and performed combat, M. Aur. Luc. Cotta, one of the Decemvirs, that year departed this life; and in his place M. Atilius Glabrus was subordinated. In the solemn assembly for electing Ædiles of the chair, it chanced that those two which were chosen might not immediately enter into office: for C. Cornelius Cethegus was created in his absence, while he governed the Province of Spain. And C. Valerius Flaccus who was present at his own election, might not be sworn to maintain the laws, because he was the Flamin or Priest of Jupiter. For lawfull it was not for any Magistrate to exercise his place above five daies, unless he were sworn to the laws. Then Flaccus preferred a petition that he might be dispensed with: whereupon the Senat ordained, That if the Ædile would find one to swear in his name at the good pleasure and discretion of the Consuls, then the Consuls (if they thought it meet) should deal with the Tribunes of the Commons, to propound it unto the people that it might pass under their grant. So L. Valerius Flaccus (the Prætor elect for the year following) was presented to take the oath for his brother. Then the Tribunes put it to a canvass before the people, and they enacted, That the oath of his brother should be of the same validity as if the Ædile himself had taken it in his own person. Concerning the other Ædiles also there passed an act of the Commons. For when the Tribunes propoosed unto the people, Which two they would have to go into Spain as LL. deputies, with command over the armies: the people ordained, that C. Cornelius the Ædile of the chair might come home to bear his office, and L. Manlius also after so many years, depart out of his Province: the people ordained, that Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Stertinius should have the conduct and government in Spain, in quality and title of Pro-Consuls.

The two and thirtieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the two and thirtieth Book.

Many strange and prodigious sights (as they were reported from divers countries) are here related, and set downe: among which, this is one, that in Macedony there was a bay tree sprung up of it self in the poop of a galley. T. Quintus Flaminius the Consul fought fortunately against Philip in the Straights of Epirus: and having put him to flight, he compelled him to return into his own kingdom. Himself with the assistance of the Ætolians and Achæans, infested sore and plagued Thessaly, which bordereth upon Macedony. L. Quintus Flaminius the Consul his brother, by the aid of King Attalus and the Rhodians, made conquest by war at sea, of Eubœa and all the sea-coast. The Achæans were received into amity. The conspiracy of slaves, that conspired to deliver and set at large the hostages of the Carthaginians was detected and took no effect. The number of Prætors was increased to six. The Consul Cornelius Cethegus defeated the French Infuriants in battell. League and amity was concluded between the Romans and the Lacedæmonians, with their tyrant Nabis. Over and besides, there is contained in this book the winning of many Cities in Macedony.

The two and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

When the Consul and Prætors were entred into office upon the Ides of March, they cast lots for the government of the Provinces. To L. Lentulus, fell Italy; and to P. Villius, Macedony. As for the Prætors, L. Quintus had the jurisdiction of the City of Rome, and C. Cælius the government of Ariminum; L. Valerius ruled Sicily, and L. Villius his lot was to command Sardinia. Lentulus the Consul had order given him to levy new legions, and Villius to receive the army of P. Sulpicius, with commission and licence to take up as many souldiers as he thought good himself to furnish the same with a fresh supply. Those legions which C. Aurelius Consul had in charge, were assigned over to Cælius the Prætor, with condition to keep them with him, untill the Consul were arrived in France with a new army; and (as soon as he came, to discharge and dismiss all the souldiers home to their houses except 5000 men: forasmuch as this number was thought sufficient to govern the Province about Arimi-

The Prætors of the former year continued still Commanders of their armies. Cn. Sergius was employed to see and take order, that certain lands should be set out for those souldiers who had served many years together in Spain, Italy, and Sardinia. And Q. Minimus had in charge to go through with that inquisition of certain conspirators and traitors in the Brutians country, upon which he had siven already as Prætor with great fidelity and diligence: and also to send unto Locor to receive due punishment of those prisoners, whom being attainted and convicted of a felony, he had first bound to Rome. And finally, to cause all the treasure taken out of the Temple of Proserpin, to be restored thither again, with an over-encrease, to make satisfaction and to raise out the wicked part committed. The Latine feasts and holy daies were solemnized again by virtue of an ordinance of the Bishops, upon this occasion, That certain Embassadors from Arden complained in the Senat; how they had not their ordinary allowance of flesh at the Latine feasts abroad in the mount Alba, according to the old custome. News came from Suesia, that two of their City gates, and all the wall between, was smitten with lightning. Messengers also from Formia reported that their Temple of Jupiter was likewise blighted. Moreover, they of Ostia brought word of the like mischance with them in the Church of Jupiter. And from Velutridings came of the like mishap, fallen upon the Temples of Apollo and Sanguis. And that in the Temple of Hercules there sprung up a bush of hair. Letters came also from Q. Minimus the Pro-Prætor out of the Brutians country that there was a colt foaled with five feet, and three chickens hatched with three feet apiece. After all this, P. Sulpicius the Pro-Prætor sent letters from out of Macedony, containing among other matters this news, that there was a Laurell tree grew of it self in the poop of a galley.

The Senat in regard of all the former prodigious sights, ordained, that the Consul should sacrifice greater beasts, unto what gods he thought good: but about this last rehearsed, the Soothsayers that cry into beasts inwards, were sent into the Senat-house: and by direction of their answer, an Edict went forth, That the people should go in procession, and make supplications one day, and in all Temples and Altars of the gods there were sacrifices celebrated with great devotion.

The Carthaginians this year came to Rome with the first payment of the tribute imposed upon them: and forasmuch as the treasurers and receivers of the City made report, that the silver was not good and lawfull, and being brought to thertial, was found too light by one fourth part washed away: those Carthaginians were constrained to take up money of the bankers of Rome, and to make good the defect and loss of the silver above said. They put up a petition besides unto the Senat that it might stand with their good pleasure to re-deliver now their hostages. Whereupon an hundred of them were rendered back, and good hope there was of the rest, if so be they continued loyal and fast in their allegiance. And when they made a farther request in behalf of those hostages which were not delivered, that they might be transported from Norba (where they were not to their good liking and ease) to some other place, granted it was, that they might remove to Signia and Tarentum. In like sort, the Gaditans made humble suit, and obtained this liberty, that there should not be sent from the Romans captain to govern Gadets, any thing to the contrary in their covenant, concluded with L. Marcius Septimius, when they yielded themselves under the subjection of the Romans notwithstanding. Moreover, forasmuch as the Embassadors of Carthage made complaint, that they had not their full number of inhabitants, and that there were certain strangers entertained among them, not of their own nation, who bare themselves as Citizens: wherefore L. Cornelius the Consul was commanded to create three Deputies or Commissioners, called Municipes, to reform this disorder. And chosen there were for this purpose, Publius and Scipio Aelius, who had both of them the surname of Patris, and C. Cornelius Lentulus. This that was granted to them of Narria, was denied to the Embassadors of Cæssa, who likewise requested that the number of their inhabitants might be increased.

The affairs thus handled at Rome that there were to be done, the Consuls went into their severall Provinces. C. Cælius soon as he was arrived in Macedony, was welcomed at his first coming with a dangerous mutiny of the souldiers, which long after being kindled, was not well quenched.

at the first beginning. These were those two thousand, which after the defeat of Annibal, were sent out of Africa into Sicily; and from thence, a year after almost, transported into Macedony for voluntary soldiers; but they themselves stood stoutly to it, that it was no voluntary act of theirs, but that they were shipped by their Colonels and Tribunes full against their wills. And howsoever it was, whether they served willingly or unwillingly, it was but meet and good reason, that the time of their soldiery should run out, and their service have an end at length. Alledging, that for these many years they had not seen Italy; that they waxed old men under their harness, having born arms in Sicily, in Africa, and in Macedony; that with toil and travel so tedious, they were weak and feeble; and after so many wounds and hurts received, they had no more blood to lose. The Consul made them answer, that their cause was good and reasonable, but marred in the handling; and meet he thought it, that they should be dismissed, if they could have requested it in modest terms; but neither it, nor any cause else whatsoever was warrantable to make a mutiny and sedition. Therefore, if they could be content to keep to their colours, and be at command as loyal soldiers, he would in their behalf write his letters unto the Senat, as touching their conge and dismissal: for be they well assured, that they shall get more by sober and gentle behaviour, than by any such stubborn, forward, and willful demeanour.

At the same time Philip besieged the City of Thaumaci with terraces & manlets in all forcible manner, so that he was now at the point to batter & shake the wall with the ram. But the sudden arrival of the Ætolians enforced him to increase his enterprise; who by the conduct of Archibulus having passed through the midst of the Macedonian guards, & entered the town, never ceased day nor night to make sallies forth, one while upon their standing watch, otherwhiles upon their fabricks & engines. The natural situation of the place yielded them good help and vantage: for the town of Thaumaci is seated on high to arms thinking as he goeth from Pyle & the gulph of Malaba by the way of Lamia & sheweth it self aloft, seeming to overlook & command the straight passage of the torrells called Calv. Again, when one travelleth over the craggy places and the crooked wyes entangled with so many windings in the vallies of Thessaly, and is approached once near to the City, all on a sudden he may discover before him a mighty large and open plain, as it were a wide and vast feld, so as a man shall have much ado to reach with his eye so far as these downs upon every way under him and see all over them. And hereupon by reason of this strange and marvellous prospect, the City is called Thaumaci. Over and besides that the high grounds afford it security, it standeth also upon a huge rock, divided into divers crags and broken cliffs. These difficulties forced Philip to give over his attempt, and namely, when he considered and weighed withall that the town it self when it was won, would not quit the painful labour, and pay for the danger about it. Besides the winter was now at hand, when he departed from thence, and retired his forces into Macedony, there to harbor. Where, when all others, during the time that they could catch any repose and rest, refreshed their spirits and bodies with some recreations and sports; Philip only how much respite soever he had, either of intermission or remission from continual labour of marching in journey, and fighting in battell; so much more trouble he had in his mind while he couched and discoured with himself, what the total and final issue might be of this war; while he stood not only in fear of the enemies, who persecuted him by sea and land, but also in doubt, as well of the heaits of his allies, as of the affections of his own subjects: lest the one in hope of the Romans friendship should revolt, and the other (even the Macedonians themselves) detest novelties, and long for a change. Therefore he addressed his Embassadors into Achaia, both to exact an oath of the Achaians for their allegiance (for they had capitulated in the accord and agreement made yearly to swear fealty unto Philip); and also to deliver into their hands, Orchomenus, Herica, and Triphylia. And when they demanded also Aliphera, the Embassadors answered, that the City never pertained to Triphylia, but that of right it ought to be restored unto Philip: as being one of them, which in the general council and assembly of the Arcadians, were assigned and set out for the building of Megalopolis. And thus verily he entertained firm alliance with the Achaians. As for the Macedonians he quickened their hearts unto him; by occasion of Heracles: for seeing that by means of him he incurred their exceeding ill will and hard conceits, and that he was changed with many grievous crimes, he cast him in prison to gratifie his own bloodie desires: where the people took great joy, and heeded content. Then made he preparation for war, with an earnest desire, as at any time before: he exercised as well the Macedonians as mercenary soldiers in pay, namely to wear their armor and handle their weapons; & in the very prime of spring, he sent all his footmen and light armed soldiers, under the leading of Athenagoras into Boeotia by the way of Eretria, to seize upon the straight passage near to Antigonis, which the Greeks call Stena. Himself six daies after followed with his main army more heavily appointed. And when he had well viewed & considered the situation of the country, and how it lay, he judged that the quarter coaling upon the river Aoni was the meetest place to fortifie and encamp in. This river between two hills the one by the peasants of the country called Eropus the other Apsalus, runneth within a narrow vale, and yieldeth but small passage upon the bank side. He commanded Athenagoras to gain and fortifie Apsalus with his light armed soldiers: himself encamped upon Eropus. And took what way as the hill was fenced with broken and cragged rocks, there he kept a small guard of some few soldiers: but whereas there was more danger, and easier access for the enemy, he fortified with trenches, rampiers, and bulwarks. He planted also and disposed in convenient places a great number of engines to send out quarrels and other shot, for to keep the enemies aloof, about the steep pavilion of the King himself was pitched before the rampier upon a bank in a most conspicuous place of open sight, for to terrifie the enemy, and also to encourage and hearten his own men, when they should see him so confident and resolute. The Consul advertised by Charops the Ephorus, what passages the King with his army was possessed of, after he had passed the winter in Coryra, himself likewise in the beginning of Spring, went up into the main land, and held on his march toward the enemy. And being advanced almost within five miles of the Kings camp, he took his legions in a strong fenced place, and went himself in person forward with certain lightly appointed in epical to discover the quarters. And the morrow after held a consultation, whether he might do better to assay to pass through the place which the enemy kept (notwithstanding he saw evidently before his eyes great trouble and hazard in that adventure) or to bring his army about and let him a compass the same way, whereas the year before Scipio entered into Macedony. This deliberation he did him for certain daies in even balance and suspense, until new mess came unto him that T. Quintus was created Consul; and having the Province of Macedony allotted unto him made haste thither and was already passed to Coryra.

Vulturnus Aulus writeth how Villius was entr'd the pass aforesaid & because he could not take the straight and direct way (by reason that the King and his forces had beliet all places) followed the valley along through the middle whereof the river Aoni runneth; and having made a bridge over it, in great haste passed over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there fought a bloody battell wherein the King was dismissed and put to flight, and driven out of his camp: that 12000 enemies were slain in that conflict, 1200 taken prisoners, 132 engines won and carried away besides 200 horse. Also that during the combat there was a Temple vowed unto Jupiter, in case the Consul might pass well in the battell. But all other writers both Greek and Latine, at least write whote Annals I have read, report that Villius performed no memorable act, and that the Consul T. Quintus who next succeeded, took in hand the whole and entire war himself.

Whiles things thus passed in Macedony, the other Consul L. Lentulus who staid behind at Rome, held a general assembly for the election of Censors. And among many famous and noble persons who sued for that dignity, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and P. Aelius Paetus were created Censors. These two agreeing together in great concord, both elected a Senat without defaming any person; and also limited out the toll or portage of all things that were sold at Cypria: Item, they let & to farm let the toll for passage that way whereas the camp stood and where now there is a town built and enroled three hundred Colonies (for that number was limited by the Senat) there to inhabit. They sold also the lands of Copa lying under the hill T. F. A.

About the same time L. Marcus Acidinus departed out of Spain, and was prohibited by M. Porcius Cato a Tribune of the Commons, to enter at his return into the City with the solemn pomp of an Quation notwithstanding he had that honour granted by the Senat. So he came in to Rome as a private person and brought into the Chamber of the City 1200 pound weight of silver, and thirty pound weight well near of gold. The same year Cn. Babius Tullianus, who had received the Province of France from C. Aurelius the Consul of the former year, engaged himself faithfully within the marches of the French Inhabitants, and was environed and enclosed and smothered both he and in manner his whole army. He lost above 6600 men. See what an overthrow was effected in a war, whereof there was no reckoning made, and from whence no danger was feared any more. This caused L. Lentulus the Consul to come out of the City of Rome, who being arrived into a Province full of trouble and tumult, after he had received the charge of distressed and distressed army, gave the Prator a great check and rebuke, & took him up roundly with reproachful terms, yes, and commanded him to get him gone out of the Province, and to repair to Rome. Neither performed the Consul himself any exploit worthy of remembrance by reason that he was called home to Rome for to hold the solemn election of Magistrates: which also was staid by M. Fulvius, and M. Curius Tribunes of the Commons: who likewise would not suffer T. Quintus Flamininus, having been but Quator for to stand for a Consulship. "Now adies, say they, the dignities of Ædiles and Prators are bought for by, and not worth the seeking for: and these Prators will needs mount into the Consuls place, nor by steps and degrees of other offices, wherein they should make proof and give good testimony what their carriage is, but leaping over those in the midst, joyning the lowest and highest together. This debate which began in Mars field in the assembly of the people, came at length to be decided before the Senat. And the Æd ordained, That forasmuch as he which sued for that dignity, was by law capable thereof: it was just that the people should have plenary and absolute power to create him, or whomsoever they pleased, so the Tribunes submitted themselves under the authority of the Senat. And forsook, were elected Sex. Aelius Paetus, and T. Quintus Flamininus. Then ensued the election of the Prators, in which were created L. Cornelius Merula, M. C. Claudius Marcellus, M. Porcius Cato, and C. Helpius, who had been Ædiles of the Commons. By whom the Plebeian places were renewed, and a solemn feast made in the honour of Jupiter in regard of those places. The Curule Æd likewise C. Fulvius Placcius, who also was the Flamine Dial or Priest of Jupiter, and C. Cornilius Cethegus, exhibited the Roman games with great magnificence. The great Pomices or Þhopos Þurinus Scipio and L. Gallia died that year: in whose places were entailed M. Aemilius Lepidus and Cn. Cornelius Scipio. Now when Sex. Aelius Paetus and Titus Quintus Flamininus the Consuls were entered into their Magistracy, they assembled the Senat in the Capitol: where the Consuls were created, that concerning the two Provinces of Macedony and Italy, the Consuls should either either agree between themselves, or else cast lots whether of them should govern the one or the other: And that he, whose hap was to have the charge of Macedonia, should enroll of Romans three thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen: Also of Latine allies five thousand foot, and five hundred horse, for to supply and furnish out the legions. And for the other Consul it was decreed, that he should have an army all entire and new. L. Lentulus the Consul of the former year, continued still Governour in the Province, with express commandments, that neither himself should leave the government, nor withdraw his forces from thence, before the Consul were come with the new legions. So the Consuls referred themselves to the direction of the lots. Titius fell Italy and Macedonia to Quintus. As for the Prætors, who all were guided by lots, L. Cornelius Merula had the jurisdiction of the City of Rome, M. Claudius governed Sicily, To M. Porcius was allotted Sardinia, and C. Helvius his lot was to be L. Deputy in Gaul. After this they began to take musters. For over and besides the Consular armies, the Prætors also were charged to levy soldiers. To Marcellus were assigned four thousand footmen of Latine allies, and three hundred horsemen to go into Sicily. And for Cato three thousand foot of the same kind of soldiers with two hundred horse to serve in Sardinia: upon condition, that when both these Prætors were come into their Provinces, they should discharge all the old soldiers there, as well footmen as horsemen.

Then the Consuls granted the Embassadors of King Attalus leave to come into the Senate-house: where having audience given them, "after they had declared how their King and Master had assisted the State of Rome with his forces as well by sea as land, and shewed himself clear, full, ready, and obedient to this present day for to execute and perform whatsoever the Roman Consuls had enjoined him to do: they said now that they much feared lest from henceforward he would not be able to do the same by reason he was impeached by Antiochus. For Antiochus taking his vantage, and finding the realm of Attalus disarmed of garrisons, and unprovided of forces both by sea and land, had invaded the same. For which occasion Attalus besought the LL. of the Senat there assembled, that if they minded to use his navy, and employ the means that he could make, in the service of the Macedonian war, they would then send him a sufficient garrison to defend his kingdom: but if they thought not well thereof, his request was to permit himself to return with his fleet and other forces to the defence of his own. The Senat gave order to return this answer unto the Embassadors: "Whereas King Attalus had succoured the Roman Captains with his Armado and other means of war, the Senat accepted thereof as the best part. But as touching Antiochus the King, an ally and friend of the people of Rome, they neither would send any aid against him: nor yet detain the aids of King Attalus in any service of theirs, longer than the King himself should think it flood with his own commodity. For the manner of the people of Rome hath alwaies been to serve their own turn with the help and assistance of others, but yet at the good pleasure and discretion of others. And whosoever were willing to relieve the Romans, they were at their own liberty to begin and end when they would themselves. Howbeit they purposed to address their Embassadors unto Antiochus to advertise him and let him understand, that the people of Rome employed the help of Attalus his ships and soldiers against Philip a common enemy: and the Senat would take it kindly at his hands, if for their sakes he forbore the Realm of Attalus and abstained from war. For meet and reason it was, that the Kings who were friends and allies to the people of Rome, should likewise entertain peace and amity among themselves.

T. Quintus the Consul made haste to be gone into his Province: and when he had levied and mustered his soldiers so, as that he had enrolled thoe old experienced levitours for the most part, who had given good proof of their valour in the service of Spain and Affrick, he was determined to leave Rome by occasion of certain prodigious signs reported. untill he had taken order for the appeasing of the gods, and expiation of them. The lightning forked and blasted the great port way from Venus: the Common Hall likewise of publick assemblies, and the Temple of Jupiter in Lanuvium: also the Temple of Hercules in Ardea: the walls besides and turrets of Capua, and the Temple there which is called Alla. At Arretium the sky appeared to be on a light fire. N. At Vulturne the earth fed and sunk down, leaving a great gaping chink for the compass of three acres of ground. Word moreover was brought, that in Suessa Apurina a lamb was yeared with two heads: and in Sinessa a porker with a mans head. In regard of these prodigies, there was a procession and supplication one whole day, and the Consuls intended devoutly to their sacrifices: and after they had pacified the gods, they took their journey into their Provinces. Titius together with C. Helvius the Prætor went into France and gave unto the said Prætor the army which he received of L. Lentulus, and should have dismissed and discharged of their service: because he purposed himself to employ in his own wars the fresh and new legions which he brought with him: but he performed no action worth the report. The other Consul T. Quintus having taken the sea, and departed from Brundisium sooner than other Consuls were wont, arrived at Corycia with eight thousand foot, and eight hundred horse. From thence he crossed the seas with a gale of five ranks of oars, directing his course for the nearest coasts of Epirum: and by great journeys made haste untill he was come to the Roman camp: from whence after he had licensed Vilius to depart, and laid there some few daies, untill his forces which were at Corycia, could overtake him, he called his Council together to resolve, Whether he should keep on his journey directly, and make way through the midst of his enemies where they lay encamped, or rather without any such

A such attempt (which could not but carry with it great pain and peril) fetch a compass about with safety, and to enter into Macedonia by the way of the Dardanian country and Lingus. And verily this latter course of the twain had taken place, but that he feared, when he were retired once far from the sea, and had let the enemy slip out of his hands, if the King haply were minded (as he had done before) to defend himself within the defents and forests, that he should spend all the long summer and do no good. Therefore come what would of it he resolved to assail the enemy in that very place as difficult as it was, with all the disadvantage whatsoever. But as they determined in their intention thus to do, so they were not so ready in the means to execute and effect the same. Thus they sat still and spent to by daies within the eye of the enemy, and made no attempt. Then Philip conceived some hope to assuage a peace, by the means and intercession of the Epirot B. nation. And after consultation had there were certain agents chosen for that purpose to wit, Pausanias the Prætor, and Alexander General of the horse: who brought the Consul and the King together for to part, unto a place whereas the river Jonis is narrowest, and the banks nearest together. The demands of the Consul in sum were these: That Philip should remove his garrisons out of the Cities Irem, that whose territories or towns he had pillaged and spoiled, he should make reparation again unto them all those things that were extant and so be found: as for the rest, they should be prized and valued indifferently to their worth. Philip made answer again, "That all those peeces were not of like quality and condition. As for such as he had taken himself, he would be content to let them at liberty: but for those that were left unto him by his progenitors and predecessors, he would not forgo the possession thereof, since he held them lawfully in right of inheritance. Finally, if those Cities wherewith he had warred made complaint, that they were ever endangered by him, he would report himself to what Cities and States they would themselves, and stand to their award, so they were neutrals, or in peace as well with the one side as the other. The Consul hereunto replied and said, That for this matter it was needless to refer themselves to the arbitrement or doom of any. For who seeth not evidently (quoth he) that he hath done the wrong who first took arms? And that Philip before eye that he was molested and troubled by any war from others, offered violence first unto all? After when it was debated what Cities should be free, the Consul named first of all Thessalonice, that which word the King was in such a heat of choler that he cried out aloud "What harder condition O Quintus would you impose upon him that you had vanquished? and withall, he swung away in a chafe from off the place of meeting and interview, and would no longer stay. And much ado they had on both sides to hold their hands from shooting one at another, for the river ran in the midst between them that they could not try it out by the ears. The morrow after they passed many light skirmishes between the corps de guard on both parts by way of excursions, first in a plain that lay out broad enough for that purpose: but afterwards as the Kings men retired themselves into the narrow straight and rough rugged places, the Romans of an ardent desire to be fighting, endured this: soon after, The Romans had on their side the benefit of good order and military discipline and were furnished with such kind of weapons as were fit for to maintain a skirmish in a close battell. The enemies again for their parts had the vantage of the ground, and the help of sundry engines to call forth that afar off (as ballists and catapults) planted and ranged almost upon every cliff and rock: as it had been upon the walls of a City. After they had on both sides given and taken many a wound, so as divers of them were left slain on the earth, as if they had fought in a full battell the night at length parted them asunder.

Things thus standing in these terms, there hapned a certain herdman sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots to be brought before the Consul: who gave him to understand that he kept cattle grazing in that forest (which then was overspread with the Kings pavilion) and knew all the fanks, all the windings, turnings, and blind waies of thole mountains: promising, that if he would send out a band of soldiers with him, he would conduct them thorow a place that was neither dangerous, nor yet difficult and hard of ascent: which if they had once gained, they should be over their enemies heads and able to command them. And these things (quoth he) you may safely trust upon: for Charopus willed me to make declaration, That he could with you the Consul were Matter of all rather than any other. The Consul was desirous to believe all, but did not credit him. And thus being troubled in spirit, whiles he entertained in his heart both joy and fear together, at length the authority of Charopus induced him to resolve and give the advantage of this hope thus offered and presented unto him. And to the end that the enemy might distrust and suspect nothing, for two daies following he never ceased to assail and provoke him; setting companies of armed soldiers in every place, to charge upon him, and ever seconding them with fresh men to succeed in the place of the wearied. After this, he delivered to a Tribune of Colonel four thousand chosen footmen, and three hundred horsemen: with this direction, to lead forward the Cavalry, as far as the ground would give leave: and when they were come once to a place where the horsemen could not pass nor march farther, then to plant them in some plain and even ground: willing the footmen to march on as the guide should lead them and point out their way: but after they were mounted above the enemies heads, according as he undertook and made promise, then to give a sign by smok, and not to shout and to set up a cry untill one might guess that upon signal of battell by him given, the battell was begun. And the Consul gave commandment to march by night (for as good hap was, the Moon was at full, and shone all night long) and take their recreation and sleep in the day time. As for the guide aforesaid, he

he made upon him many fair and large promises if it might appear, that he meant truth, and dealt faithfully: howbeit in the mean time he delivered him bound to the custody of the said Colonel. When these companies were thus sent away, the Roman General travelled and endeavoured to catch the more to gain vantage of the enemies' guards. All this while the Romans that were sent out with the Colonel, marched forward; and upon the third day, when they had given rest by smothering that they had won the pitch of the hills as they intended, and held it till then the Consul divided his forces into three squadrons, and entered the midst of the valley with the main strength of his army, but he led forth the wings of his battell, both the right and the left, against the very camp of the enemies. Who also for their parts were not behind to re-encounter and receive him. And all the whiles that they advanced without their fortifications of defence upon a hot desire of conflict it fell out, that the Roman soldier had the better a good deal, as being more valourous, & more skilful, and better appointed with weapons for that kind of service. But after that the Kings' soldiers, who many were wounded or killed outright, retired themselves to places of safety, either by natural situation or by art of man the danger returned upon the Romans heads, who inconsiderately were engaged into places of disadvantage, and into narrow streights, from whence they could not retire with ease. And surely they had not returned back again unpunished for their rashness, but that the Kings men hearing first an outcry behind their backs, and seeing also a skirmish begun, were astonished at the sudden terror, and put besides themselves. Some fled here and there away, others that made a stand and carried ill, for that they rather wanted ground to flee than had heart enough to fight it out, were environed by their enemies both before and behind. The whole army might have been utterly defeated, if the winners had lustily followed the chase. But the straightness and the roughness of the waies hindered the horse, and the weight of armor cumbered the footmen. At first the King rode amain with bridle in horse neck without regard of any thing, of looking behind him: but after he was got five miles before & guessing (as it was indeed) that by reason of the disadvantage of the place the enemy could not pursue him, he was afterwards reposed upon a certain mount and sent his people all abroad over hills and dales, to rally his soldiers together that were dispersed. Thus with the loss not all out of two thousand men the rest of the multitude met together, as if they had repaired to a Rendezvous upon some signal given, & so marched with a great train into Thessaly. The Romans pursued them as fast as they might with safety, killing them and rifling the dead, and ransacked the Kings camp which though it were naked without defendants, yet for the difficult access unto it, they had much trouble to win; & that night they lodged in their own camp. The next day the Consul made pursuit after the enemy along the straightness, whereas the river runneth among the valleys. The King came the fifth day unto the bold or camp of Perrus (a place so called in Triphalia belonging to the territory of M. Ionia: From whence the morning after he made a mighty journey with his whole army (for needs he must go that way) & approached the mountain Lunges. These mountains are in Epirus, situate between Macedonia and Thessaly. The side that lieth to Thessaly regardeth the East: that which butteth upon Macedonia hath the North directly before it. Covered they are and overgrown with abundance of woods, yet so as the very tops do afford open plains and running waters. The King keeping his camp there for certain daies, was much troubled and perplexed in his mind, calling and revolving, whether it were expedient for him to return immediately into his own kingdom, or possibly to retire himself into Thessaly. In sum, his resolution was to bring down his army into Thessaly, And to do so he had the next way he possibly could. From thence he passed in great haste through all the Cities that were in his way. As many men as were able to follow, he forced to quit their habitations and dwelling houses. The towns he set on fire: yet he permitted every one to carry away with him as much as he could of his own goods: all the rest fell to the soldiers share. No manner of cruelty there was, that the very enemy could exercise, but he praised among his own allies. And Philip himself in the execution thereof, grieved not a little, and was vexed at the heart: but alas he could do no other: yet his desire was in that country which within a while should be possessed by the enemy to further the bodies at leastwise of his associates. In this manner were ransacked & spoiled their towns following, Phacium, Treife, Eubadium, Exeris, & Palaphatu. Against his coming to Phae the gates were shut upon him. And because it would ask some time to win that town by assault and no sure he had thereto, he gave over that enterprise, & passed into Macedonia: for the bruit went that the Aetolians also approached. Who having heard of the issue of the battell fought by the river Aous, first waited and ransacked all the country near unto Sperchia and Tharra: Come (as they call it) and having from thence passed over into Thessaly, won Gyphus and Angora with the first assault. Howbeit, a repulse they took at Maropoli, whilst they harried the fields about it by reason that the townsmen ran together to the defence of their walls. After this they gave the attempt upon Calithora, where they found the like resistance and violence of the enemies: but there they persisted longer, and gave not over, nay, they draw the enemies that stood forth within their walls at contenting themselves with that victory, they departed thence seeing no great hope to force the town. Then they won and pillaged two villages, Therma and Calubana. As for Achara, it was surrendered by composition. And upon the like fear Xonia also was abandoned of her own inhabitants. These Citizens thus driven out of their own houses, stumbled at a venture upon a garison which was a leading into Atthamania, for the better speed of the foragers that were to purvey corn. This multitude, I say, marching disorderly without armour, pell mell together, with a sort that were unmeet for war, was hewn in pieces by

As by the armed soldiers, and Xonia was sacked, thus left and forsaken as it was. After this, the Aetolians won Gyphus a fort and town of strength, well seated for to encompass and command Dolopia. These exploits performed the Aetolians hastily in a few daies. Neither did Aminander nor the Athamans quiesce till, after they heard the news of the prosperous battell which the Romans had fought. But Aminander reposing small trust in his own soldiers, craved of the Consul a small supply of other forces: and as he marched toward Gomphi, he surprised forthwith and tor, ed a town named Phaceliatu between Gomphi and the straightness that divide Thessaly from Atthamania. From thence he advanced before Gomphi, and assailed the town, which was defended right valiantly for certain daies: but after that he had ended all his ladders against it, he forced the townsmen within, for very fear to yield and render all into his hands. The surrender of this City terrified the Thessalians exceedingly: in such sort, that the Cities of Argenta, Pherium, Thina and Lisina Stimons, and Lampsum, one after another submitted themselves, with other peeces thereby of small importance. Whiles the Athamans and Aetolians (secured from all danger of the Macedonians) made spoil and raised again to themselves by the victory of others: whiles Thessaly was pillaged and sacked by three armies at once, and knew not their friends from their foes, nor whom to trust: the Consul passed over into the country of Epirus, by the way of the straightness which he had opened and made clear by reason that the enemies were fled. And albeit he knew full well which way all the Epirots in general went, and with whom they had sided, excepting only Prince Charopus, yet because he law them not only careless to make amends and satisfaction, but also willing and forward to do whatsoever he commanded, he esteemed, and regarded them by their present state, more than by their demeanor past, and so by shewing himself inclined to mercy and ease to pardon a fault, he won their hearts and gained them unto him for the time to come. After this he dispatched messengers to Corcyra, to wit that the kauls and ships of burden should put into the gulph of Ambracia, whilst himself travelled by ease journey: and the fourth day after pitched his tents upon the hill Cerevius: and thither he sent for Aminander to repair with his aids, not for any need he had of his forces, so as much as of his guidance to direct him in his journeys for Thessaly. Most of the Epirots also, for the same intent were received, who voluntarily offered their help and assistance. The first City that he assailed in Thessaly was Phaleria, wherein there lay a garison of two thousand Macedonians. Who at first held out and resisted most manfully, and as much as either armor or the walls were able to do, defended themselves. But the assault & battery continuing incessantly both night and day, overcame at length the constant and resolute valour of the Macedonians. For the Consul made this reckoning, that upon this point depended the heards and dispositions of all the other Thessalians: if the first should not be able to abide the violence and force of the Romans, Phaleria was no longer won, but thence came Embassadors from Maropoli and Pura to render up their Cities into his hand, who gave pardon and returned it, Phaleria was burnt and sacked. From thence he set forward to Egium, but seeing that place defensible with any small garison, and in manner impregnable, he bestowed some small force of dris upon the next camp of guard, and turned his army toward the country again: Gomphi and from thence he marched down into the Plains of Thessaly. And because his army was diminished of all necessities (for that he had forborn to make spoil in the territories of the Epirots) he had sent out emissaries afore, to discover whether the hulks abo, said were arrived at Laracra or Ambracia, he sent out his companies one after another to Ambracia for to purvey corn and victuals. The way between Gomphi and Ambracia, as it is cumbersome and hard for passage, so to gain, it is but short and very pernicious. So that within few daies he had transported certain convoys of victuals from the port of Ambracia, whereby the camp was stored with plenty of all provision. From thence he passed to Rhages, a town almost ten miles distant from Larissa. The Citizens thereof are defended from Perrus and Phacia and the City is self seated upon the river Peneus. The Thessalians were nothing afraid at the first coming of the Romans. As for Philip, like as he durst not himself in person march forward into Thessaly, so having taken a place within Tempe, which he held with a standing camp, he elided into what quarters the enemies intended to go, and ever as he could find opportunity and advantage, sent underhand succour and relief thither accordingly. Much about the same time that the Consul first encamped against Philip in the straightness of Epirus, L. Quinctius also, the Consul his brother, who by commission from the Senat had the charge of the fleet and the government of all sea-coasts, sailed beyond Corcyra with two Gallies of five banks of sail: and bearing that the navy was departed from thence seeing also there was no staying there, he made full sail after space, and having overtaken them at the Ile Zamma he dismissed Apollonius in whole place, he succeeded: from thence he went fair & softly haling after him the most part of the ships which followed with the provision of victuals, until he came to Mileta. From whence, when he had given order, that the rest should make as good speed as possibly they could, he went with three Quinquerees lightly appointed, and arrived before at Pyrænium, where he received the other ships that L. Apollonius the Lieutenant had left there for the guard and defence of Adens. At the same time there were two Armadoes set out of Aisa, the one conducted by King Asius, consisting of four and twenty (all of Quinquerees: the other were of Rhodians, and stood of twenty covert ships with decks and hatches, commanded by Agimbrotus the Admiral. These

These fleets, coming together about the Island Andros, crossed the narrow seas from distance to distance. And first they fortified the territory of the Cyprians: afterwards, seeing Corymbus strong enough against them by reason of a partition lent to them in all haste from Chalcis, they swooped on Chalcis, having intelligence that King Antalus was come, repaired thither also with Antalus, which had been at Pyrrhus, and gave commandment, that as many ships as were fit to be brought to his fleet, should bend their course for Euboea. Now was Euboea by all possible means attacked, for not only the vessels of three joyn't navies had brought thither all sorts of engines and artillery devised for to shake and batter the walls of Cities, but also the field and country hard by, yielded them plenty of timber, and other matter to make new. The towns-men from the very first day shewed no valour and courage in defending their walls: and afterwards when they were wearied, and some of them hurt, and saw withall a part of their wall overthrown by the ordinance and engines of the enemy, enclined to yield: but they had amongst them a generation of Macedonians, whom they feared no less than the Romans. Moreover, Philotas, a Captain under the King, sent messengers unto them from Chalcis, assuring them, that if they could hold out still and endure the siege, he would in good time be with them, and bring relief. Thus hope and fear together constrained them to drive off longer than either they were willing or well able to do. But when they heard once that Philotas had a repulse by the way, and in great haste and fear was retired and fled to Chalcis again, then immediately they sent their Embassadors unto Antalus to crave pardon and protection. Whiles they were wholly bent to seek peace (whereof they had some hope) and forelacked the affairs of war-service, opposing their corpe quid on that side only of the wall where the breaches were, and neglecting all besides, behold, Quintus in the night, leagued a camifado in that quarter which was least suspected, and with scaling ladders won the town. The whole multitude of the inhabitants fled with their wives and children into the Castle, which also afterwards was rendered up. As for money, gold, and silver, there was no great store to speak of: but Images, and painted tables of antique work, artificially wrought, and such like ornaments, there were more found, than for the proportion of the bigness, or other wealth besides, of such a City as that was. From thence they set sail once again for Corymbus, where the whole multitude, before the enemies were put on land, having abandoned the City, were fled into the forests: from whence they sent their Orators unto the Roman General, humbly craving the intercession and protection. The townsmen presently had their lives and liberties granted them. But the Macedonians were put to their ransom, and they compounded to pay three hundred silver talents, and to give up their armour and weapons, and so to depart: With this sum of money having redeemed themselves they were set out disarmed into Boeotia. These forces at sea having in few days gained two noble and renowned Cities in Euboea, coasted about Saintus, a promontory or cape within the territory of Attica, and arrived before Chenecra, a town of merchandise and traffick belonging to the Corinthians.

The Consul all this while had longer and more dangerous piece of service in the siege of Rhodes than all men looked for. And the enemies within made resistance, where he would have least of all suspected. For he supposed resty that all the trouble and difficulty would be in battering down the wall, and making some breach. For thus he thought, that if he had once opened way for his armed souldiers to enter into the town, the enemies afterwards would either flee or be slain, as it falleth out commonly in Cities when they are forced. Howbeit, when part of the wall by the battery of the Ram lay flat along, and the enemies were got over at the breaches & ruins thereof, then began their labour and pains anew, as if they had had no trouble nor toil aforesaid. For the Macedonians in garriſon, who were many in number, and those approved and select souldiers, thinking how honourable a service it would be to defend the City by valour and dint of sword, rather than by the strength of walls, had ranged themselves in a battell within, strongly manœuvred into many ranks and files close together, and when they perceived the Romans were mounting over the breaches to enter the City, they repelled and beat them back in that place of great disadvantage, where they had much ado to recover and resiste themselves. The Cos, hereat was much displeased, and vexed in himself: and making this account, that such a foul foil and disgrace was not only an occasion of a longer tract of time, before he could force that one City: but also material and important for the main progress and proceeding of the whole war, which commonly depended upon the occurrences of slight matters and of small moment in the beginning: after he had rid and cleared the place which was choaked up with the ruins of the half-broken wall, there upon he set a tower or frame of timber of a huge height to overtop the walls, composed of many stories and floors one over another, which contained and carried a mighty number of armed men, and drave the same upon wheels and rollers close to the wall. Moreover he sent out certain engines, one after another by turns, to break through by force (if it were possible) that strong and close battailon of the Macedonians (which they themselves call Phalanx). But the place being in strength (for that the breach of the wall was nothing broad) the enemies had the vantage both in regard of the weapons which they used, and of the form of battell wherein they were ranged. For when the Macedonians standing close one to another with a continued roof or fence of targets over their heads, opposed their pikes before them which were of an exceeding length: the Romans whether with their darts could hurt them at all, or not with their swords drawn come near them to fight close at hand, or cut their pikes in two: and if it chanced that they whipt off or snapt any under, yet the steel and trusture thereof thereof being sharp still at the point (headless though it were) among the other pikes that were headed, served to make a fence as it were an hay or palliade. Over and besides that part of the wall that stood whole and sound still, was a sure defence unto both flanks of the enemies: neither had the Romans any room at length to return, and from thence to fetch their beir, and to give a violent charge, which is the thing that usually breaketh and disordereth ranks. Moreover, there chanced one thing by meer fortune that encouraged them within: for as the tower aforesaid was in driving over a terrace or bank, whereof the floor was not fast and soundly hardened with the rammer, one of the wheels hapned to sink in and make a deep rout in the ground, whereby the whole frame nodded so forward that the enemies without thought verily it was ready to fall, and the armed souldiers standing upon it within, quaked for fear, and were put well-near besides their wits. Thus when nothing that was provided might avail and come to any great effect, the Consul was vexed at the heart, to see himself so over-matched in souldiers, in armour, and in manner of service: and withall he considered, that he had no help to force the City, and to win it in any short time, nor could make means to pass the winter in those parts so far from sea, and left naked already and waste by those calamities that follow ways. Whereupon he raised the siege: and because there was no haven in all the tract and coast of Acarnania and Etolia, which was able both to receive and harbour all his hulks that brought victuals for his army, and also to yield winter lodging for his legions; he thought upon the Isle Anticyra within the country of Phocis, which lying toward the gulph of Corinth, seemed to him most fit and commodious for his purpose: because they should not remove far from Theffaly, and the territories belonging to the enemies having besides Peloponnesus affront even over against them, divided but by a small arm of the sea: at their back Etolia and Acynania: and of each side Locris and Bœotia. At the first assault, the Consul without any resistance won Panopea in Phocis. Anticyra likewise long endured not the siege. Then Ambrysus and Hyampolis were received by composition, Daulis by reason that it was situate upon an high hill could neither be scaled nor forced by instruments and engines of battery. But the Romans by lancing their darts and shooting arrows against them that were in guard, trained them forth to skirmish: and after some light scuffings to no effect, whilst one while they seemed to flie, and other whilst to pursue, they brought them to be so careless, so negligent and so little respective, that when the enemies fled back within the gate, they entered pell-mell with them, and so were Masters of the town. Other small towns likewise of Phocis yielded rather for fear than any force offered unto them. Elatia kept their gates shut, and made a countenance, that unless they were driven thereunto, they would receive within their walls neither Roman captain nor army.

Whiles the Consul lay at the siege before Elatia, there was presented unto him the hope of a greater matter, namely of withdrawing the nation of the Acha from the Kings alliance to the amity of the Romans. For they had expelled and banished Cyclas the chief of that faction that sided with Phil: and Aristhenus who friended the Romans and fought to be confedered with them, was Prætor for the time.

Now the Roman Armado, together with Antalus and the Rhodians, rode at anchor in the haven of Chenecra, and they all were agreed in common to assail Corinth. But the Consul thought good, before that they should put that designment in action, to send Embassadors to the State of Achaia, promising, if they would revolt from the King and turn to them, to deliver Corinth into their hands: for to be incorporate into the ancient league and council of their nation. And so by the advice of the Consul, there were Embassadors addressed to the Achæans from his brother L. Quintus, from Attalus, the Rhodians, and the Athenians. And at Sicyone was there a Council held for to give them audience. Now the Achæans were not all of one mind and alike affected. The Athenians (a dangerous an ordinary, and continual enemy of theirs) put them in fear of one side: the Romans they had in dread and horrour of another. To the Macedonians they were obliged and bound by many good turns and favours, as well old as new. The K. himself they held in jealousy for his cruelty and treachery: and calling a proof and conjecture by those confutes which he then took, and by his practices for the time they foresaw well that after the war ended he would be intolerable and a very tyrant over them. They were besides not only ignorant, what every man had said in the several councils of every particular State, and in the general Diets of the whole nation, when they were required to deliver their opinions: but also uncertain and unresolved among themselves in their own minds what to will or wish. Unto men thus doubtfully disposed and unsettled, the Embassadors aforesaid were admitted, and license was given them to deliver their message. First the Roman Embassador L. Calpurnius: after him, those that were for King Antalus: and in the third place, the Rhodians spake and made discourse: and consequently, the Embassadors of Phil were permitted to parl. The Athenians had audience given them last of all, and were relieved of purpose to confute whatsoever should be spoken and alleged by the Macedonians. And these Athenians inveighed most sharply and bitterly against the King, for none had received either more wrongs, or suffered the like indignities at his hands as they had. So this assembly verily for that time by reason that the day was spent in hearing the continued orations of so many Embassadors brake up about sun setting. The morrow after they assembled again: where the Magistrates by the voice of the Beadle or publick crier (after the custome of the Greeks) gave liberty to every person to deliver his mind, and no man stepped forth. Great silence there was, and not a word among them for a long time, looking wisely one upon another who should begin first. And no marvel if they whose spirits were allotted in some sort within them, when they of their own accord cast and tossed in their minds things so different and contrary, were now more troubled and perplexed by those orations besides that had lasted all the long day, broaching, uttering, & advising many matters so harshly, so difficult, and impetuous unto them. At length, because the Council should not be diffolved without some speech and parl, Aristhenes the Prætor of the Achaëans began to speak, and said: "What is become (my Masters of Achaëa) of those hearts of yours and courageous stomachs, whereby at all your feasts and in your private meetings (when talk is ministered of Philip and the Romans) you can hardly hold your hands, but are ready to fly one in another's face? And now, when as this honourable Court of Parliament is published & holden for the same purpose only; when ye have heard the reasons & allegations of the Embassadors of all parts; when the Magistrates propound I the matter to be debated in council; when the publick crier calleth you to give your opinions, ye are mum and mute? If the regard of the common good and welfare of us all, will not cause you to open your lips; cannot the private respects and affections neither (which have inclined and carried your minds to the one side or the other) fetch out a word from any of your mouths? Considering especially, that no man is so gross and blockish, who can be ignorant that now is the very time or never for each one to say and deliver his mind as he will himself, and as he thinketh best, before we resolve and determine of any course: and when a decree or act is once passed, that all men are bound (even they themselves that before misliked it) to defend and maintain the same, as a good and profitable accord. This admonition of the Prætor was so far forth of drawing any one of them to utter his opinion, that it caused not so much as the least noise or humming in so frequent an auditory and congregation of so many States together. Then Aristhenes the Prætor began again and followed his speech in this manner: "It seemeth (my Masters & friends of Achaëa here assembled) that ye are not so much to seek for counsel and advice, but ye are as short of your tongues and loath to speak. And every one here is unwilling to provide for their general good, for fear lest he should incur some particular peril. My self likewise peradventure would be silent and hold my peace if I were a private person: But now being Prætor, I see thus much, That either there should have no audience at all been given unto the Embassadors, or else, that they ought not to be sent away from hence without an answer: and answer them how can I without your ordinance? now seeing that there is none of you all, who have been summoned hither to this Council, that either will or dare say a word to the cause: I let us examine thoroughly and consider well in lieu of your opinions, those speeches which yesterday were pronounced by the Embassadors: let us (I say) revise them too, as if they had not demanded those things which concerned their own good and commodity, but as though they proposed such points they esteemed profitable and expedient for us all. The Romans, the Rhodians, and King Antiochus require our alliance and amity: and in that war which they wage against Philip they think it reason to be aided from us. Philip again putteth us in mind of our society with him and of our oath. One while he requireth us to stand and band with him: otherwhiles he saith he will be content that we should sit still, and meddle neither one way nor other. Is there no man here indwelt with the reason, why they that are not yet our allies demand and crave more than he that is our ally already? Is it neither the modesty of Philip, nor the impudency of the Romans that is the cause hereof? The ports and haven-towns they be of Achaëa, which minister confidence and assurance to those demanders, and take away the same from them again. From Philip we see nothing but only an Embassador. The sea-forces of the Romans and their fleet, ride in the harbor of Cenchreae: they carry aloft them in shew the spoiles of the Cities in Eubœa. The Consul himself with his land-army of the legions we see disjoyined from us by a small arm only of the sea, ranging at their pleasure all over Phœcia and Locria. Marvell now longer if you can, why Chromedon the Embassador of Philip demanded erewhile so coldly and diffidently, that we should take arms for the King against the Romans: who, if we by verue of our same league and oath; wherewith he seemed to charge us in conscience, required of him again, that Philip should defend us both from Nabis and the Lacedæmonians, and also from the Roman mans: would be to seek not only of a garrison and power of armed men to shield us, but likewise of a very answer to shape us. And verily he would be no more ready to satisfy us, than Philip was himself the last year: who notwithstanding he frankly promised to levy war against Nabis & thereby offered to train and draw the flower of our youth from hence into Eubœa; after that he saw once that we neither agreed to send him that power, nor yet were willing to entangle our selves & be interested in the Roman war, forgot soon that society that now he hath death and verther so much of, and left us to the merry and devotion of Nabis and the Lacedæmonians: to be spoiled, pillaged, & wasted at their pleasures. And surely so much as I can conceive of (as Chromedon his Oration me thinks it hangeth not well together and one piece thereof setteth not well with another. He seemeth to speak of the Roman war contemptuously, as if it were a manner of nothing; saying the event & issue thereof would be like the former, which they maintained with Philip. How is it then that he keepeth himself away, and in his absence demandeth our help rather than with his personal presence protecteth us both from Nabis & the Romans? What say his ancient allies? But what speak I of us? Why hath he suffered them to go to force and ruin Thracia and Carthage? Why endured he, that so many Cities of Thracia should be lost? Could he abide Locria and Phœcia to be over-run, so as they are? And Elain now at this day

* Megropoli.

A "day so freightly besieged, and hotly assaulted? Why quit he the straits of Epirus, and abandoned those impregnable holds upon the River Aous, by force, for fear, of his own accord, or howsoever? and when he had forgone and disused himself of that pais which he held, why retired he into the inland parts of his realm for his safety? If willingly and of his own accord he abandoned to many of his allies, and left them to be spoiled and rancked by the enemy, what can he alledge or say for himself, why those allies afore said may not provide for themselves the best they can? If for fear, let him pardon us likewise if we be afraid. But if he were vanquished by force of arms, and therefore retired back, shall we, good Cleomedor, sustain and endure the Roman puissance and their mighty armies, against which ye Macedonians were not able to stand? Or, would you have us to believe you, that bear us in hand, how the Roman war not at this present, either with greater numbers or stronger forces than they have done heretofore, rather than trust our own eyes, and that which daily we see before our faces? In those daies they succoured the Aetolians with their navy, and warred neither under the conduct, nor with the army of a Consul. The maritime Cities of the confederats of Philip, were then in trouble and tumult: but all the mediterranean parts within the continent, were so secure and fortified from the Roman forces, that Philip spoiled and forraged the Aetolians, imploiring and seeking for help of the Romans, but all in vain. But now at this day the Romans having finished the Carthaginian war, which for sixteen years space they supported in the very heart and bowels of Italy, have not sent a garrison to succour and maintain the Aetolians in their wars, but are come themselves, as leaders and commanders General, and by Land and Sea at once have warred upon Macedony. And this is the third Consul of theirs, who at this present mainrained mortal war upon it, to the uttermost of his power. Sulpicius hath encountered the King in the midst of Macedony, bidden him battel, discomfited and put him to flight, after he had laid waste and desolated the wealthiest quarter of all his Kingdom. Quintus lately hath driven him out of camp and field, notwithstanding he were possessed of the freight avenues of Epirus, and bare himself boldly and confidently upon the natural situation of the ground, of his strong defences, and force of a complete army: and having pursued him as he fled into Thessaly, hath taken the garrison Towns of the King, and in manner within his own fight, won by mere force his confederate Cities. Suppose and say, that all those things which the Athenians erewhile have alledged concerning the cruelty, the avarice, and unbridled lust of the King, be not true, but (supposed standers) admit that those enormities and wicked parts committed within the Attick land, against the Gods of Heaven above, of the infernal spirits beneath, touch not us at all, and are much less pertinent, than those outrages which the Eleantians and the Abydens, so far remote from us, have endured. Forget we our selves, if ye will, the hurts, the wounds, and losses that we have received the murders the piling and rifling of the goods of Messina in the midst of Peloponnesus. * Marta Likewise, how his friend and host Gargæus at Cyprius, was killed against all Law of God and man, even in a manner sitting at the board with meat in his mouth. Say we nothing also of Attalus the father and son both Sicyonians, who were cruelly massacred; and yet he was wont to call the silly and wretched old man, Father. Also forbear we to speak of the ionic wife, who was carried away into Macedony, to make her his harlot and concubine, and to abuse her at his pleasure. Let other rapes of virgins, forcings of honorable dames be forgotten: let us imagine that we have nothing to do, nor to meddle with Philip for fear of whose cruelty ye were all so fure, and could not open your mouth. For what other cause of silence had ye, being called hither to this council? If we put the case, that we were to debate the matter with Antigon, that most mild and just Prince, at whose gracious hands we have received so many favours and pleasures above all other Kings: would he demand, think ye, that we should do that which possibly then could not be done? Peloponnesus is a demy Island, joined to the firm continent and main land by the narrow straight or bank of Isthmus, lying open and expoled to nothing more than to Sea-forces. If one hundred covert and decked ships with hatches, and fifty lighter vessels which are open, together with thirty Brigantines or foists of Issa, should come to pill and spoil our sea-coasts, and begin to assail our Towns and Cities that lie open upon the River, even on the very strand and Sea banks; should we retire our selves, think ye, into our Cities within the Land? Why? what else? As though we were not already afflicted and plagued with intestine war, which flourisheth even within our ribs and bowels? When Nabis and the Lacedæmonians by land, the Roman navy by Sea shall lie upon us, to do us all annoy, how should I call upon the Kings society, or for the help of the Macedonians? Or shall we of our selves, by our own strength and means save our Cities which shall be assaulted against the puissance and power of the Romans? For in the former war we bravely defended (did we not?) the City of Dyme. We have examples enough of the fearful calamities and losses of others, that we need not to make our selves examples unto others. Take heed (I beseech you) how you set light and disdain, that the Romans have of their own motive offered their friendship and alliance, which indeed ye were to wish for, and seek all that ever ye could. It is for very fear (no doubt) that they are driven, being in a strange land to flee unto you for your alliance, because they would gladly shroud themselves under the shadow of your wings, be harboured within your havens, and sustained by your victual and provision. No, no, Lords they are first of the seas who can deny it: there is not a land they set foot into, but immediately it is their own, and in subjection unto them: whatsoever they seem to request, they can command if they list. And because they are willing to spare and forbear you,

"therefore it is that they suffer you not to enter into any action that might be cause of your ruin "and overthrow. For whereas Cleomedon seemed to shew and lay before you a mean and "indifferent course, and that forthwith which should be the safest way, which you could take, name"ly, to enter into no arms at all, to sit still and sleep in a whole skin; that, I say, is no middle way, no
 "nor (to speak truth) any way at all. For besides this, that ye must either accept or refuse the alli"ance with the Romans; what else will become of us, but to be a prey unto the conqueror, having "lost the grace and favour both of the one and the other? as men that like neutrals, expecting the "issue of the war, frame our designments and counsels to the blind direction of fortune. Well, once "again I say, take heed you think not scorn of that which with all your heart you should wish;
 "and pray for only for that it is tendered and presented unto you. And never think, that because to"day you have the choice of both in your own hands, therefore ye shall ever have the same liber"ty hereafter. Occasions & opportunities are not always the same, neither do they continue long.
 "All this whiles have ye had a desire to save and free your selves from Philip, but evermore by "wishes & prayers in secret heart, rather than by taking arms in open hand. Now there are those "which with great armies & armadoes have passed the seas, who without your pain and peril are "ready to deliver you from his hands. These men, if ye reject and refuse for your allies, ye are not "well in your wits, & have them you must either your allies or your enemies, there is no remedy.
 "After this Oration of the Pretor, there arose a muttering and noise in the assembly, whiles some "approved and gave assent unto that which he said, others rebuked in churlish wise those that ac"corded. Insomuch, as they jangled not one with another in particular, but the very States there
 "assembled were at variance, yea, and this debate between the Magistrates of the whole nation
 "(whom they call Demiurgi, and ten they are in number) was as hotly maintained, as amongst the "multitude. Five of them said, they would propound unto the people, and debate with them in "council about accepting the alliance of the people of Rome, and put it to voices. The other five
 "protested, that this was directly against a law, in that case provided, forbidding expressly that no "Magistrats should either propound or determine ought in any Diet, prejudicial to the society and "league with Philip. Thus this day also spent in debating and wrangling, and nothing done.
 "There remained one day yet of a full Diet and Council, for by law they were to conclude and de"cree somewhat within three dayes at the farthest. Against that time, the parties were so hotly
 "bent one against the other, that the fathers could hardly forbear to offer violence to their very "children. There was one Rhipisalus of Pellea, a who had a son named Memnon; and he was a Demi"urgus, who took part and sided with them that would not permit the matter to be put to ques"tion, and determined by a scrutiny of voices. This Rhipisalus having instantly a long time importuned
 "his son, and besought him to induce the Achæans to provide for their weal publick, and not by his "peevish stowardness undo the state of the whole nation: when he saw once that all his prayers
 "prevailed nothing, he swore a great oath that he would kill him with his own hands, and not take "him for his son, but for an errant enemy. By which his menaces, he gained thus much in the end, "that consent he was the next day to joyn with them that put the matter to question: who now "being more in number than the other made a report and proposed the cause to the assembly: and
 "when all the States in manner there met, enquired thereunto, and approved thereof, so as they ac"cording openly what they would ordain: the Dyemeans, Megapolitans, and certain Argives, before
 "the decree was enacted, rose up all at once, and departed out of the assembly, and no man either "wondered at it, or blamed them for it. As for the Megapolitans, no longer ago than in their grand"fathers dayes, at what time as they were expelled out of their country by the Lacedæmonians, K. Ar"gigonis had restored them again. The Dyemeans being but lately taken prisoners, and ransomed by "the Roman army, Philip having given order that they should be redeemed wheresoever they were "in slavery and bondage, he not only let free, but also replanted in their own country. The Argives
 "last of all, besides that they are of a settled opinion and belief that the Macedonian Kings are de-"cended from them, were for the most part linked unto Philip in the right and regard of privat-"hospitality, and familiar friendship. In these respects, they went out of that assembly which inclined "to the contract of alliance with the Romans, and were held excused for this departure: being thus "obliged unto Philip the adverse part, by great favours and benefits, yea, and those newly received "at his hands. All the other States of the Achæans, when they were demanded their opinions, with"out delay confirmed by their immediate decree, the society with Attalus and the Rhodians: but "the league with the people of Rome, because it could not be ratified and established without the "Aid of the people, was referred and put off until the time that Embassadors might be sent unto "Rome. But for the present it was thought good that three Embassadors should be addressed unto
 "L. Quintinus, and that all the forces of the Achæans should march toward Corinth, for that Quintinus
 "having won the port of Cenchrea, was already at the siege and assault of that City.

These Achæans encamped themselves over against that gate that openeth toward Sicyone: the "Romans lay against that part of the City which looketh toward Cenchrea and Attalus having led "his army through the narrow strait of Isthmus, assailed them of Lechaia side, which is as haven "of the other Sea. At the first they made no hot assault, hoping that there would be some unity "between the Towns-men and the Kings garrison. But perceiving they were all of one mind and "resolution, and that both the Macedonians defended the City, as their own native country:
 "and also the Corinthians were content to bear the full command and direction of Androthous the "Captain of the garrison, as well as he had been their fellow-citizen, and lawfully chosen by

A their own election and suffrages: then the assailants had no other hope but in the violent force "of arms and engines. And of all sides they had rail banks and mures, and were come close to the "walls, although with hard access thereto. Now had the Ram, from that quarter where the Ro"mans lay, beaten down a good part of the wall. To which breach, because it lay naked without "defence, all the Macedonians ran to guard and defend by thrusting of arms: where there was a "crossfight between them and the Romans. At the first the Romans were looted repelled by means "of the great numbers of defendants: but after the succours of the Achæans and Attalus came unto "them, they received them with equal valour: neither doubted they but to be able with ease to "drive the Macedonians and the Greeks from their standings, and force them to retreat. But there "were within the Town a multitude of Italian fugitives revolted and fled from the Romans: part "of them, a residue left of Annibal his army: who having transgressed the laws, for fear of punish"ment were fled from the Romans and took part with Philip: part also were mariners and sea"ring men, who for hope of more honourable intertainment and service, had abandoned their ships,
 "and were gotten into the City of Corinth. These fellows put all hope of life, if the Romans haply
 "should have the better hand, and were more like mad men than hardy and audacious soldiers. Now
 "there is over against Sicyone a promontory of Iuno, which they call the Cape of Acroia, and it run"neth into the Sea: from whence the passage over to Corinth is a cut almost of seven miles. Thi"ther Philetes, a Captain also under King Philip, had conducted through Boetia 500 footsolders;
 "and certain Brigantines of Corinth were there ready to embark that supply of aid, and to transport "them to Lechaia. By this time Attalus advised to let on fire the engines and fabricks that they had "made, and presently to give over the siege. Quintinus persisted yet more obstinately in his enterprise "begun. But he also seeing the Kings guards ranged and quartered at every gate, and that if they "should but to fall out, their violence would hardly be restrained, was of the lame mind with At-"talus. So without effecting anything, the Achæans were dismissed, and the rest returned to their "ships, Attalus to Piræum, the Romans to Corycia.

During this service by Sea forces, the (other) Consul who lay in camp before Elania in Phocia,
 "first assaied to gain the City by conference and partly with the principal citizens thereof: but after "answer made, that it lay not in their hands, and that they who were for the King, outwent the "Towns-men both in number and strength: then at once, from all parts he gave an assault unto the "City both by force of arms, and also by engines of artillery. The Ram was bent against the walls, "and as much thereof beaten down with a mighty crash and fearful noise, as stood between the "Towers: whereupon the Town was dismantled and laid naked, and withal a cohort of Roman "soldiers entered at the open breach: so as from all parts the defendants abandoned their guards, "and ran to that place that thus was distressed by the enemies. And at one instant the Romans ad"vanced themselves over the breach, and let up scaling ladders against the wall which was standing "and whiles the enemies were armed wholly, and had their eye only upon that one place where "the conflict was, the wall in many parts was scaled, and armed soldiers mounted into the City.
 "At which sudden tumult and alarm, the armed men having quit the place which they guarded
 "with a thick troop fled all into the castle for fear; and the unarmed and naked multitude followed
 "after. Thus the Consul was master of the City: which being ransacked, he sent unto the Castle "certain messengers, promising life to as many of the Kings garrison as would depart away without "arms, and offering liberty to the Elians: and after security given hereto, within few dayes the "Castle also was rendered into his hands. Moreover, by the arrival of Philetes (a commander for "the King) in Achaia, not Corinth only was delivered from siege, but the City also of the Argives,
 "was by certain of the principal rulers betrayed unto Philetes, who before had sounded and solli-
 "cited the minds and affections of the common people. There was a custom in this City, that upon "the first day of their general assemblies, the Pretor should in token of good luck pronounce the "names of Jupiter, Apollo, and Hercules: and afterwards ordained it was besides by a law, that the "name of Philip should make up the fourth. Now after the alliance accorded between them and the "Romans, it hapned that the beadle or publick cryer left out the name of Philip: whereat the mul"titude first began to mutter and grumble: then arose a loud cry of those that put him in mind to "name the King, willing him to give him his honor due by law: until at last his name was also pro"nounced with great applause and consent. Upon the confidence and assurance of this favour *Phile-
 "tes* was sent for, who by night seized upon an hill that commandeth the City which commonly "is called the fort of Larissa: and having put a garrison there, the next morning betimes he ad"vanced forward with banner displayed, and came down toward the common place lying under the "forts and assailed: where there encountered him a band of armed men well appointed in order of "battail. These were the garrison of the Achæans lately there placed, to the number of 500 elect men "chosen forth of all the States of Achaia: and one Eusebidemus a Dyemean was their commander.
 "Unto him Philetes (one of the Kings Captains afore said) addressed a special messenger to per"suade and exhort him to quit the City: giving him to understand, That he and his Company
 "were not able to match the Town-men alone, who carried the same mind that the Macedonians
 "had done: much less then should they stand out when the Macedonians were joyned unto them:
 "the Macedonians (I say) whom the very Romans themselves could not sustain at Corinth. At "first he did no good either with leader or soldier: yea, and when within a while they beheld
 "the Argives also marching armed against them with a great troop from another part, and saw "present death before their eyes, yet it seemed they would have put it to the hazard of a conflict, and fought to the last man, in case their Captain would have stuck to it, and not relented. But Espeidimus for fear left together with the City, the flour of all the youth of Achaia should perish, capitulated with Philotes, that they might be permitted to depart and go their way: but himself kept his ground till in his armour, with some few of his followers and vassals, and removed not a foot. Then Philotes sent out unto him, to demand, What he meant thereby? Unto whom he gave no other words, but holding forth his shield before him made answer, That armed as he was he would live, and die in the guard and defence of that City which was committed to his charge. Then by the commandment of the Captains, the Thracians lanced their darts and shot at him, and so both he and the company about him were slain every one. Thus after the accord of alliance between the Achaeans and Romans, two most noble and famous Cities (Argi and Corinth) came under the subjection of the King. These were the acts achieved by the Romans as well by Land as Sea this summer.

In France there was no exploit performed worth remembrance by Sext. Elius the Consul, notwithstanding he had under his government two entire armies: the one that he retained till with him, which by order he should have discharged, and was the same that had before been commanded by L. Cornelius the Pro-consul, and now by him was committed to the charge of C. Elius, the other, that he brought himself with him into the Province. So that he employed the whole year almost in compelling the men of Cremona and Placentia to return into their Colonies, from whence by sundry casualties of war they were chased and dispersed. As France that year was in quiet beyond all hope and expectation, so about the City of Rome there had like to have been a commotion and tumult of bondslaves. The Carthaginian hostages were in guard and kept at Seia, where they had attending about them (as meet was for the children of the chief Nobles and Princes of Carthage) a mighty train and retinue of servants. The number of them was the greater by occasion of the late African war; during which time and presently after, the Seians also themselves had bought up many of that nation which were taken captives, and came in port-folio with the rest of the prizes. These having conspired together, sent out certain of their own company to solicit also the other slaves that were in the territory of Seia, and so forth, as many as they could find about Norba and Circeti. Their plot was, that when all things were provided beforehand, they should upon the very day of the solemn games and plaies (which shortly were to be exhibited and set forth in Seia) take the opportunity of the time, when as the people were busy in beholding the spectacle and shew repented unto their eye, and to run upon them: and when they had by massacre in this sudden hurlyburly possessed themselves of Seia, then to go forward and surprise Norba and Circeti. This horrible complot and conspiracy was detected, and information given at Rome to L. Cornelius Merula Pretor at that time of the City. For two bondslaves early in a morning before day, presented themselves unto him, and opened from point to point in order, namely, what had been contrived and done, and what remained yet to do. The Pretor having taken order for their safe custody at home within his own house, called the Senate together: where, after he had recounted and declared unto them what these informers had revealed, he was commanded to go abroad to search out and repress this conspiracy. Forth he marched with five Lieutenants of the camp, and look how many he could meet with in his way all over the fields, villages, and hamlets, he tended unto them a military oath, and constrained them to arm and follow him. Thus in this hasty manner of levy, he armed well near 2000, and with them all together (who knew not whither he meant to go, nor to what piece of service he led them) to Seia he came. At his first entrance, he suddenly in great haste apprehended the principal heads of the conspiracy: whereupon the slaves fled out of the Town. Then were sent out certain into the fields, to trace and to find them out by their tracks. In this business there were two bondslaves and one free man that performed singular good service. Unto him the LL. of the Senate gave order, that there should be paid 1000000 Affes in brass coin: but unto the slaves 35000 and their freedom. For the redemption of whom, their masters were contented their full price out of the Chamber of the City. Not long after, it was reported that the remnant of this conspiracy purposed to surprise Prentis. Thither marched L. Cornelius the Pretor of the City, where he executed about 500 persons who were found guilty. The City was in great fear to see how the hostages and captives of the Carthaginians practised such troubles. Therefore in Rome a standing watch was kept in every street: and the inferior Magistrats were charged to see to it and to walk the round, and the Triumvirs likewise (for three Sheriffs) to have a better eye and look to the Quarry-prison. The Pretor also directed his letters into all quarters of the Latin nation to this effect, That all the hostages should be kept within doors, and not suffered to go abroad into the streets: that all captives and prisoners should have gyes about their heels of ten pound weight at least, and be kept in no other ward but in the common goal.

The same year came Embassadors from King Attalus, who presented in the Capitol a golden Crown of 246 pound weight, with great thanksgiving unto the Senate, that King Antiochus in O regard of the authority and countenance of the Roman Embassadors, had withdrawn his forces out of the confines of Attalus. The same summer two hundred men of arms, ten Elephants, and 200000 Modii of wheat sent from King Masiniſſa, arrived at the camp in Greece. Likewise out of Sicily and Sardinia, there was sent great store of victual and liveries for the army. In Sicily M. Marcellus was L. Governour, and in Sardinia M. Porcius Cent, an upright man and living without touch and reproach, save only he was thought somewhat too severe in restraining of ultry. He banished out of that land all usurers: he abridged also and cut off clean, the charges which the allies were wont to defray for the entertainment of the Pretor.

Sext. Elius the Consul being returned to Rome out of France in regard of the general assembly for election of Magistrats, created Consuls Cn. Cornelius Cethegus and Q. Minutius Rufus. And two daies after, the election was held for Pretors. This year first were chosen six Pretors, by reason that the number of Provinces encreased, and the Roman Empire and Seignory extended farther. And there were they, to wit, L. Manlius Volſo, Cn. Sempronius Tuditanus, M. Sergius, L. Helvius, M. Minutius Rufus, and L. Aclius. Of these, Sempronius and Helvius were Adiles of the Commons: Q. Minutius Thermus and T. Sempronius Longus Adiles of the chair. The Roman games this year were four times renewed. Cn. Cornelius and Q. Minutius being Consuls, above all things went in hand with the Provinces of Consuls and Pretors: and first they dispatched those that concerned the Pretors (a matter that might be decided by calling lots.) To Sergius was appointed the jurisdiction of the City, and to Minutius the foreign, over strangers. Aclius was appointed to Sardinia, Manlius to Sicily, Sempronius to that part of Spain between Italy and Iberia; and Helvius unto the other beyond the River.

When the Consuls were upon the point to call lots likewise for their provinces: namely, Italy and Macedony, L. Oppius, and Q. Fulvius Tribunes of the Commons, interposed themselves and staid them, alleging, That Macedony was a province lying far off, and there was no one thing that had more impeached and hindered the proceeding of wars to that day than this, That in fo remote parts, the Consul ever of the former year was called home before he were felled in his affairs, and when he should be employed most in wars. Now have there four years already gone over our heads, since we decreed and concluded to follow the Macedonian war; during which time, Sulpicius spent the greater part of his year in seeking after the King and his army; Vilius, when he should encounter the enemy, was called away before he had effected any exploit; as for Quintius, he was kept at Rome till for the most part of the year, in attendance about Church-matters and sacrifices: howbeit the affairs of wars under his conduct were managed so well, that it either he had gone sooner into his province, or the winter had been later, he might have dispatched the wars there: and now, that he is ready to retire into his landing camp and wintering harbors, the reports, that he hath brought the war to that good pass and forwardness, that unless he be not hindered by a new successor, in all likely-hood and appearance, he will make a final end thereof the next summer.

With these speeches they prevailed so much, that the Consuls for their part promised to be ordered and set down by the Senat in this behalf upon condition, that the Tribunes would be content to do the like. Now when of both sides, they had referred themselves to a free and absolute consultation, the LL. of the Senat assigned to both the Consuls the government of Italy, and continued the command of the army still with T. Quintius, until there came another to succeed him. Two legions were appointed for the Consul, with commission to war upon the Gauls between Rome and the Alps who had revolted from the people of Rome. And for Quintius ordained it was, that there should be sent into Macedony unto him, a new supply of 5000 foot, 300 horse, and 3000 sea-servitors and mariners. And likewise, that the same L. Quintius Flaminius should be Admiral of the navy, as before. For the Pretors who were to go into Spain, there was an allowance of 8000 footmen out of the allies of the Latin nation, and 400 horsemen, to that they dismissed the old soldiers out of Spain: and enjoined they were to limit and set out the bounds of their several provinces, whereas the higher Spain and the lower should part. And for Macedony there were two Lieutenants more for the army appointed, to wit, P. Sulpicius and P. Vilius, who had been Consuls both, and in that province.

Before that either Consuls or Pretors went out into their provinces, it was thought good to take order for the prodigious tokens which hapned. For at Rome the Temple of Vulcanus and Saturnus at Fregella the wall and a gate of the City, were stricken with lightning. At Arifino it appeared light (as it had been clear day) in the night season. At Asclani a Lamb was yeamed having two heads and five feet. Also at Formia two wolves entered into the Town, and worried somewhat where in their way. Last of all, at Rome there was a wolf, that not only came into the City, but went forward as far as to the Capitol.

C. Aclius a Tribune of the Commons proposed a law, that there should be five Colonies committed to the Sea side and there planted: two at the mouth of the Rivers Vulturnus and Lenturnus, ducted to the Sea side and there planted: two at the mouth of the Rivers Vulturnus and Lenturnus, one at Puteoli, another in the Burrough Town of Salernum, and to make the fifth Interamna was adjoined to the rest. Into every Colony order was taken, that there should be thirty households sent. The three Commissaries, called Triumvirs, for the conducting of these Colonies were created; namely, M. Servilius Geminus, Q. Minutius Thermus, and T. Sempronius Longus. These three had commission to continue in the charge of this office three years. And the matter, and all other matters accomplished, pertaining to God and man, that were by the Consuls to be performed, then they set forward both, into their provinces. Consul took his way directly against the Infubrians, who accompanied with the Cenomans, were entered at that time into arms: Q. Minutius in his journey bare on the left hand of Italy toward the nether sea; and conducting his army to Genoa, began with the Ligurians to make war. Clasidium and Litium towns both of the Ligurians, likewise two States of the same nation, the Celatis and the Cerditis the surrendered unto him: inasmuch as all the country on this side the Po, were in subjection to the Romans, jecting merely at Phœneus, who was troubled with a pair of bad eyes. And given he was by nature fit to be pleasantly conceited, yea, and fuller of his frumps, I wot than becomed the Majesty of a King: to as many times even in treaty of serious matters and of great consequence, he could not forbear but make himself merry and laugh a good while. "Afterwards he fell to a fit of choler and indignation, that the Ætolians should take upon them like Romans to command him out of Greece, who if they were put to it, were not able upon their knowledge to set down the bounds of Greece & limit how far it reached. Forasmuch as the Agrei, the Apodotes and Amphiphoi, which take up a great part of Ætolians are not within Greece. And what just cause (quoth he) of complaint have they in that I have not spared some of their allies? Why? even they themselves hold this old custom for a law, namely, to permit their youth to take arms and serve against their own allies. So they do it without the publick order and warrant from the State: and very often a man may see Ætolians in contrary armies, & come to aid as well the one side as the other. As for Chius, it was not I that forced it: I did no more but aid Prusias my friend and ally, in the siege and assault thereof. And as touching Lysimachia, I defended it against the Thracians: but forasmuch as of necessity I was called away from the guard thereof unto this war, the Thracians how hold it, I thus much by way of answer to the Ætolians. Now concerning Attalus and the Rhodians, by right I owe them nothing: for it was not I but they, that began the war. Howbeit, for the honor that I bear to the Romans, I will make restitution to the Rhodians of Peraea, and restore I will to Attalus the ships and the captives as many as are forth coming and may be found. As for the restitution and making good again of Nicephorium and the Temple of Venus, what answer should I return to them that demand it, but this, that I will endeavour and be at charge of planting new trees (which is the only way and means whereby groves and woods that are cut down and fallen, may be recovered again) seeing that ye will needs have it, that Kings (forsooth) must commune and reason to and fro about such matters as these. In the last place, he framed his speech to answer the Achæans: wherein, first he began with the benefits and pleasures that Antigonus had done unto that nation: then, of the favours and good turns they had received from his own self: and with all he commanded their decrees and edicts to be read, containing all kind of honors as well divine as human: adding moreover the late and fresh revolt of their army from him: and albeit he inveighed sharply against their disloyalty and treachery, yet he promised to render Jyrgos unto them. As for Corinth, he would confer and consult with the Roman Generals, and demand of him, whether he thought it reason, that he should depart from those cities which he won by arms, and held by right of conquest, or dispose himself of those also, which he received from his progenitors as his lawful inheritance? The Achæans and Ætolians addressed themselves to answer those points: but the sun was wellnigh down: whereupon the conference was adjourned unto the morrow. Philip retired to the harbor from whence he came, and the Romans with their allies to their camp. The day following, Quintus at the time appointed was ready before the City of Nicea (for that was thought a convenient place.) But Philip appeared not, nor for the space of certain hours came there any at all from him: not to much as a messenger. Now when they were out of all hope of his repair thither, behold of a sudden his ships were despatched. For himself he laid by way of excuse, that considering how hard, how grievous and intolerable indignities were imposed upon him, he had employed all that day time until then in consultation, and could not resolve. But it was generally thought among them all, that he had of purpose prolonged the time, and made it so late even toward evening, because the Achæans and Ætolians should have no leisure to answer unto him. And this opinion of theirs himself confirmed, in that he requested that he alone might parley with the Roman General himself, and that all others should go aside and abient themselves: to the end they two might spend and lose no more time in debate and wrangling, but go briefly to the point, and make an end one way or other. This petition of his would not at first be accepted by Quintus, pretending that he would not have it seen that the allies were excluded out of the conference. But afterwards upon his importunit suit, by the advice of them all the Roman General together with Ap. Claudius a Colonel, when the rest were voided away, advanced forward to the bank side: the King with the other two whom he had with him the day before came a land. There after they had parled in secret together a certain time, they parted. What Philip related unto his company is not certainly known: but Quintus made report unto his allies of their conference in this wise: namely, that Philip was content to quit the whole coast and tract of Libyrum, for the Romans to enter upon. Item, to send back all the traitorous renegats, and as many captives as were to be found. Item, to redeliver unto Attalus the ships and the mariners taken prisoners therein. Item, to render unto the Rhodians the country of Peraea: but in no wise to be diffided of Iassus and Beryllæ. Item, to deliver unto the Ætolians Pharsalus and Lorissa, but not Thebes in any case. Last of all, to part not only with Argos, but with Corinth also, for the behoof of the Achæans. There was not one of them all well pleased at this limitation and setting out of particular parts, which he would deliver, and which he would not. For in this reckoning & account they should be more losers than winners. For unless (say they) he remove his forces and garrisons out of all Greece throughout, he will never cease to give or take occasions of quarrel. As they all cried out from the whole assembly to this effect, their high voice was heard of Philip, albeit he stood aloof. Whereupon he requested Quintus to refer the whole matter once more unto the next day: and then certainly without fail, he would either persuade him and his allies and bring them to his mind, or else would come off and suffer himself to be persuaded and over-ruled by them. The place of meeting was appointed upon the strand near Thronium: and thither they repaired on both parts betimes. There Philip first and foremost, behought both Quintus and all those that were present, not to disturb the hope of peace, but that it might come to some effect: and in conclusion, craved time wherein he might send his Embassadors unto the Senat of Rome: assuring them, that if he could not obtain peace under those articles above said, he would accept of any other conditions, which it should please the Senat to put upon him. All the rest milked hereof, supposing that he sought for nothing else but delays and tract of time, whiles he might gather his forces together. But Quintus inferred again, That well it might be and a truth indeed that they alleged, if it were summer time and a season fit for war and martial exploits: but now, considering winter was at hand, they could lose nothing by granting him respite to address an embassy. For neither (quod he) will any capitulation and composition which we should make with Philip stand good and firm without the approbation of the Senat: and in this one winter (when of necessity we must surcease from war) it may be known what the Senat by their authority will approve. To this advice the chief of the confederats accorded, and therein rested. So there was a cessation of arms for two moneths granted: in which mean time it was thought good, that each of them likewise should dispatch one Ambassador to advertise the Senat, to take heed they were not over-raught by the subtilty and fraud of the King. But provided it was in the covenant of the truce aforesaid, That incontinently the Kings garrisons should void the territories of Phœtia and Læris, Quintus also himself sent (together with the Embassadors of the allies) Aminander King of the Athamians: and to make the embassy more honourable, Q. Fabius (his own wives sisters son) Q. Fulvius and P. Claudius accompanied the King.

When they were arrived at Rome, the Embassadors of the allies had audience given them before those that were sent from King Philip. Most of their speeches were spent in railing against the King: but in this one point they most of all moved the Senat to give ear unto them, namely, when they described by demonstration (as in a map) the situation of those countries as well by Land as Sea, that all men might plainly see, that if the King might hold in his hands the City Demetrias in Thessalia, Chalcis in Eubœa, and Corinth in Achaia; Greece could not possibly be at liberty, considering that Philip himself was wont to term them (no less truly than tauntingly) The shackles and fetters of Greece. After them were the Kings Embassadors permitted to enter into the Senat-house: and having begun to make a long Oration, their speech was cut off with this one brief and short interrogatory, Whether Philip would quit those three Cities aforesaid, or no? Whereupon they made this answer, That they had no express warrant in their commission touching that matter by name. So the Kings Embassadors were sent away without conclusion of any peace: and Quintus had full authority to determine of war or peace at his pleasure. Who seeing plainly by this, that the Senat was not weary of war, and being himself more desirous of victory than peace, he would never after grant Philip any more parlies, but gave him to understand, that he would admit no other embassy from him, but that which should bring him news of his departure quite out of Greece.

Philip seeing no other way now but that he must needs fight and trie the issue by a main battle, and that he was to gather his forces together from all parts: being perplexed most of all for the Cities of Achaia (a country far remote from him) and yet more careful in regard of Argi than Corinth; he thought it best policy to make it over (as it were upon trust) into the hands of Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedæmonians, upon condition, That if he obtained the victory, Nabis should deliver it up unto him again; but if ought should come to him but well, then Nabis himself to have and hold it as his own. Unto Philoetes, Governor of Corinth and Argi, he dispatched his letters, That he should himself in person commune with the tyrant above named about it. Philoetes, besides that he came now with a present, added moreover of his own head (for the better assurance and pawn of amity between the tyrant and the King.) That Philip would give his daughters in marriage to Nabis his sons. The tyrant refused at the first to accept of that City, unless he were sent for, by a decree of the Argives themselves to come for to aid the City. But afterwards when he heard say, That in a frequent assembly there, they not only rejected him, but also detested and abhorred the very name of a tyrant, as an execrable abomination: supposing now that he had a good occasion and quarrel offered to make a spoil of them, he willed Philoetes to deliver the City unto him when he would. So the tyrant was received into the Town in the night season, without the privy and knowledge of any person: and by break of day he seized upon all the higher places. The gates were shut, and few of the principal heads in the beginning of the tumult made shift to escape. Those that were absent had their houses rancked and their goods pillied: as many as were present, had all their gold and silver taken from them; besides, great sums of money were imposed upon them to be paid. They that made speed and were not long about it, but tendered ready coin, were let go without any outrage or hurt done unto their bodies: but such as were suspected either to hide or keep ought back, were mangled and tortured like bondslaves. After this, he assembled the people together and published two Laws: the one, for crossing all debt-books and cancelling obligations: the other, for division of Lands among the people by the poll: two fire-brands to serve their turn that seek for change and alteration in a State: enough to set on fire the Commons against the Nobles and chief of a City.

When the City of Argos was thus brought in subjection under Nabis, the tyrant never remembering at whose hands, nor upon what condition he had received it, sent Embassadors to Elainus unto Quintus, likewise to Attalus winning them in Argina, certifying them, that Argos was in his hands and at his devotion; and if Quintus would repair thither to parle with him, he doubted not but they two should agree well enough in every point. Quintus granted to come thither, to the end, that by this means he might dismissh Philip of that garrison: and he sent likewise to Attalus, willing him, that he would depart from Argos and meet him at Sicyone: himself looked from Anticyra, and with ten Galeaces called Quinquereces: which (as hap was) L. Quintus his brother some dayes before had put to sea out of the winning harbor of Corcyra, crossed overso Sicyone. Now was Attalus there already, who making remembrance unto Quintus, that it became a tyrant to come unto a Roman General and not a Roman General to go unto a tyrant, induced Quintus to condescend unto his opinion, and not to enter the City of Argos. Not far from the City is a place called Mycenæ, where they agreed to meet and commune together. Quintus came to the place, accompanied with his brother and certain Colonels. Attalus was guarded with his Princely and Royal train. Nesistratus the Pretor of the Achæans repaired thither, attended with some few auxiliary souldiers: and there they found the tyrant expecting their coming with all his forces. And armed as he was with his guard likewise armed, he advanced himself into the midst (well neer) of the plain that lay between. Quintus unarmed, came forward with his brother and two Colonels. King Attalus likewise between the Pretor of the Achæans of the one hand, and a courour of his on the other, both unarmed. The tyrant began the speech with an exult. That being in arms and attended with a guard of armed men, he presented himself to a parle seeing the General of the Roman and King Attalus unarmed: and said that he stood not in fear of them, but of certain exiled perions of the Argives. After this, when they came to treat as touching the conditions and covenants for the contract of amany, Quintus the General demanded two things: the one, That Nabis would make an end of warring with Elainus: the other, That he would send with him certain aids against Philip. And verily to send succour hegranted: and in lieu of peace he was content they should be a truce, until the war with Philip was dispatched. Al o about Argos King Attalus began to enter into some question saying: That having the City treacherously betrayed unto him by Philoetes, he now held it by force of arms: but he answered again, That he was left for by the Argives themselves, for to protect them. Then the King required that the Argives might be assembled together, that he might know the truth. The tyrant made no denial thereto. The King replied again, that the assembly should be free, and at their liberty to speak, and to that effect the garrisons were to be removed out of the City, and no Lacedæmonians intermingled among them: to the end that the Argives might frankly speak their mind. But the tyrant flatly denied to withdraw from thence the guards. So this arguing came to no conclusion, and the conference brake up, after that the tyrant had given the Roman General 600 Cadours, and a truce made for the term of four moneths, between Nesistratus Pretor of the Achæans, and Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedæmonians. From thence Quintus departed to Corinth and approached the gate with a Regiment of Cretenians, that it might appear to Philoetes the Kings Captain there that the tyrant was revolted from Philip. Philoetes also entered into a parle with the Roman General, and when he was exhoried by him to depart out of hand and yield the City, he returned such an answer unto him, that he seemed rather to defer, than to deny the thing. From Corinth Quintus crossed the Sea to Anticyra, from whence he sent his brother to found the nation of the Acarnanians. And Attalus departed directly from Argos to Sicyone. Where the City not only increased the ancient honours of the King, with the addition of new: but also the King over and besides that he had purchased for them in time past the sacred land of Apollo, with a great sum of money, because he would not seem now also to pish by this friend City allied unto him, without some royal bounty and munificence, he gave freely unto them six talents of silver, and 1000 Meddins of corn: and so returned to his ships at Cenchrea. Nabis also having strengthened the garrison in Argi, returned to Lacedæmon: and alter himself had robbed the men of their money and goods, he sent his wife thither to do the like by the women. Who sending for the honourable and worshipful dames of the City, inviting them one by one to her house, and otherwiles many together at once, such as were of kin one to another, by flattering and by threatening ga from them not only all the gold that they had, but in the end strip off their apparel also, and all the jewels and ornaments that they wore.

The three and thirtieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the three and thirtieth Book.

Titus Quintus Flamininus the Pro-consul ended the war with Philip, after he had vanquished him in a pugil field neer Cynoecephalus in Thessalie. L. Quintus Flamininus, brother to the said Pro-consul,

A consoling, having forced Leucas the head City of Acarnania, received the Acarnanians upon their submission and surrender. C. Sempronius Tuditanus the Pretor was slain, and his army defeated by the Celtiberians. Attalus being fallen suddenly sick, was removed from Thebes to Pergamus, and there departed this life. Peace was granted to Philip upon his suit, and liberty restored to Greece. L. Furius and C. Claudius Marcellus, the two Consuls, subdued the Boians and Insubrians in Gaul, Marcellus triumphed. Annibal having practised in Attirick to raise war, but to no effect, was thereupon accused unto the Romans, by letters sent from the principal of the aduerser faction: but for fear of the Romans, who had dispatched their Embassadors to the Carthaginian Senat about him, he fled unto Antiochus King of Syria, who also prepared then to make war upon the Romans.

The beginning is not extant in the Latine.

adjoining in those quarters to Acarnania. There was a straight pass or gullet there, half a mile almost in length, but not half a mile in breadth: at the end of this straight standeth the City Leucas planted against an hill that turneth to the East, and looketh toward Acarnania. The bafe Town is built upon a plain reaching along the sea that divideth Leucas from Acarnania. Whereupon the City, as well on the land side, as by sea, is easie to be forced. For the floods of the water resemble a standing lake rather than a Sea, and the whole soil is a light earth, minable and easie to be wrought into, so that in many places at once the walls either undermined or shaken with the ram, came tumbling down. But as the Town it self was affailable, so the hearts of the Townsmen were invincible. For night and day they gave not over, to repair the cracks of the shaken wall, to fill up the open breaches and ruins to make head lustily, and skirmish with the enemy, and rather to defend the walls by force of arms, than to save themselves by strength of their walls. And surely a longer siege they would have made of it than the Romans hoped but that certain banished perions, Italian born dwelling in Leucas let in and received armed souldiers on the Cattle side. Howbeit, the Leucadians embattelling themselves in their market place, encountered them as they ran down from the higher ground with a great cry and noise, and maintained battel with them for a long time. In this mean while, the walls in divers places were scaled with ladders, and the enemies mounting over the heaps of stones that lay at the breaches, entered the Town. And now by this time the Lieutenant in perion, with many companies environed them as they fought: some slain in the midst, others flung away their weapons, and yielded to the conquerour. After few dayes, upon the news of the field fought at Cynoecephala, all the States of Acarnania came in, and submitted themselves to the Lieutenant.

At the same time, whilst fortune turned thus about, and bare down a side all at once, the Rhodians also sent out Panphystratus their Pretor, with 800 footmen of Achaia & about 1900 souldiers well armed, gathered out of all sorts of auxiliaries, to regain and reconquer from Philip the country of Peraa, lying in the main and firm land, which had been held sometime, and possessed by their ancestors. And these aids were compounded and mixed of French, Numers, Pincters, Tanians, and Arcans of Africa, and Laodiceans of Asia. With these forces Panphystratus encamped in the territory of Syratonia, and there he seized of a commodious place, and very good for his purpose, unawares to the Kings company that had holden the same. Thither came also to aid them in very good time, a Regiment of a 1000 foot and a 100 horse of Achæans, levied for that purpose, and were commanded by Theoxenus. Dimerates a Captain under the King, willing to recover the laid hold again, first pitched his tents, hard against the enemies camp. But afterwards he removed to another fort in the territory likewise of Syratonia, which they call Abragion: and having rallied together all the garrisons dispersed asunder in divers places, and sent for the auxiliary bands also of Thessalians, even from Syratonia, he took his way and marched toward Alauda, where the enemies were. The Rhodians likewise for their part were ready for battel, and after they were encamped of both sides neer together, immediately they entered into the field to fight it out. Dimerates placed in the right point 500 Macedonians, and the Agrians he put in the left, in the main battel he belowed all those that he had gathered together out of the garrisons belonging to the forts above said, who for the most part were Carians, the points he flanked round about with his cornets of Horse. The Rhodian cohort was marshalled in this manner: The auxiliaries of the Candioters and Thracians kept the right point, the hired souldiers (and they were a power of elect footmen) stood in the left, in the midst were the aids (a mixture of many nations:) the Cavalry and all the light armed souldiers that were, compassed the corners like wings. All that day the two armies stood only upon the bank of a brook which ran between them with a small and shallow water: and after some looe shot discharged, they retired into their tents. The next day they were ranged in like order, and struck a battail exceeding the proportion of their number: for on each side there were not above three thousand foot, and upon a hundred horse: but they were even matched not in number only and armour, but also in equal courage and hope alike. The Achæan first passed over the said brook, and charged upon the Agrians: afterwards the whole army ran as one would say, over the River. The fight continued long doubtful. The Achæan being of themselves in number a thousand, disordered some four hundred of the other, and forced them to retreat: and afterwards the entire right point of the battail began to shrink and give ground. As for the Macedonians, so long as their battail called Phalanx kept their array and stood close together, could not possibly be stirred or removed: but after their left side was laid naked, and they began to reach out on all hands their long pikes against the enemy, charging them across upon the flanks, they were presently troubled: and first they put themselves in disorder, afterwards they turned their backs, and last of all flung their weapons from them, and ran away for life, until they were come to Bargilia. Thither also was Dinocrates fled. The Rhodians having followed the chase as long as they had any day to see, retired into their camp. And for certain it is known, in this train of victory they had presently made speed to Stratonicea, they might have been masters of the Town, and never drawn sword for it: but while they spent time in recovering the burrough Towns and forts of Peraa, they let this opportunity slip out of their hands, and lost it for ever. For in the mean space, they that lay in garrison and held Stratonicea, were encouraged, and took better heart. Dinocrates also anon with those forces of his that remained, put himself within the walls. Then was the Tower besieged and assailed, all in vain, neither could it be forced and won but by Antiochus, a certain time after. Thus went the affairs in Thessalie, in Achaia, and in Asia, much about one and the self-same time.

Philip being advertised that the Dardanians were entred within the confines of his realm, and waited the high country of Macedony, albeit he saw that almost in all parts of the world unhappy fortune still followed and coursed both him and his wherefore they were: yet esteeming it more grievous and heavy than death it self to be deified of the possession of Macedony also, he made a levy in great hast out of all his cities of fix thousand foot, and 500 horse: with which power of Macedonians, he suddenly surprized the enemy (unprovided and not aware of his coming) about Stobi in Pelagonia. Great numbers of men were slain in conflict, but more in the fields, such as were disbanded, and ranged abroad for greediness of booty and pillage. But as many as could make means to flee more readily and easily away, never stood out the trial of a battail, but returned home into their own country. Having thus put life as it were again into his men by this one expedition and exploit (a matter of no consequence to the total adventure of his whole estate) he retired himself to Thessalonica.

The Punick war was not achieved and brought to an end so happily and in so good a time for the Romans (who otherwise should have warred at once both against the Carthaginians and Philip) but it fell out as well and in as fit a season, that Philip was now vanquished: just against the time that Antiochus in Syria prepared to levy war against them. For besides that the service was much more easily managed against them single and apart, than it would have been if they had been banded both at once, and brought their forces together, it chanced also that Spain about the very same instant brake out to a tumultuous insurrection.

Antiochus being returned to Antioch there to winter, after he had the summer before brought under his subjection all the Cities belonging to Ptolemæus, within the country of Cæle-Syria, was yet never the more at quiet, and mindful of peace afterwards. For when he had assembled a puissant power both of Land and also of Sea-forces, and purposed to employ the whole strength of his realm, he sent afore by Land in the beginning of the spring, his two sons Arduus and Mithridates with a mighty army, commanding them to attend him at Sardis: himself in person set forth a Voyage by Sea, with a fleet of a hundred sail of covert ships with decks and hatches, besides two hundred lighter Vessels, as Gallions and Brigantines, purposing at one time to assail all the Cities in Cilicia and Caria, coasting along the Sea side, which were within the Dominion of Ptolemæus: and withal to aid Philip as well with shipping as soldiers, for as yet Philip was not utterly subdued, nor the war with him brought to a final end. Many brave and worthy exploits enterprised the Rhodians both by Sea and Land, in their loyalty and faithfulness to the Romans, and for the safeguard and defence of all the Greekish Nation. But no one thing shewed their magnificence more than this, that being nothing terrified at that time with such a World of wars threatened against them, they sent Embassadors to the King, to let him understand, that if he sailed forward and layed not his Armado, they would encounter him at the Bay of Nephelæ (which is a promontory or Cape of Cilicia, renowned for the ancient league of the Athenians.) And this they did, not upon any hatred they bare to his person, but to impeach him only for coming to join with Philip, thereby to hinder the Romans in their good course of setting Greece at liberty. N At the same time Antiochus was busied in the siege and assault of Coraceum, against which he had placed all ordnance and engines of battery: for he was already master of the Cities of Zephyrinus, Soli, Aphrodisias and Corycus, and having doubled the point of Anemurium (a Cape or forland all of Cilicia) he had won likewise the City of Selinus. All these, and many other forts of that coast being yielded unto him by composition, either for fear or willingly, without any assault, only Coraceum shut their gates against him, and staid his progress beyond his expectation. There the Embassadors of the Rhodians had audience. And albeit that embassy was such as might have set a King into a fit of choler and chased his blood, yet he tempered his anger, and made answer that he would send his Embassadors to Rhodes, and give them in charge to renew the ancient rights and privileges as well of his own as of his ancestors with that City and State, and to will them not to stand in fear of the Kings coming, for that neither they nor any allies of theirs should sustain harm or damage by him. For it was no part of his meaning to infringe and break the amity which he had with the Romans, as it may appear as well by his late embassy sent unto them, as also by the honorable decrees and answers made by the Senat and fere unto him. For it fortune that even then the Embassadors of King Antiochus were returned from Rome, having had a friendly audience there, and a gracious dispatch, according as the time re-

* otherwise called Tripletus, of three cities therein.

A quired: for as yet the issue of the war against Philip was uncertain. While the Kings Embassadors delivered these points in the assembly of the Rhodians, there arrived a post with news, that the war was ended by means of a victory achieved by the Romans against Philip at Cynosephalus. These tidings being once heard, the Rhodians past all fear now of Philip were of advice to meet Antiochus at sea with their navy. For they had a second care besides which they neglected not, to maintain the liberty of those allied Cities pertaining to King Ptolemæus, against which war was menaced from Antiochus. Some they succoured with sending aid unto them, and others by force-call and giving them warning of the depredations and enterprizes of their enemies: whereby they were a caule, that the Cannus, Myndis, they of Helicarnassus and Samos enjoyed still their chuse freedom. But needless it is for me, to prosecute all the occurrences and affairs that passed in these parts, considering how I shall have enough to do, and hardly be able to set down and go through with those that properly concern the Roman war. At the same time also King Antiochus was brought sick from Thebes to Pergamus, and there departed this world in the seven-and-twentieth year of his age, when he had reigned forty four. This man was behoven to fortune for nothing else but riches, that might commend him to the hope of a kingdom. He employed the same with such wisdom and magnificence, that first in his own conceit, and afterwards in the judgement of others, he was not thought unworthy to be a King. Afterwards when he had vanquished in one battell the Gauls (a nation at that time newly arrived in Asia, and therefore the more dread and terrible) he took upon him to be styled King, and ever after carried a mind answerable to the grandeur and Majesty of that name. His own subjects he governed with singular justice. To his allies he shewed himself most fair and faithful. His friends he used with all kindness and bounty. A wife and four children he had living when himself died: and left his kingdom secure and well settled, that the possession thereof continued firm to the third descent and generation after him.

The common opinion of King Antiochus.

While things stood thus in Asia Greece, and Macedony, and the war with Philip scarcely ended, or at leastwise peace not fully concluded, there arose a mighty war in the Province of Spain beyond the river Iberus. M. Helvius at that time was governor there, who by his letters advertised the Senat, That Colas and Luscinus, two Princes in those parts, were gone out, and had taken arms; that with Colas there banded seventeen towns, and with Luscinus the strong and puissant Cities Cardo and Barido: that the whole sea coast, which hitherto by open revolt shewed not their rebellious heart, would doubtless upon the commotion of those their neighbours, make likewise an insurrection together with them. After these letters were read by M. Sergius the Praetor, who had the jurisdiction between Citizens and aliens, the LL. of the Senat ordained, that after the election of new Praetors was past, he to whole lot the government of Spain fell, should propole unto the Senat in all convenient speed as touching the war in Spain.

About that very time the Consuls repaired to Rome (from their Provinces) who held an assembly of the Senat in the Temple of Bellona: and when they demanded triumph in consideration of their good service, and happy exploits in war achieved: C. Atinius Labes and C. Manlius, Tribunes of the Commons required. That the Consuls should speak severally by themselves concerning triumph: for suffer them they would not jointly to propound that thing in the house, to the end, that equal and semblable honour should not be conferred upon persons of unlike quality, worth, and desert. And when Manlius interred again and said, That the Province of Italy tell unto them both in one commission, and Cornelius seconded him withal; averring, That he and his companion in government had managed all their affairs with one mind by common council and advice; that the Romans who passed over the river Po against him for to succour the Insubrians, and Cænones, were forced to turn back again to defend their own, by reason that the other Consul his Colleague made such waste and pillage in their fields and villages. The Tribunes confessed that Cornelius indeed had achieved to worthy exploits in war, that there was no more doubt to be made of his triumph, than of rendering praise and thanks to the immortal Gods: but neither he nor any other Citizen stood ever at any time in such grace, favour, and credit, that having obtained the honour of a triumph for himself, he should impart that glory unto his Colleague and fellow, if he were so shameless as to crave it. As for C. Manlius (say they) he made some slight skirmishes with the Ligurians not worth the talking of: many in France he lost a good number of his soldiers. And with that they named T. Juventius and Cneius the brother of Labes, two Colonels of Tribunes of the camp, who were slain in an unfortunate battel, with many a brave and hardy man besides, as well Citizens as allies. And to conclude, there were some few towns and villages colourably yielded and rendered up for the time, without any assurance and security. These janglings and debates between the Consuls and the Tribunes continued for two daies: but in the end, the Consuls being overcome with the importunity of the Tribunes, were content to propole the matter discreetly by themselves. And with the general voice and accord of all, a triumph was decreed for C. Cornelius. The Placentians also and men of Cremona, were a great caule that this Consul found more favour by reason that they gave thanks, and reported on his behalf, that they were delivered by his good means from the siege, yea, and most of them recovered from servitude out of the hands of their enemies. Q. Minucius having only cast a proffer and made an assay of proposing his caule to the Senat, seeing them wholly banded and set against him, said aloud, That in maintenance of Consular authority, and by vertue of that place, yea, and according to the good examples of divers noble and renowned personages, he would triumph and aske them no leave, in the mount Alban. But Cn. Cornelius while he was in office, triumphed over the Inlubiars and Cenonians. He carried in pomp before him a num^r of military enigms: he cauled great store of French spoil and pillage to pass in a pageant upon chariots taken from the enemies. Many Noblemen of France were led in a shew before his own triumphant chariot: among whom (as some write) was Amilcar Generall of the Carthaginians. But above all others, the goodliest sight was, a number of Coloners and inhabitants of Cremna and Placentia, who with "bonnets or caps of liberty on their heads followed his chariot. He bare in triumph 237500 Sesterties. 7900 Bigats of silver coin. He divided among his horsemen severally Asses apiece, to every horseman he gave double, and to each Centurion trebble to much. Q. Minutius likewise triumphed in mount Alban over the Lugurians and the Boians in Gaul. The honour of this triumph as it was less in regard of the place, and of the name that went of his doings, as also because all men knew full well, that the charges went not out of the common Chest or Chamber of the City: so for number of ensigns, of chariots and spoils gained from the enemies, it was in manner equall and comparable to the other. And of money he brought well near as much as Cornelius: for of brasse coin he had in shew 254000 Asses, of silver coin in Bigat peeces 53200. To common souldiers of footmen, to Centurions and horsemen, he gave as much as his Colleague. After this triumph there was a generall assembly held for the election of Magistrats: wherein were created Consuls, L. Furius Purpurio, and M. Claudius Marcellus. The next day after these Prætors were choien, Q. Fabius Buteo, T. Sempronius Longus, Q. Minutius Thermus, M. Acilius Glabrio, L. Apustius Fullo, and C. Lelius.

In the end of that former year, letters came from T. Quintius with this intelligence, That he had fought in battell ranged with King Philip within Thessaly, where the army of the enemies was defeated and put to rout. These letters were first read in the Senat by Sergius the Prætor, and then by order from the LL. in the publick assembly of the people. For this happy luckie, it was ordained, That there should be solemn processions for five daies. Shortly after there arrived Embassadors both from T. Quintius, and also from the King. The Macedonian Embassadors were brought without the City to the place of hamlet called Villa publica, where they were appointed their lodging: rich presents were given them, and allowed they were the charges for themselves and their train. In the Temple of Bellona the Senat was assembled, where there passed not many words by reason that the Macedonians promised, That the King should perform whatsoe^r the LL. Senat would set down. So (according to the ancient custome and manner) there were appointed ten Committees or Delegates, by whose advice and counsel T. Quintius the Generall, was to present and tender unto Philip, articles and conditions of peace: provided, that in the said number of Delegates, P. Sulpicius and P. Valerius should be compyled by name; who when they were Consuls governed the Province of Macedony. The same day, the Collians demanded and made lib^t, That the number of their Coloners or inhabitants might be augmented: whereupon an order was granted, That there should be a thousand new enrolled to the former: with this proviso, that in this number none of them should be matriculated, who alter the Consulship of P. Sulpicius and P. Villius had been enemies to the people of Rome. The Roman games and plaies were that year exhibited as well in the Circus as upon the stage in the Theatre, by the Ædiles Curule L. Corneli, Scipio and Cn. Manlius Volsus: which, as they were set out with more state and magnificence than ever before, so they were beheld with more joy, contentment and pleasure, in regard that all things fell out so fortunately in the wars: and they were renewed and represented all three over, for the plaies called Plebeian, they were set forth no less than seven times one after another. Acilius Glabrio and C. Lelius exhibited thole patimies: who also of their silver that arose of fines and forfeitures, caused three cast images of brasse to be made, and erected them to the honour of Ceres, Liber, and Libera.

Now when L. Furius and M. Claudius Marcellus were entered into their Magistracy, and after question made concerning their Provinces, the Senat passed a decree, That both of them joyntly should govern Italy: they requested that they might cast lots for Macedony and Italy together. N. Marcellus more desirous of the twain of the Province of Macedony, alleged, that the peace was not found, but counterfeited, pretended, and deceitfull; and that the King would take arms and war again, in case the army were withdrawn from thence: by which words he put the LL. of the Senat into a deep study and suspense, what to do, or to think of it. And haply the Consuls had obtained their request, but that Q. Marcius Rex, and C. Atinius Labeo, two Tribunes of the Commons, protested, that they would oppose themselves and cross it by their negative voice, unless they might first propose unto the people to know, Whether their will and pleasure was to entertain peace with King Philip, or no? This bill being preferred and read in the Capitoll before the people, was granted, and all the tribes or wards, even five and thirty, every one gave their affirmative voice, His rogatus i.e. So be it as ye demanded. And to the end, that all men might have more cause to rejoice that peace was confirmed with Macedony, there came heavy news out of Spain, and letters were divulged abroad, containing thus much, That C. Sempronius Tuditanus the Vice-Prætor in the hither Province of Spain, was vanquished in battell, that his army was discomfited and put to flight, and divers men of name and mark slain. That Tuditanus himself was carried forth of the conflict grievously wounded, and soon after died. The Province of Italy was assigned for both the Consuls with thole two legions which the former Consuls had in charge, and order

An order granted, that they should levy and enroll four new legions, whereof two should be sent whither it pleased the Senat to appoint, and T. Quintius Flamininus was commanded to rule his Province still with the same army, and his Commitment of longer government was renewed. After this the Prætors cast lots for the parting of their Provinces. L. Apustius Fullo obtained the jurisdiction of the Citizens of Rome, and M. Acilius Glabrio was L. Chief Justice between Citizens and forrainers. Q. Fabius Buteo had the government of the baile or farther Spain, and Q. Minutius Thermus of the higher or hither Spain. To C. Lelius fell Sicily, and Sardinia to T. Sempronius Longus. And ordained it was, that unto Q. Fabius Buteo, and Q. Minutius, to whom the rule of the Provinces in Spain befell, the Consuls should out of thole four legions which they had enrolled, deliver one legion apiece, which they thought good and of allies and of the Latine nation, four thousand footmen besides, and three hundred horsemen to either of them. And these Prætors were enjoyned to go to their charges with all speed possible.

The war in Spain began afresh, in the fifth after that the former together with the Phinick war was ended. But before that these Prætors went forth to this war (which may be counted as it were new, in regard that the Spaniards now first, and never before, warred in their own proper name, without either leader or army of Carthage) and before that the Consuls themselves departed out of the City, order was given, that according to the old custome they should provide for the prodigious tokens that were reported, L. Julius as he rode on horseback into the Sabins country, was both himself and his horse under him thricken dead with lightning. The temple of Feronia in the territory of Capena, was likewise smitten and blasted from heaven. At the Temple of C. Moneta, the Iron heads of two Ipears were sent to burn on a light fire. A Wolf sprung to enter into the City at the gate Esgulina and ran through the most populous part thereof as far as into the market place, and so forward to the Tulcan street, and from thence through the Melium, and passed forth again at the gate Capena untouched, and in manner without taking any harm.

These prodigious signs were purged by the sacrifices of greater beasts. At the same time Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, who had governed the Province of high Spain before Tuditanus, entered the City by order from the Senat in a kind of triumph, and carried before him in pomp 1515 pound weight of gold: of silver likewise in bullion 20000 pound weight: and in coin 34550 deniers. L. Sertorius from the nether Spain, brought into the treasury 50000 pound weight of silver, and never pretended any hope that he had to obtain a triumph. Moreover, of the prizes and spoiles won from the enemies, he cauled two arches to be erected in the beast market, even before the Temple of Fortuna and the goddess Minerva: and one besides in the grand Circus or shew-place. And upon these arches he set up gilded Statues. These were all the affairs, to speak of, that passed this winter-season.

There wintered at that time in Athens Quintius. And among many other suiters that came unto him with their petitions, the Boeotians exhibited a request, and obtained the same, to wit, that as many of their nation as had served in the wars under Philip, might be restored and sent home again unto them: which was easily granted by Quintius, not so much, for that he thought them worthy of that labour, but because he was to win the love and affections of the States in Greece unto the Roman name, now especially that he had some doubt of King Antiochus. They were not delivered so soon, but seen it was, how little the Boeotians would be beholding to him for they had been delivered by him, and not by Quintius and the Romans. And in their next assembly generally for their solemn election, they chose one Barcellus for their Boeotarches, or Lord-governour of Boeotia: for no other reason, but because he had been the Colonell of thole Boeotians that bare arms for the King: but they passed by Zenippus, Pisistratus, and others, that had persuaded to make a league with the Romans. This wrought discontentment in these persons for the present, and fear for the time to come. For thus they reasoned with themselves, if they would do this while the Roman army lay encamped near to their gates, what should become of them when the Romans were departed into Italy, and whiles Philip was so near at hand to assist those that sided with him, and to annoy those of the adverse part and faction? Therefore they conspired and concluded in the end to make away Barcellus, the head of the Kings bend, whiles the Roman forces were at hand. And so chusing a convenient and fit opportunity for their purpose, at what time as he returned homeward drunk from a publick solemn feast, accompanied with certain pleasant and effeminate persons, who to make sport and mirth had been at that great feast: he was tormented and beset with six armed men, whereof three were Italians, and three Ætolians, and he was murdered: His train that attended him ran away, and raised hue and cry, and called for help. Much trouble and hurly-burly there was throughout the City, much running to and fro with torch-light. But they that did the deed were escaped out at the next gate. In the morning betimes the people in great number assembled in the Theatre, being called together by the voice of the common Beldie, as if the murderers had been detected. Openly it was in every mans mouth, that he was killed by his own retinue, even thole filthy wanton persons that he had about him: but secretly in their minds they deemed Zenippus the author of the murder. For the present it was thought good to apprehend them that were in his train, and that they should be examined. Whiles search was made for them, Zenippus came forth into the assembly, with the like intent to avert all insinuation of crime from himself, saying, that men were much deceived to think that so horrible and strange a murder was committed by such weaklings & persons as they were.

made silence, he pronounced with a loud voice in this manner: "Be it known unto all men, that the Senate of Rome, and T. Quintus the General of their army, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, do ordain, that the Corinthians, the Phocians, and the Locrenians, be all free, and delivered from all taxes whatsoever, and to live according to their own laws, Item, That the Ile Eubœa, the Magnesiens, the Thessalians, Perthebians, Acheans, and Phthioti do enjoy the like freedom and immunity. And consequently he rehearsed all the nations which had been in subjection to Philip. Upon this proclamation of the beadle there was such joy, that men were not able to conceive and comprehend it. Every man could hardly believe that he had heard the thing which he so wished and desired afore to hear: one looked upon another wondering at the matter, as if it had been a vain vision or illusion of some dream; and well they trusted not their own ears in hearing that which particularly concerned every one, but enquired of them that stood next unto them. The Crier was called back again: such a desire had each one not only to hear the glad tidings, but also to behold the happy messenger of this their liberty: and no remedy there was, but once again he must publish and pronounce the same. Now when their joy was once confirmed, they set up such a shout, and followed it so with clapping of hands, redoubling the same so often, as evidently it appeared, how there is no earthly good in the world more pleasing and welcome unto a multitude than is liberty. After this, the games were performed in such haste, that neither the mind of any man was bent to intend, nor the eye busied to behold the sight thereof, so wholly had that one joy possessed them and forestalled the sense of all other pleasures and delights. But when the pastimes were once ended, they all in manner ran apace to the Roman General, insuch sort, that his person was in some danger of the multitude, crowding so hard upon him alone, for desire they had to come unto him, to touch his right hand, and to cast garlands of flowers and labels of sundry colours upon him: but being a man full upon three and thirty years of age, both the vigour of youth, and also the joy that he took for the accomplishment of so glorious an act, afforded him strength enough to abide the press of the people. This gladness of all men shewed it self not only for the present, but continued also for many daies space, entertained not only in thankful minds, but expressed also in joyful discourses: namely, "That there was one nation yet in the world, which at their proper cost and charges, with their own pain and peril made war for the freedom of others: who afforded this favour and pleasure not to the neighbours and borderers only, or to those that were joynt near to them in the continent and firm land, but patrolled over the seas: to the end, that throughout the whole world there should be no unjust and tyrannical government, but in all places, right, reason, and law, might prevail most and carry greater sway. Lo, how by the only voice of one Beadle all the Cities of Greece and Asia are set free. To conceive and enterprize to great a thing proceedeth from a brave mind and noble heart: but to effect the same is a singular virtue and rare singularity.

This done, Quintus and the ten Delegates gave audience to the embassages of divers Kings and Princes, Nations and States. And first of all others were the Embassadors of King Antiochus called in: who used the same speech in manner that they had at Rome, vinting great words without any ground and substance of credit. But answer was returned unto them, not covertly by way of circumstance as aforetime (when Philip was on foot and things stood doubtful) but openly in plain terms. Imprimis, That Antiochus must quit and abandon all the Cities of Asia, which belonged at any time either to King Philip or King Ptolemeus, Item, That he meddle not with any free City or State, and especially with those of Greece: but above all, warned he was and forbidden, either to pass over himself, or to send any forces into Europe. After the Kings Embassadors were licensed to depart, all the nations and states had a general session and meeting together, which was the sooner dispatched, for that in the decrees of the ten Delegates all the Cities and States were pronounced by name. Unto the Orestians (a people in Macedonia) for that they revolted first from the King, their own lands and privileges were restored. The Magnesiens, the Perthebians and Dolopians were likewise declared free. Unto the people of Thessaly over and above the grant of their liberty, the Phthiotian Acheans were annexed, excepting the City of Thebes in Phthia and Pharsalus. As for the Ætolians who required, that according to covenant Pharsalus and Lencus should be rendered unto them, they were put over unto the Senat. But they awarded them the Phocenes and Locrenes, with other appurtenances adjoynt before by virtue of the decree. Corinth, Triphylia, and Hæra (which also is a City of Peloponnesus) were rendered unto the Acheans. Moreover, these ten Delegates gave Orontum and Eræria unto Eumenes the son of Attalus, but by reason that Quintus would not agree thereto, the matter was referred over to the Senat, to be decided: and the Senat granted freedom unto these Cities, together with Caristum. Unto Pleuratus were freely given Lingur and Parthenius, which were two nations in Illyricum, and had been both subject to Philip. It was ordained also, that Aminander should hold those Castles still, which during the wars he had won from Philip. When the assembly was dissolved, the ten Delegates having divided between themselves their several charges, departed every man to see for the Cities of their particular regions and quarters, P. Lentulus to Baryllæ, L. Stertinius to Hephæstra, Thasus, and other Cities of Thracia: P. Villius and L. Terentius toward King Antiochus; and G. Cornelius toward Philip. Unto whom after Cornelius had declared his Commission concerning some smaller matters, and withal demanded of him, Whether he could with patience abide to hear counsel not only profitable unto himself, but also necessary? The King made answer again and said, That he would not only give him the hearing, but also yield him thanks besides.

As in case he would deliver ought unto him for his good. Whereupon he perswaded him earnestly, that so much as he had obtained peace already, he should send his Embassadors to Rome to crave league and amity: to the end, that if Antiochus began to stir, he might not be thought to have attended and waited for some occasions and opportunities to make war. [This conference and communication with Philip was at Tempe in Thessaly.] And when he answered, That he would immediately dispatch his Embassadors, Cornelius came to Thermopye, where a solemn Diet and assembly of all Greece is wont to be held upon certain fest daies, and thither resort great numbers of people. Which meeting is called Pyliæum: where he advised the Ætolians especially to persevere constant and faithfull in the amity of the people of Rome. Some of the principal Ætolians seemed to complain between whites, that the Romans were not so well affected to their nation after victory, as they were in time of the war: but others, more sharply blamed and reproached them, and upbraided them with this, That Philip could not have been vanquished, no, nor the Romans ever able so much as to pass over into Greece, without the help of the Ætolians. Cornelius forbore to make answer again to those points, for fear of farther wrangling and altercation; and promised, that if they sent to Rome they should obtain any thing that was reason. Whereupon by his advice and approbation there were deputed Embassadors. This was the issue and end of the war with Philip.

Whiles these affairs thus passed in Greece, Macedonia, and Asia, all Tuscan manner was gone out and risen up in arms by occasion of a conspiracy of bondslaves. For to enquire into these troubles and to repress the same, there was sent M. Achilius Prætor (who had the civil jurisdiction between Citizens and aliens) with one of the two legions of Roman Citizens. Some of them, who were already assembled together and grown to an head, he overcame in fight: of whom many were slain, and many taken prisoners. Others he scourged and round trussed up, hanging them on gibbets, even as many as were the principall and chief of the conspiracy: and others there were whom he sent home again to their Masters.

Now the Consuls were gone into their Provinces. Marcellus so soon as he was entered into the marches of the Boii, and had over-wearied his souldiers with marching all day long, fare him down upon a certain rising of a hilly, and there as he was encamping himself and his men, Corollanus a Prince or great Lord of the Boii, with a mighty power assailed and charged him, and slew upon three thousand of his men. In which sudden and tumultuary skirmish, certain brave men of mark were slain; among whom were T. Sempronius Gracchus, and M. Junius Syllanus two Colonels of the allies: also A. Ogulnus and P. Claudius two Knight Marshals or Tribunes of the second legion. Howbeit the Romans strongly fortified their tents and defended them valiantly, which the enemies upon their fortunate victory had long assailed to no effect. And in the same standing camp he continued certain daies, whiles he cured his souldiers of their wounds, and recovered their hearts after so great a fright. The Boii (as they are a nation that of all things cannot endure any tedious delay of time) dispersed themselves into their towns and forts. Then Marcellus presently crossed the Po, and led his army into the territory of Comum, where the Insubrians lay encamped after they had solicited and cauled those of Comum to take arms. The legions made no more ado, but gave them battell in the very way: and at the first encounter the enemies charged them so hotly that they forced the forefront of the battell to give ground. Which when Marcellus perceived, fearing lest being once discovered they should be replenished and discomfited, he made a cohort of Marians to make head; and at once set forth all the troops of the Latine Cavalry against them. Their first and second charge both, mightily impeached and quailed the enemy, advancing forward lustily and pressing upon them in great fury: whereby the rest of the Roman army taking heart again and being encouraged, at the first received them manfully and made resistance only, but afterwards followed fiercely upon them: in such manner as the Gauls were able no longer to abide their violence, but turned their backs, took them to their heels, and ran away by heaps. Valerius Antius writeth, that in this battell there were forty thousand men slain and above five hundred and seven military ensignes taken, with 432 chariots: besides many chains of gold, whereof Claudius presented one (very massive above the rest and of great weight) unto Jupiter, which was hung up within the Temple in the Capitoll, as he writeth. The same day was the Camp of the Gauls forced and ransacked, and the town of Comum also within few daies taken by assault. Upon this there were eight and twenty boroughs or forts that fell away and revolted to the Consul. But the Historiographers agree not upon this, Whether the Consul led his forces against the Insubrians first, or the Boians: and whether he raised out the dishonour of a former foil and defeat by a fortunate victory in this battell: or contrariwise, after a prosperous fight achieved before Comum, he blotted and defaced the same with a shamefull overthrow received at the Boians hand.

During this variable and alternative fortune, L. Purpurio the other Consul, marched into the Boians Country through the tribe Sappinia. And when he was approached near to a Castle called * Mutinus, he feared lest he should be enclosed and intercepted by the Boians and Ligurians: whereupon he retired with his forces the same way that he came, and fetching a great compass about through the open country in safety and security, he came at length to his Collegue. Who having joynted both their powers together, first ranged over the Boians territories, wasting and spoiling untill they came as far as * Felsina. This Town with other strong burroughs and forts, and in a manner all the Boians yielded themselves, save only their youth, who were up up in arms to pill and spoil, and were at that time retired unto the forests and glins out of the way. After this the army marched toward the Ligurians. The Boians making full account to assail the Roman army at unawares, which marched without good regard of themselves, and nor close together (for that their enemies seemed to be far off) followed after through the blind and covert forests. But when they saw that they could not overtake them, they suddenly all at once perished over the Po in small bottoms and punts, and after they had spoiled and pillaged the Ligurians, as they returned from thence with a booty raised out of the country, they changed in the utmost frontiers of Liguria, to light upon the army of the Romans in their march. Sooner and with more eagerness fell they to fight, than if they had appointed both time and place, and been prepared beforehand to strike a battell. There it was appeared, of what force anger is to prick on and sharpen mens spirits to conflict. For the Romans more greedy of murder and bloodshed, than of victory, fought so, as they scarce left the enemies one messenger to carry the news of their unhappy overthrow. In regard of these exploits, upon the Consuls letters brought to Rome, ordained it was, that there should be a solemn procession and thanksgiving to the gods for three daies. Shortly after Marcellus came to Rome, unto whom was granted a triumph with great content of the L.L. of the Senat: and while he was in his Magistracy he triumphed over the Insubrians and Comians, leaving for his Colleague good hope likewise of a triumph, because himself (to say a truth) in that nation fought but unfortunately, whereas his Colleague sped well enough, and had a lucky hand. Much spoil of the enemies was carried in a pomp, upon the Chariots that were taken and won from them. Many ensigns and banners were born in a show, besides in money, to the value of 320000 siles of brass coin; and 234000 bigate peeces of silver. The footmen had 800 siles given them apiece, every horseman and centurion had thrice as much.

The same year King Antiochus, while he kept his winter at Ephesus, assailed to reduce all the Cities and States of Asia unto the ancient form of government and subjection, assuring himself, that the rest would not be hard to be subdued and brought under, because the towns were either situate upon plains, or nothing well fortified with walls, and not furnished with men and munition. As for * Smyrna and * Lampacus, they stood upon their freedom, and challenged it. Doubted it was, and great danger, that if he should let them go clear away to, some Cities in * Asia and * Ionia would take after Smyrna, and others in * Hellepontus follow the example of Lampacus. Therefore both himself sent from * Ephesus to lay siege unto Smyrna, and gave commandment, That the forces which were at Ephesus (leaving only a small garrison behind) should be lead to the siege and assault of Lampacus. And yet he threatened and terrified them not to much with forces and violence, but assailed them rather by fair means, sending to them his Embassadors, to ask, partly by flattering and gentle words wherewith he entertained them, and partly by mild reproof for their rashness and obstinacy, he endeavoured to put them in some hope, that shortly they should have whatsoever they desired: and then, both they themselves, and all others should evidently see, that they had obtained their liberty by the especial grace and favour of the King, and not usurped and gained it by occasion of some advantage and opportunity. To this they answered again, That Antiochus ought neither to marvel, nor be offended and displeased at them if they could not well endure the hope which they had of freedom, thus to be deferred from time to time. Then he departing from Ephesus in the beginning of the spring, sailed unto Hellepontus with his fleet. His land forces he transported over to * Madyra a City in Chersonesus, and joyed them to his strength by sea. And because they that the gates upon him, he environed the town with armed men, and when he was at the point to give the assault, and to bend his engines of battery against the walls it was surrendered into his hands. Upon the like fear the Inhabitants also of other Cities in Chersonesus yielded themselves. After this he came to * Lysmachia with his whole power, as well of land-fouldiers as sea-fervitors. And finding it abandoned, ruinat, and lying as it were along, (for but few years before the Thracians had forced, sacked, and burnt it) he had a great desire to rear and set upright again that noble and famous City, seated in so good and commodious a place. And therefore he took great care, and employed all his endeavour to re-edifie the walls, to re-build the edifices, to redeem and ransom the Lysmachians that were in slavery, to seek out all those that were dispersed over Hellepontus and Chersonesus, and gather them together, yea, and to enroll new inhabitants upon hope of gain and profit, and by all means possible to store and people the City again. And withal, because he would ease them of the fear they had of the Thracians, he went in person with the one half of his land-forces to waste and spoil the confines of Thracia, the other part with all the sea-fouldiers and mariners he left hard at work about the repairing of the City.

About this time as L. Cornelius (being sent by the Senat to compose the controversies and variance between the two Kings, Antiochus and Ptolemus) abode at Scylabria: so of the ten Commissioners above said, P. Lentulus departed from Berylle, P. Villius and L. Trecentius from Thafius, and arrived all three at Lysmachia: where L. Cornelius likewise met them from Scylabria; and a few daies after King Antiochus being newly returned out of Thracia. The first meeting and salutation between him and the Commissioners was friendly and courteous, yea, and there passed to and fro afterwards divers amiable kindnesses and loving entertainments mutually. But when they entered once to parl of their Commission that they had in charge, and of the present State of Asia, then there was fretting and fuming, and their blood up. The Roman Agents stuck not to tell him to his face that all that he had done, since he took the sea, and departed with his fleet out of Syria

* Smyrna, Leuc-clavio.
* Lysmachia, Lysmachia.
* Ephesus.

* Madyra.

* Hellepontus, Scythianopolis, Caffra, Naxos.

A was displeased unto the Senat, saying, "That they thought it meet, that all the Cities should be restored unto King Ptolemus, which had been under his dominion. For as touching those towns, which sometime Philip had been possessed of, and which Antiochus had surprized and seized upon, taking his time and vantage, when Philip was employed another way in the Roman wars, it was no reason, nor a thing tolerable, that the Romans should for so many years space, by land and sea endure so great toil, and hazard such perils, and suffer Antiochus in the end to go away with the fruit and reward of all the service. But let the Cities that the Romans would take no knowledge of his coming into Asia, as a matter impertinent unto them; as they dislikeable also, that now he is come over unto Europe with all his forces both for land and sea, and little wanteth of making open war upon the Romans? Mary, as for him, he will not let to deny that he loveth any war, although he were arrived and landed in Italy. To these challenges the King made answer, and said, That he saw well enough and knew before that the Romans were inquisitive and curious enough to search what King Antiochus ought to do, but they never once thought of their own selves, how far forth they should by right proceed, as well by land as by sea. As for Asia, it appertained not at all to the people of Rome, neither had they more reason to enquire what Antiochus did in Asia, than Antiochus to search into the actions of the people of Rome in Italy. As concerning Ptolemus, from whom they complain that he had taken certain Cities, he did them to understand that there was samity between him and Ptolemus, and they were now in terms of knitting themselves shortly in nearer bonds of alliance and affinity. Neither sought he the spoil of Philip, and to enrich himself by his adverity and misfortune: or palled over into Europe against the Romans. But when he was vanquished once, all that ever he had, by right and law of war, became the possessions of Seleucus: and consequently as he thought it appertained unto him. And during the time, that his progenitors and predecessors, were buffed and troubled with other affairs, first Ptolemus caught at some things, and Philip after at other, and so between them they misured and seized upon other mens possessions, and namely, of certain places near and hard by in Thracia, which without all controversy belonged unto Lysmachia. For to reduce which into their ancient State, he was thither come, and now was in hand to re-edifie Lysmachia anew, lately destroyed by the violence of the Thracians, to the end, that Seleucus his son might hold it as the royal seat of his kingdom. Thus as they continued arguing and debating for certain daies, there ran a rumor, but without any certain author, That King Ptolemus was dead: wherupon they could grow to no conclusion of all their parties: yet they made semblance on both sides that they heard nothing thereof. And as well L. Cornelius, who was sent in Embassy to both the Kings, Antiochus and Ptolemus, requested respite of some small time to confer with Ptolemus, to the end that himself might be arrived in Egypt, before any alteration were made in the new possession of that kingdom: as also Antiochus made reckoning, that Egypt would be his, if this good occasion then were presented unto him. Therefore having dismissed the Romans and left his son Seleucus behind him with all the land-forces, for to finish the building again of Lysmachia which he had begun, himself with a little fleet sailed to Ephesus: and having sent his Embassadors to Quintus to treat soberly about a league and smity he coasted along Asia and so arrived in Lycia. And when he heard for certain at Patara that Ptolemus was yet living, he gave over his purpose of sailing into Egypt: yet nevertheless he shaped his course and left sail for Cyprus: and when he had doubled the point of Chelidonium, he laid awhile in * Pamphylia about the river * Eurymedon, by occasion of a mutiny among the mariners & oar-men, from thence he weighed anchor, and when he was failed as far as a place called [The heads of the river * Syrus] there arose a gulf and fearful tempest, wherewith he had like to have been cast away and drowned with all his fleet. Many of his ships were run aground, & many of them swallowed up of the sea, so as there escaped not one of them by swimming to land. A number of men there perished, not of bale mariners only, and unknown common souldiers, but also of his near and special friends. Having rallied the dispersed reliques of this shipwreck, seeing he had no means and was not able to reach and gain Cyprus, he returned again to Seleucia, with an army nothing so puissant nor so well furnished, as when he let out in his voyage. There he commanded his ships to be haled a land, and laid up in their docks (for winter now approached) & himself took his journey to * Antiochia, there to lye all that winter time. And in their terms stood the affairs of the Kings.

At Rome there were first instituted in this year three Triumvirs called Epulones, to wit, C. Licinius Lucullus, T. Romulus (who was the man that put up the bill for their creation) and P. Porcius Lecca. And by a law in that behalf ordained, these Triumvirs were allowed as well as a Bishop, the long embroidered robe of purple. But in this year great debate & variance there was between the Questors or Treasurers of the City Q. Fabius Labeo & L. Aurdus of the one side, and all the Priests on the other side. These treasurers were at some fault for money, because they were minded and appointed to make the last payment unto certain privat persons, for the loan-silver which they had disbursed for the wars: the Priests demanded of the Augurs and Bishops, to furnish out the said payment: for that during the wars, they only had not been contributors in any levy. The Priests appealed to the Tribunes, and called for their lawful favour: but all was in vain, and so they were forced to satisfy all the arrearages for the years past, wherein they had paid nothing. This year there died two Bishops, and new were installed in their rooms, M. Marcellus the Consul entered in place of T. Sempronius Tuditanus, who deceased Praetor in Spain; and L. Valerius instead of M. Cornelius Cethegus. Q. Fabius Maximus also an Augur died a very young man, before he had born any office of State: but for that year there was not substituted a new Angur in his room.

After this, M. Marcellus the Consul held the solemn assembly for the election of Consuls, and Consuls were created L. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Porcius Cato. Then were the Prætors chosen, namely, C. Fabricius Luscinus, Cn. Atinius Labeo, C. Manlius Volsus, Ap. Claudius Nero, P. Manlius, and P. Porcius Leeca. The Ædiles of the chair, M. Fulvius Nobilior, and C. Flaminius divided among the people 1000000 Modii of wheat, at two asses a Modius. This store of corn had the Sicilians brought to Rome for the honour of C. Flaminius and his father. And Flaminius was content that his companion in office should reap a full part of the thanks for this gratuity. The games called Roman were exhibited in most sumptuous manner, and thrice repeated all over again. The Ædiles of the Commons Cn. Demetrius Enobarbus, and C. Sempronius, who also was the high Priest, and Superintendent, called Curio Maas, called in question many of the City Bailiffs that gathered their rents for pastures, judicially to answer upon their accounts before the people. Three of them were condemned, and of their silver railed upon their fines, they built the Temple of Faunus in the Island. The Plebeian plaies were renewed for two daies, and a solemn publick feast was celebrated in regard of them.

The same day that L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius entered their office, they proposed unto the Senat concerning the government of the Provinces. And order was given by the LL. of the Council, that forasmuch as the war increased so in Spain, as required not only a Consular army, but a Consul also for the Leader; the Consuls should either agree between themselves for the government of the two Provinces, to wit, the higher Spain, and Italy, or else to cast lots therefore: that he whose hap it was to rule Spain, should have with him two legions, five thousand Latine allies, and five hundred horse; and likewise to have the conduct of a fleet of twenty galleys of war: that the other Consul should levy and enroll two legions; which were thought sufficient to defend and keep France in obedience, considering the courages of the Insularians and Boni, were well cooled and abated the last year. Cato by lot had the charge of Spain, and Valerius of Italy. Then the Prætors cast lots for their Provinces. To C. Fabricius Luscinus fell the jurisdiction over the Citizens of Rome: to C. Atinius Labeo over the strangers, C. Manlius Volsus governed Sicily, and Ap. Claudius Nero the farther Spain, M. Porcius Leeca was assigned to rule Pise, to the end he might be upon the back of the Ligurians, and P. Manlius was appointed as an assistant and coadjutor to the Consul in the higher Spain. As for T. Quintius, his Commission was renewed for L. one year longer, in regard that not only Antiochus and the Ætolians, but also Nabis the Lacedæmonian Tyrant, were doubted and suspected not to stand found to the Romans; and for him were set out two legions: and if need were of any supply to make up the companies thereof, the Consuls were enjoined to enroll new soldiers, and to send them over into Macedonia. Also Appius Claudius had a warrant to take up 3000 foot, and two hundred horse, over and above that legion which Q. Fabius had. The like number of fresh horse and foot was appointed for P. Manlius to be sent into the higher Spain: and the same legion was granted unto him, which was commanded by Mimnius the Prætor. Moreover, P. Porcius Leeca was to have the leading of two hundred footmen and fifty horse, drawn out of the Gauls army, for to lie in Hetruria about Pise. All of all in Sardinia P. Sempronius Longus continued still in place of command. Thus the Provinces left being distributed, the Consuls before they departed out of the City, by advice and counsel of the Bishops performed the solemnity of the sacred Spring which was vowed before by the Prætor C. Cornelius Mammius, according to the mind of the Senat and the good liking of the people: in the year when Cn. Servilius and Cn. Flaminius were Consuls: and so it was celebrated one and twenty years after it was first vowed. Much about this time was C. Claudius Pulcher, the son of Appius, elected Angur, and invested in that Sacerdotal dignity, in the place of Q. Fabius Maximus, who died the year before.

When as men began now to marvel that there was so little account made of the war begun already in Spain, there were letters brought from Q. Minutius with news. That he had fought a fortunate field before the town of Turba, with Budares and Besafides, two Spanish Generals and great commanders: that he had slain twelve thousand enemies, taken Budares the General himself prisoner and that the rest were discomfited and put to flight. Upon the reading of these letters, less fear there was of Spain, from whence they looked for great wars.

After the return of the ten Delegates or Commissioners abovesaid, all the care was, and no talk else but about Antiochus and his affairs. These men, after they had declared first how their proceeding went with King Philip, and upon what conditions they had granted peace, informed and gave them to understand, "That there was as great a war behind from Antiochus: that he had passed over the seas into Europe with a mighty Armado, and as puissant an army for land service; and had not been averted another way by a vain hope to invade and seize upon Egypt, which he conceived of a vainer bruit and rumor of Ptolemy his death: all Greece would have been at on a light fire, and up in arms. For the very Ætolians themselves, a nation naturally of an unquiet spirit, and incensed besides against the Romans, would not have sit still and been in rest. Moreover, there was another malady and mischief as dangerous, felt as it were within the ribs & in the very heart of Greece: to wit, Nabis, the tyrant at this present of the Lacedæmonians only, but shortly, if he may be let alone, of all Greece: who for avarice and cruelty is equal to all the famous and noted tyrants that ever were: and if he be suffered to possess himself of Argos, and to hold it as a fortress to command all Peloponnesus, when the Roman armies shall be once transported home again into Italy, in faith, Greece may make small boast of being delivered from Philip: for this they shall be sure of at least, if of nothing else, to have a near-neighbour tyrant, instead of a King far off, for to be their Lord and imperious only to command them. The ancient Senators, hearing these intelligences from grave persons of good quality, and who made report of all things not by hearsay, but upon their own knowledge, were of advice and resolved to have a good eye and regard with all speed unto Antiochus, considering the King was passed already into Syria, whatsoever the occasion was. But as touching the Tyrant, after they had disputed and debated the matter long time, Whether they had sufficient cause already to determine upon some final conclusion, or should refer unto the wisdom and judgement of T. Quintius the managing of those affairs, therein to proceed and do according as he should deem it good and expedient for the Common-wealth: in fine, they permitted him to use his own discretion concerning the Lacedæmonian Tyrant: supposing that the matter was not of such weight and consequence as to concern the main state of the weal-publick so materially, whether it were hastened or protracted; but rather it behoved them to be advised and consider well, what Antiochus and the Carthaginians would do, if haply the war with Antiochus were begun and once afoot. They [at Carthage] that sided with the adverse faction of Antiochus, had sent divers and sundry letters unto the principal LL. at Rome, every one privately to his friends to this effect, That there passed messengers and letters from Antiochus to Antiochus, and that there were Embassadors again that secretly came from the King to him. And like as there be some beasts so wild and savage as never can be tamed: so the courage and spirit of that man was such, as might not possibly be dulced or appeased. For he daily complained that the City languished and grew feeble with idleness, and by sitting still and doing nothing, was overgrown as it were with moss, and impossible it was to raise and stir it up but with found of armour and weapons. These advertisements carried likelihood of truth and good credit with them, in regard of the late war, so fresh in memory, which he alone began first, and managed to the last. Over and besides, he had provoked by a late act of his, many great and mighty personages, who set their hearts against him. The order and degree of Judges at that time bore chief sway and sovereign authority in Carthage: in this respect principally, for that the same Judges were perpetual. The goods, the honour and reputation, year, and the life of every man lay in their hands. He that displeased one of that bench, was sure to have all the rest his enemies and to be upon him: and there never wanted one promoter or other to carry tales and give informations: these judges against a man, if they saw them ill affected once and bent against one, during the time of this imperious and tyrannical rule of theirs, (for as their power was exceeding absolute, so they bare themselves therein as outrageously beyond the limits of civility) it was Antiochus his hap to be Prætor: and by virtue of his place he sent for one of the treasurers to come before him: but he made no reckoning of his authority, and refused to obey: for the said treasurer was one of the contrary side: and because from the degrees of those treasurers they mounted presently into the highest order of the Judges, therefore he carried with him an haughty mind already, in regard of the high room that he was shortly to step into. Antiochus may be true took this as a great disgrace and indignity to his person, and therefore he sent a punicant or servant to attach the body of the Treasurer aforesaid: and presently calling the people to a general assembly, he commanded him there to be presented: where he accented and blamed the party himself, no more than the whole order and degree of the Judges: through whose insolent pride and excessive power, both laws and Magistrates were nothing regarded but trodden under foot. And perceiving that these words of his tickled the itching ears of the people, considering also that their proud demeanor prejudiced the liberty of the meanest persons: immediately he published a law, and got it enacted, That those Judges should be chosen every year, and that thenceforth one and the same man might not be a Judge two years together. But look how much thank he had at the Commons hands for this act, so much he offended many of the great men and principals of the City. Another thing besides he did, whereby he purchased to himself the ill will of some private persons, in tending the common good of the weal-publick. The finances and revenues of the State, partly, through negligence went to decay, and partly, were shared out in dividends between some certain of the head Citizens and Magistrates: and more than that, the money which by way of tribute was to be paid yearly unto the Romans, was too short and not to be found: and it appeared, that a fore-levy would be imposed upon private persons shortly to make those payments out of their own purses. Antiochus, after he had cast up the books, and made an estimate and just abstract how much the rents and revenues of the City amounted unto as well from customs by sea as land, and to what uses they were employed: and perceiving thereby what was defrayed in the ordinary charges of the State, and what went a wrong way, and was diverted by their theeves to their own selves, he pronounced aloud in open audience of the whole assembly, That the arrearsages should be gathered up and brought into the common Chest: and to private persons might be discharged and eased of their impositions of tribute, and the Common-wealth would be rich enough and able to perform and furnish out the monies due to the people of Rome. And as he thus said, so he was as good as his word, and executed accordingly. Then these caterpillars, who for certain years lived by robbery of the common treasure, and fed upon the fruits of the City, faced spitefully against Antiochus, as if he had done them them great wrong in taking their own goods from them, and not proceeded in justice to wrest out of their hands their stolen substance: and in great malice and bitterness ceased not to provoke against Annibal the Romans, who were ready enough of themselves to pick some quarrel to him, to seek occasion of hatred, and to find ann hole in his coat. Scipio Africanus for a long time gave the deaf ear unto them, and disliked the course: for he thought it was not for the honour and majesty of the people of Rome to subscribe unto those imputations charged upon Annibal, to entertain the spite and hatred of men, and to intercal and insert public authority within the private factions of the Carthaginians: and not to be content to have vanquished Annibal in war, unless they also took upon them the persons of accusers, and preferred a slanderous libel & bill of indictment, and aware thereto Rillaure. But at length they wrought and brought about, that Embassadors should be sent to Carthage, who in the Senat there might charge Annibal categorically, with plotting and practising with Antiochus for to wage war against them. And the three were addressed to this Embassy, C. Servilius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Terentius Calpurnius, who being arrived there, caused it to be given out to as many as should demand the cause of their coming (and all by instruction from the advisers of Annibal) that their errand was to compose and end the debates between Masaniissa King of the Numidians, and the Carthaginians. This was commonly divulged and believed for truth. But Annibal found them straight and smelt their juggling, and was not ignorant that he was the only man that the Romans shor at, and howsoever peace was granted to the Carthaginians, yet they continued an endless and inextinguishable war with him alone still. Whereupon he resolved to frame himself to give place to the time and yield unto fortune. And being furnished aforesaid with all things requisite to take his flight, when he had for purpose all the day long shewed himself in the public place of assembly very formally, to tumble all suspicion of his intended resolution, to loon as it began to be dark night, in his Citizens gown as he went a day, and attended in the Hall, he gat him forth straight to the City gate, accompanied only with two persons, and those not privy at all to his purpose and designment. And having found his hories ready in the place appointed, he mounted and rode away that night until he was come to a certain quarter of the territory of Voca: and by the next morning, he passed between Aeylla and Thapsus, and recovered a tower or fort of his own: where he was embarked in a ship ready rigged and appointed with sail and oar to take sea and away. Thus departed Annibal out of Africa, lamenting more often the hard hap and calamity of his country, than of his own friends and kinsfolk. And the same day he fell with the Island Cercina: where the Carthaginians found in the rode certain barks charged with merchandise: and when at his coming ashore out of his ship, there came many running toward him for to salute and welcome him thither, he charged his own company, that if any asked concerning him, they should make answer, That he went upon an Embassy to Tyrum: but fearing lest any of their barks should discontinue that night, and make report at Thapsus or Aeylla that he was seen in Cercina: he caused a beatto be killed for a sacrifice, and invited the Masters of the ships and all the Merchants to supper: and therewith commanded all the sails and cross-sail-yards to be had out of the vessels, to make there of a large pavilion, that they might sit in the shade at their supper: for that, as it fell out, it was then midsummer. And as the time and such provision as they had, would give leave, he set out a feast and banquet: he spared for no wine, and continued the merriment far within night. Then M. Annibal, so soon as he could sleep his time for to deceive those that were in the harbor, weighed anchor. The rest were fast asleep: and when the next day they awoke and roused themselves, with their drunken and drouzy nols (and far fourth day it was, and late ere they arose) they were fain to spend some hours in fitting their oars again in their right places, and the tackling of the ships in good order.

In this while, at Carthage the ordinary multitude that used to frequent the house of Annibal, repaired as their manner was to his gate-house: and when it was void abroad, that he was not to be found, all the company gathered together in the market place, seeking and enquiring for the principall and chief personage of their City. Some gave out (as the truth was) that he was fled: other said plainly, that he was murdered and made away through the fallhood and villany of the N Romans: and this they stuck not to avouch. There might a man have seen sundry and divers countenances (as it isareth commonly in Cities where there is siding and parts-taking) as each one is affected to his own party and faction. At last, news came that he was seen at Cercina. The Roman Embassadors having upon audience given, declared in the Senat of Carthage, that the LL of their Senat had certain intelligence, that both aforesaid King Philip was by Annibal especially followed and set on to make war with the people of Rome: and also now there hath been letters and messengers with credence sent from him to King Antiochus: and that he would never rest until he had for all the world together in arms: and therefore all the Carthaginians were desirous to consent and satisfy the Romans, they should not suffer these parts of his to escape unpunished: then the Carthaginians made answer, and said, That nothing of all this passed by public council or consent or allowance of the State, howbeit they would be willing to do whatsoever the Romans thought to be reason.

Annibal this while had a boon voyage, and with a merry gale of wind arrived at Tyrum, where he was received of the Tyrians, the first founders of Carthage, as if he had been in another country of his own: received he was, I say, and entertained with all kind of honour, becoming a man so famous and renowned. After he had sojourned there some few daies, he sailed to Antioch:

A where understanding that the King himself was already departed from thence, he repaired to his ship, and conferred with him, as he was setting out an yearly comamity of games and places near Byblus, and being consequently also by him interceded, he made no stay, but to ship-board and sea again. And at Byblus overtook the King, whom he found floating and wavering still in his mind, and undetermined what to do as touching the Roman war. But this coming of Annibal, was no small point to turn the ballance, and to move him to enter into the enterprise thereof. The Antiochians likewise at the same time were estranged and alienated in affection from the Roman league and society, whose Embassadors demanding to have Placatum and Arucas again, with other Cities, according to the tenor and form of the first league, the Senat turned over and referred to Quintius.

THE Law Oppia proposed and enacted by C. Oppius a Tribune of the Common, in the time of the Punic war, for the abridging and restraint of the excess in womens apparail, was after much variance and debate repealed, notwithstanding that Porcius Cato laboured to the contrary that it might not be abolished. This Cato made a voyage into Spain, and by force of arms (beginning first to war at Empuriz) brought the better province of Spain on this side Iberus to quietness. T. Quintius Flaminius took war against the Lacedemonians and Nabis their tyrant, in which he sped fortunately, and so prevailed, that he made an end thereof, granted them peace to his own good liking and pleasure, delivered Argos, and set it free, which was before in subjection to the tyrant. The Senat then, and never before, beheld a publick games and p. games by themselves, apart from the rest of the people. Which to bring about Sen. Elms Petrus and L. Cornelius Cethegus the Consuls, set in foot and intermeddled themselves, in the great indignation and discontentment of the Common. More colonies were planted with Roman citizens, M. Porcius Cato triumphed over Spain. The wars also which fortunately were achieved against the Boii and the French Insulres are here recorded. T. Quintius Flaminius, who had vanquished Philip King of the Macedonians and Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, year, and freed all Greece from their oppression, for these many and noble exploits, rode in triumph three daies together. The Carthaginian Embassadors brought word, that Annibal who was fled unto Antiochus, banded with him and combined to wage war, Annibal had besides assisted by means of one Arifto a Tyrian (sent as a courier without credence only and no letters, to Carthage) for to move and sollicite the Carthaginians to rebellion.

The four and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

BETWEEN the troublefome cares of great wars, which either were not fully ended, or at hand ready to begin, there happened an occurrance, which in itself being but a small matter to speak of, and of little regard: considering the sides and part-taking about it, grew to a mighty head and contention in the end. M. Fundanius and L. Valerius Tribunes of the Common, presented a bill unto the people touching the abrogation of the Law Oppia. For C. Oppianus, when the Punic war was at the hottest, and whiles Q. Fabius and T. Sempronius were Consul's had promulgated a Statute, by virtue whereof, No woman of what degree or rank might either have in Ornaments and Jewels above half an ounce weight of gold, nor wear any habiliments wrought of undry colours, nor yet ride in Coach within the City of Rome, or any habilitment Town nor more: or than a mile from thence, unless it were upon occasion of some solemn kind or publick sacrifice. Now M. Junius Brutus, and P. Junius Brutus, both Tribunes likewise of the Common, stood in defence and maintenance of the said Law Oppia, and affirmed plainly they would not suffer it to be annulled. Many a nobleman was seen in this quarrel: some spoke for the Law, and others gaine aid it. The Capitol was full of people, either taking part and favouring the cause, or else opposing themselves, and urging the contrary. The very daies of the City themselves could neither by privacy and advice, nor by any reverent and womanly regard, nor yet by the express and absolute commandment of their husbands, be kept within doors: but do what they could, they bespread all the streets of the City, beset and kept all the waies into the common place, besetting and entreating their husbands as they passed by and went down thither to permit and give their consent. That seeing the good estate of the Common weal now flourished, and the private wealth of every man increased daily, their wives also and mistresses might be allowed to have their ancient ornaments and gay attire again. The number of these women grew every day more than other, for now they flocked aloof out of the Towns, Villages, and other places, of resort in the country and shewed themselves at Rome. In so much as they took heart at length, and went to pass as to encounter the Consuls, the Pretors, and other Magistrates, requesting and be-beseeching their favour, to stand with them, and forward the cause. But as for one of the Consuls, Marcus Porcius Cato by name, they could not with all their praises entreat him to incline unto their suit: who in the maintenance of the said law, and that it might not be revoked, spake in the frequent assembly of the people to this effect. My Masters and Citizens of Rome, if every one of us had fully resolved and purposed with himself to hold his own, and keep the rightful authority and preeminence that he hath over his own wife, left alone and trouble we should have had with them all together at this day. Now having given them the head at home so much, that the cut-throats and shrewdness of women hath conquered our liberty and freedom there; behold, here also in publick place it is trodden down and trampled underfoot: and because we were not able every man to rule his own in several, now we stand in fear and dread them all in general. Certainly, I myself thought ever until now, that it was but a feined tale and devised tale that went of a certain Island, wherein by a conspiracy of women, all the men were murdered every one, and that it utterly made away and rooted out. But well I see now, be they creatures never so weak, so filly and feeble, let them once have their meetings, their conventicles and secret conferences; they will work mischief in the highest degree, and be as dangerous as any other. And surely for mine own part, I cannot resolve in mine own conscience and determine whether of the twain be worse: the thing I mean in it self, or the precedent example and consequence thereof, considering the manner how it is handled. Of which two, the one toucheth us that are Consuls and the rest of the magistrates the other concerneth you rather my masters and citizens of Rome. As for the matter in question, and proposed unto you, whether it be good and expedient for the weal-publick or no, that I reftish in you to determine and judge, who are to give your voices and suffrages. But this seditious insurrection here, of women, be it of themselves, or procured by your motion and instigation, M. Fundanius & L. Valerius do not doubt it as yet, and implie a great default in the Magistrates, and I wot not whether it will be a fouler blot and dishonour to you that are Tribuns, than to us Consuls. Yours will the blame be, if ye have brought women now to raise and stir up tribunician seditions; and our the shame, if we needs must admit and accept of laws, whether we will or no for fear of con-motion and separation of our women; as sometimes we were forced to do by the departure and insurrection of our Commons. I assure you for mine own self, when I passed elsewhere into this common-place through the press and throng of these women, I was abashed & could not chafe but blush. And had I not been more respective of the reputation, the honour and reverence of some in particular than of them all together, because it should not be thought & said, that they had been checked and taken up by the Consuls! would have said unto them, What new fashion is this good wives, to run gadding abroad into the open streets, to beset the passages, and to affront, yea, and hang upon other women's husbands as ye do? What? could ye not every one at home have dealt with your own good-men in the cause, and craved their help? or can ye speak fair and flatter better, can ye be more pleasant and affable abroad in the Town, than within your houses? or make love to other men, rather then to your own husbands? And yet to speak un-rightly, if wives were of that modesty and womanly carriage, as to keep themselves within the compass and bounds of their own liberty, and pais no farther it were not befitting you I wot, so much as at home to trouble your selves about our laws here, nor to busy your brains, to know either what new Statutes passed, or what old were called. Our ancestors in old time would not that women in any wise should dispose so much as of their own privat matters without the advice and direction of a Governor and Overseer: and therefore in great wisdom they ordained, that they should be ordered and ruled by their parents, by their brethren, by their husbands. But we (and God will) can abide them to intermeddle in State-matters, to govern the weal-publick, to converse with us in the common place, in publick assemblies and courts of parliament. For what else do they now in the streets, in the crosses & at all I avenues, but, some of them give their voices that the bills of the Tribuns may pass and others advise and be of opinion; but the law Oppia may be repealed: Let this outrageous & unreasonable nature of theirs have the head; let these unruly creatures and untamed animals have their wil and bridle them not: let them know of themselves they will keep a mean and measure in their intemperate pleasures, unless you curb them.

I hold them in, I wish, this is the least matter of all that displeaseth these women: there are a 1000 things besides that they think hardly of, and are discontented to be held unto by old customs and positive laws. Liberty in all things; nay to speak more truly, a loose and dissolute licentious-ness, is the very thing they long after and desire. For go they away clear with this notion, what is that that they will not attempt and give the venture for? Do but run through and count the laws that are provided in this behalf for women; whereby our fore-fathers and predecessors have kept down and restrained their disorderly appetites, and with which they have fought to subdue them to their husbands: yet hardly can ye with the help of them all, keep them in awe and tied fast, but they break out they will and have their own ways. What then? how and if ye suffer them to catch by this and that and other thing, as if I say ye let them wrest from you one thing after another, as still at length they be check-mates with their husbands, think ye that ever you shall be able to support and endure them? Begin they once to be equals they will soon be superiours: make them as your fellows, and straight-ways they will be your masters. But alas, we lay too hardly to them in charge: The thing that they stand upon is no more but this, That no new Act and Statute pass be against them: for no equal and reasonable thing do they refuse: their desire and prayer is only that that they might not be wronged. No, no, it is clean contrary: That law which ye have received and admitted, that which by your suffrages you first granted, that which by the practise and experience of so many years you have allowed and approved, they would have you to revoke and abolish: which is as much to say, as by annulling that one, to infringe, impair, and diminish the authority and vertue of the rest. No law is there so well devised, that is good, commodious and agreeable unto all. This only is intended principally to be considered, that it may be profitable to the most part, and serve in general. For it as each person shall find an act prejudicial, hurtful, and offensive to himself, he may be allowed by and by to undo and demolish the same: what end should all the people assemble together to the making of those statutes, which they anon against whom they were enacted may abolish & overthrow? But gladly would I know the great occasion and cause, for which our dames in such trouble and uproar run out into the streets, and have much ado to forbear the common place, and to mount up into the Rostra to make an oration to this audience? Is it for this, to redeem out of the hands of Antibal, their fathers, their husbands, their children and brethren, whom he keepeth prisoners? Nay, that calamity is far enough off at this day, and far may it over be I pray God from our City and Common-weal. And yet when the time was of that hard fortune and calamity, you would not hearken to their piteous and kind prayers in that behalf. But it may well be, that it is neither natural love and kind affection, nor careful regard of their dear friends, but meer touch of conscience and sense of religion that hath brought them thus together in a congregation. And ready they are, it may be, to receive and intertain dame Cybele or Idaea, coming from Pessinus out of Phrygia. What honest colour and shew, so much as in word only can be pretended to bear out and cover this mutinous sedition of women? May this (say they) that we may glitter in our golden jewels, and shine in purple robes to be seen a far off: that as well on work daies as holy dayes, we may be set up and ride in our coaches and chariots through the City, as it were in triumph, for the conquest and victory of a law by us repealed and dismantled: or winning from you, and wringing out of your hands, mangle your beards, the liberty of your voices and suffrages: to the end that we might not be limited and gaged in our excessive expenses, in our dissolute prohibition, in costly vanities and superfluities. Many a time ye have heard me complain of the wastful and luscious bravery of women: and as often have you known me to inveigh against the lavish spending of men, not privat persons only, but magistrates also in higher place: and how this City of ours is sick as it were at one time of two contrary diseases and maladies, to wit pinching avarice, and superfluous prodigality, two plagues I say, that have been the bane and overthrow of all great Monarchies and flourishing empires. These pestilent mischiefs I read to much the more, as our state and common-weal encreaseth to the better: growth wealthy every day more than other; as and our dominion extendeth still farther and farther. And now that we are gotten over into Greece and Asia, provinces full of all ensting pleasures and alluring delights of the world, now that we are come to finger and handle the rich treasures of mighty Monarchs, I fear me that even these things have rather captivated us, than we them. The goodly images, statues and pictures that came from Syracusa are (truit me truly) dangerous to this City, and threaten no less than to many engines of the field displayed against it. And I hear say already, that there are many, and too too many, that praise and have in admiration the beautiful ornaments of Corinb & Athen, and begin to make a corn and game of the images of the Roman Gods made of potters earth only, laughing much at them, where they see them standing forth of the walls. Well, for my part I had rather have these gods so propitious and favorable to us as they be than such as those: and so I hope they will ever be, if we can suffer them to abide still in their usual shrines and places accustomed. No longer ago than in our fathers daies, King Peribius sent his Embassador Cynaeus of purpose, and assisted by rich and goodly gifts, to tempt the minds not only of our men, but also of our women. There was no law Oppia as then in force to bridle and keep down the costly pomp and ostentatious of women: and yet not one of them all received ought at his hands. And what think ye was the cause? even the same and no other, for which our ancestors in times past, never so much as thought upon the providing of any such law. There was no pride then, nor riotous sinneries, nor restraint. And like as the skill and knowledge of diseases, must precede and go afore their cures and remedies: even so evil desires and enormous lusts had need to be first bred & sprung before the laws, which should repress and cut them down. What caused the law Lucinia to be made, concerning 500 acres of ground, forbidding that no man should possesse above, but the exceeding covetousness of men, encroaching still and laying land to land? What brought in the law Cornelia as touching gifts and presents, but this, that the Commons began already to be vassals as it were and tributaries to the Senat. No marvel therefore it is, nor strange may it seem, that neither the law Oppia, nor any other providing for the cutting off the unmeasurable expenses of women, was required and thought needful in those daies: when gold, when purple freely rendered and offered unto them was restrained. If now at this day Cynaeus were come, and went with such gifts round about in the City, he should find receivers enough of women, standing in every street ready for him. And verily, with all the wit I have, I can not devise what the cause and reason should be of many lustful desires and appetites that reign in this age. For say, that if one of you were kept short and debarted of that which another might lawfully have: peradventure there might rise in your hearts (through infirmity) some shame and abashment in nature, or else displeasure and discontentment in reason: so being all as ye are brought within one compass of fur-ture

"niture and apparel, and no ods at all between you, what need any one of you to fear, lest they "should be looked into, marked or observed, more than another. I must needs say, the shame that "followeth & attendeth either upon niggardie or poverty, is wofull of all others; but the law quit-
 "teth and freeeth you of both, when you want but that only which by law ye may not have, and
 "no man will reproach you therefore. Yes mary, quoth some rich and wealthy dame, this same "quality and no distinction at all among us, of all things I cannot abide: Why may not I according "to my calling, be seen arrayed in purple, and adorned with gold? And why is not the poorest estate "of others known, but lieth hidden under this pretreat & cloak of law: so as they may be thought
 "yet (were it not for the law) that such and such things they would have: where as indeed they "are not able to maintain and bear it out? Would ye (in faith) my masters and citizens of Rome,
 "have your wives to flirve thus, that the richer sort might deserve to have that, which no other I "can reach unto: and the poor again, because by that means they would not be defiled, over"strein themselves to go above their calling and ability? Certainly I dare avow, if they begin once "to shame at that which is not shame-worthy, they will not abash at any thing, be it never so "shamefull. Have it the will out of her own, so long as it lasteth: and when all is gone, to her hus"bands purse the will go. Alas poor man and woe begun is that husband, as well he that is inter-
 "tredd by his wife, to stretch his purse strings, as he that is not, when he shall see another man to give "her that, which he would not allow himself. And even now ye see how openly in the street (un-
 "shame-faced as they be) they are in hand with other womens husbands, yea, & that which more
 "is, they keep an intresting for to raise the law, & for the favour of their voices only. For of some
 "they have got the good wills no doubt already, whiles themselves will not be intreated, but draw
 "miserie upon thee, upon thy flate, and upon thy children. Well, let the law once cease to set down
 "a gage and proportion of thy wives expenses, and never think to have remedy, and to flay the "fame of thy self with all thou canst do, be not deceived hirs, to think that the world will be ever "again at the same palls, as it was before this law took pace. And as it is a safer course and lesse "dangerous to let a naughty and obdurate person alone, that he be not called into question at all;
 "than after he is once accused to suffer him to be quite and go away unpunished: even so
 "refusive superfluity, would have been more to be tolreated, if it had not been meddled & tempered with "all than it will be now upon the very binding and turbing thereof: much like a wild and savage "beast left loose after it hath been tyeed up a time, and to made more fell and angry. To conclude
 "therefore, of this opinion am I, that I do not hand the law Oppia be repealed: and so I pray all the "Gods to vouchsafe for to bleis and turn to good whatsoever you do or go about. When he had
 "thus said, those Tribunes also of the Common, who openly promised and protested to oppose "themselves, and to cross the repealing of the law, made some brief speeches to the same effect.
 "Then Laeternius rose up to maintain the bill by him propoled for the revoking of that law, and "spake as followeth. If private men had stepped forth and advanced forward either to approve "and periwade, or to reject & disillade that which by us is propoled, I my self also without open"ing my mouth would have attended your will & expected the delivery of your suffrages, as think"ing it had been sufficiently debated and discussed already, whatsoever might be said for both "parties. But now sith that the Consul M. Porcius Cato, a man of great reputation & gravity, not "only by his countenance and authority (which alone without any word at all spoken had been "important enough & effectual,) but also in a long premeditate Oration framed with much study
 "and forethinking, hath impugned and inveighed against our propoled ordinance, I must of ne"cessity answer him again as briefly as I can. Who nevertheless hath spent more words in repro-
 "ving and chastising the matrons & dames of the City, than he hath bestowed reason to the pur"pose in disavowing our new law: & all verily for this intent, that he might leave it doubtful, whe"ther the women had done that which he blamed them for, as induced by their own motives, or "seduced by us and our suggestions. As for me the protection directly of the cause I will take in "hand, and not busy and trouble my head in defence of our persons, against whom the Consul "hath rather glanced and girded at, by way of big words, than charged indeed by sound reasons.
 "It hath pleased him to call this An assembly and mutinous meeting; yea, and otherwhiles he ter-
 "meth it, An insurrection and secession of women: as if the wives in open place intreated you "to repeal that law, now in time of peace, in the flourishing, and blessed flate of the Common"weal, which during those troublefome daies of war, had been engaged against them. I wot full "well that both these words and other besides are very significant, sought out, and picked for the "purpose, to enforce and aggravate the matter. And we all know, that At Cato is an Oration not "only grave and earnest, but otherwhiles also fell, sharp and bitter, how ever otherwise by natural "disposition he be of a mild spirit and courteous enough. But to the point, What new & strange "thing is this that our wives have done in coming abroad and assembling themselves in compa"nies about a matter that so much concerneth and importeth themselves? What? were they ne"ver before now abroad in open street? I will take the pain. O Cato, to turn over your own "book of Originals against your self. Listen and mark how often they have done the flemble, "and alwayes truly for the common good and benefit of the State. And first and foremost, in the "very beginning and infancy of this City, even in the reign of K. Romulus, when the Capitol was "taken and held by the Sabines: when in the midst of the Common place, they were ranged in bat"tle array and ready to fight a bloody field, was not the quarrel ended and the conflict stayed by "the dames and wives that ran in & put themselves between the two armies? After the KK were "driven

The Oration
 of L. Laeternius against the law Oppia.

A "driven out and expelled, What happened tho? When as the legions of the Volscians under the con"duct of C. Marcius incamped within y miles of Rome, were they not the matrons of the City that "turned back this army, which doubtles would have forced our City & put it to ranck? And "is not this likewise as true, that when the Gauls were possessed of Rome and masters thereof, the "dames of the City and none but they, even by the content of all men, came forth into the open "streets made a contribution, and laid down that gold which paid for the ransom and redempti"on of the City? No longer since than in the last Punick war (because I will not stand so much "upon antiquities) was it not thus, that not only when the City was at a fault for money, the "widows stocks supplied the want of the common treasure? but also at what time as we were "driven to seek for new Gods, and to lend for them afar off to incur us in our extremities; all
 "the wives & matrons of the City went to the Sea side forth to receive the goddess Mother Idea?
 "The occasions (qd. he) are different, and the case is not alike. Neither is it my purpose or any "part of my meaning to compare causes, and to prove they are all one. This only I stand upon, and "take it sufficient to excole and clear the women, for bringing up no strange novelty, in that they "shewed themselves in open place. To proceed therefore: seeing that no man made any wonder
 "then, of that which women did in undertaking the affairs that concerned all alike as well men
 "as women: marvel we now that they do the flemble, in a cause that properly and peculiarly "pertaineth to themselves? And what great thing was it they did? Now in good faith we are too
 "coy and squeamish of our hearing, and our ears over nice and delicate, if when matters diddian
 "not to hear the praises of their servants and slaves, we scorn to give ear to the requests of ladies "and dames of honor. But now I come to the matter in question, in regard whereof the Consul
 "his Oration consisted in two points. For first, he took it very ill that any law at all once enacted
 "should be revoked: and secondly, he stood upon this that above all others the law devised and "made for repressing the superfluous ornaments and attire of women should remain in force for"ever. So it should seem, that the first part (a common defence as it were, of all the laws) was a "speech befitting the place and person of a Consul: but the other against the exceeding pomp of "women, more properly became a man (as himself) of most severe life and precise carriage. And "therefore it is great doubt and to be feared, lest we should seduce you into some error, if we "lay not down and shew plainly the vanity and defect both in the one and in the other. For as I "confess, that of those laws which are devised and established not for a time and by occasion of "some particular occurrence, but for ever and to the perpetual good of a City, none ought to be "abolished: unless it be so that by use and experience the same be checked and found hurtfull, or
 "by some change of the State become needless and superfluous: so I see evidently that those sta"tutes and ordinances which are brought in to fit and serve some seasons, are mortal (if I may so "say) and mutable with the times. And oftentimes we see, that war disclaimeth those laws which
 "peace proclaimeth; and peace pulleth down that which war set up: like as in the government "and rule of a ship, one thing is requisite in fair weather and calm Sea, another in foul and trouble"some tempests. These things thus being in nature divers and distinct, let us consider I pray you,
 "of whether first is this law that now we are in hand to revoke. What? is it one of the ancient "and royal laws made by the Kings, and equal in time with the foundation of our City? or (that
 "B. which is the next in time and authority) was it set down and written in the twelve Tables by
 "the Decemvirs, created of purpose to devise and make laws? Is it of that nature without the
 "which as our ancestors were of opinion, that the honesty and honour of matrons could not "be preferred: so we are to fear likewise left by the repealing thereof, we overthrow the mode"sty, chastity, and integrity of married women? Why? who knoweth not that this is a new law "of so long standing and continuance and no more, made whiles Q. Fabius and T. Sempronius
 "were Consuls? And seeing that without it, wives lived for many years before in good name and "fame, and in passing good order: tell me what danger can ensue, and why we need to fear lest if "it be annulled, they should break out to all looseness and disorder. Mary, if this law had been made
 "at first, to gage the wantonness of women, believe me then it were greatly to be doubted, that
 "E. the putting down thereof would stir them up again to their former outrage. But to what end
 "it was devised, the time is self is able to shew and testifie. Anibal being in Italy, had won a vi"ctory at Cannae: he was now master of Tarentum, Lord of Asip, and possessed of Capua: every "hour men looked when he would march forward and advance his ensigns against Rome: our al"lies were revolted and gone: soldiers we had no more of our own to supply and make up the "decayed bands: no mariners and Sea servants could we find for the maintenance of our Arma-
 "do: all our treasure in the City Chamber was spent and consumed. Driven we were to this
 "exigent, as to take up bondslaves for to serve in wars, and to buy them of their masters for day, "yea, and to make payment of their price after the war was ended. For want of money also the "G. Publians and Patrons of our domain and publick profits, undertook to serve the army with "corn, and to furnish us with all things needfull for war at a certain price, and gave us the like day "and time of payment. The Gally slaves that served at the oar we found and maintained with "our own proper and private charges; and a rate and proportion was set down according to "our revenues and worth in the subsidy book, what number every one should be charged with.
 "All the gold and silver that we had in private we brought forth in common, and the Senators "themselves led the way first, and gave good example. The widows and orphan Children "brought in their stocks of money to the City Chamber. Straight order was given, that "we

"we should not have in our houses either of gold or silver, wrought in plate or otherwise above
 "so much, nor of silver and brims in coin and current money beyond a certain proportion limited.
 "red, At such a time, our dames (belike) were set all upon their braveries, pruning, trimming, and "tricking themselves, in such sort, as the law Oppia must needs be devised, there was no other "remedy to keep down their excessive pride and superfluous expence in their attire and orna"ments: even then, I say, when by occasion that the solemn feast and sacrifice of Ceres was dis"continued, by reason of the general mourning and heavy cheer of all the wives of the City, the "Senat was fain to take order, that they should finish and end their sorrowful mourning within "thirty dayes. Who is so blind that leeth not, how in regard only of the poverty and extreme "calamity of the City, and because all the monies of private persons should be converted into a "common stock, and for a publick use, this law was first framed, drawn, and let down, so long
 "only to stand in strength and vertue, as the caule of penning and writing it should endure and "continue? For otherwise, if those acts and decrees of the Senat, if those orders and ordinances
 "of the Commons, respective unto that present time, should be in force, and observed for ever;
 "Why make we payment of the loan money unto private men? Why do we set and to let "our commodities, our customs and revenues of the City unto farmers for ready rent? Why put
 "we forth our publick works for preient money paid down upon the nail? Wherefore buy we "not slaves to serve in our wars? Lastly, why are we not put to find mariners and oarmen, at our "own proper charges, as then we did? All other elites and degrees, all men else, of what calling "soever, feel a great change in the state of the City, from wo to weal, from adversity to prosper-
 "ty; and shall our wives only miss the good thereof, and not once tast nor enjoy the fruits of "peace, and publick repose and tranquillity? Shall we that are men be in purple and scarlet? Shall "we wear our embroidered gowns and robes when we are Magistrates? Shall we put on our rich "amices and copes, when we exercise the function and ministry of the high Priests? Shall our "children go in their side garments, purified afore with purple? Shall we permit and privilege the "head Officers and Magistrates in our Colonies and Burrough Towns? nay, shall we suffer here at "Rome the Masters and Constatables of every parish, the meanest and basest officers of all other to "wear embroidered gowns, & studded with purple? and not only so, for to grace and credit them"selves, with these goodly ornaments and badges of worship and honour during their life, but al"so to after their death, the same to be burned and buried with them? And shall we debar and for"bid our women only to use purple and scarlet in their apparel? And when you the husband may "have purple and scarlet, carpets, counter-points, and foot-cloths, what reason is there to deny "your wife, the mistress of the house, a gown or mantle of the same? And shall your horse be cap"ped and barbed more richly, and better set out with his caparison, than your wife arrayed in her "apparel? But in truth, for purple and scarlet, which are the worse for the wearing, and wasteth
 "bare, me thinks I see some reason, in as it is (although it be very hard) of sparing and restraint
 "many for gold, wherein little or nothing is lost but the fashion and workmanship, what magi-"dize, what misery is this, to make spare of it, and to deny it them? Nay, I dare avow and abide by
 "it: there is great benefit and use thereof in time of extremity; and it may help at a pinch both in "publick affairs, and in private occasions, as ye have found by good experience. But Cato said
 "moreover, There would be no emulation and envy between this good wife and that, if neither "one nor other were allowed that liberty of apparel and ornaments. True it is, but instead thereof
 "of they all are mightily discontented and grieved at the heart in the mean while, disdaining to "see the wives of our allies of the Latine name and Nation, permitted to wear those ornaments
 "which they are forbidden to have, to see them, I say, all gorgeously set out with spangles and "jewels of gold, clad in their purple and scarlet cloths, riding in their coaches all over their cities, "whiles they at Rome take pains to go afoot on their ten toes, as if the State of the Empire were "seated in their Towns, and not in this their own City of Rome. This indignity were enough to "wound the hearts of men, and make them bleed; what hurt doth it then, think you, to sully wo"men, whom small matters, God wot, are wont to trouble? Alas poor souls: no magistracy and "place of government in State, no sacerdotal dignities in the Church, no triumphs no ornaments
 "and titles of honour, are they capable of, no gifts, no spoils and prizes gotten in wars, can fall to "their shares. Neatness and fineness, gay garments, trim attire, and gorgeous habiliments, are the "honour and ornaments of women: in it they take delight, on it they let their hearts, of it they "make their joy. And therefore well have our ancestors called all furniture for the decking of "women [Mundus Muliebris], What lay they off in time of sorrow and mourning, but their gold "and purple? what put they on and resume again, when their mourning is past, but their gold and "purple? what hang they on them besides in time of publick joy and solemn processions but their "better apparel, their richest attire & most costly ornaments? But peradventure, after ye have once "repealed the law Oppia, it will not be in your power to over-rule them, if haply you should for"bid them to wear any thing that now the law restraineth them of. And perhaps some shall have "more ado with their daughters, their wives, and sisters, and find them less tractable and pliable
 "unto their minds than now they are. Never fear that: women cannot shake off their obedience,
 "so long as their Governors (be they fathers, husbands, or brethren) are alive; nay, of all other "things they abhor and cannot brook to be at their own liberty, when it cometh by the death of "their husbands or parents: Widows Rare and Orphans like, they may not abide. Be sure there"fore, they had rather have their ornaments and attire to be at the disposition of your selves, than

"of the law. And therefore, to speak a truth, you must in equity and reason protect and defend "them in kindness, and not oppress them with hardness and bondage: delight ye must to be called "their fathers and husbands, rather than their Lords and Masters. It pleased the Consul ere while "to give them hard words and odious terms, calling this their meeting, A mutiny of women, and "a very insurrection and departure of theirs: and danger there is no doubt, lest being up on they "will keize upon the mount Sacer, as sometimes the Commons did in the furious anger, or else "possess themselves of the Aventine, and there encamp and keep an hold. Well, this weak and "feeble sex, born to bear, must suffer and endure whatsoever ye shall ordain and let down against "them. But take this withal at the loole for a final conclusion, that the greater power and autho"rity ye have over them, the more discretion and moderation ye ought to use in that sovereignty "of yours. After debate of words passed in this wise, in favor and disfavor of the law, the fol"lowing women flocked in greater multitudes into the open streets, and banding themselves
 "together, as it were, in one troop, they belied the dores and houses of the Bruni, who by interposing "themselves, had hindered and crossed the bill preferred by their fellow Tribunes: and never gave they "over to keep this (for until those Tribunes flaked in their opposition, for to inhibit the same, which they
 "done, there was no doubt then, but all the tribes with one voice would abrogate and abolish "that law. Thus twenty year after the enacting thereof, it was repealed and annulled.

M. Porcius Cato after the abrogation of the law Oppia, presently departed with a fleet of five "and twenty Gallies, whereof five were let out by Allies, and arrived in the Port of * Lunus, to "which place he commanded his forces to assemble: and after by vertue of an edict sent out along
 "the Sea coast, he had gathered together vessels of all sorts as he looked from Lunus: and proclaimed "that they should all follow after him to the Port of Pyreneus, from whence he purposed to let "forth against the enemy, with an Armado of many fall, and well appointed. Who having passed
 "beyond the mountains of Liguria and the gulf of Gaul, arrived and met all together, at the day "and place appointed. From thence they came against * Rhoda, where they expelled the Spanish "garrison that held the fortrels. From Rhoda, with a good gale of wind, they sailed to Emporia, "Where, all the whole army, excepting the mariners, were set a land. At the same time Emporia "were two Towns, separate one from the other by a wall. The one of them was inhabited by "Greeks, who came from Phocæa, from whence the Massilians also are descended: the other was "possessed by Spaniards. But the Greeks Town lieth out into the Sea, so as the whole compass of "the wall is not but a mile about: but the Spanish Town leated farther into the Land, and divided "from the Sea, is defended with a wall three miles in circuit. A third fort of Roman inhabitants "were joynt unto them by * Casus, the Emperor of famous memory, after he had vanquished "Pompey's children. And at this day, they are confused and mingled one with another, and become "one entire body, by reason that first the Spaniards, and afterward the Greeks, were made free de"izens of the City of Rome. A man might well marvel seeing how open they lie of the one side to "the main Sea, how exposed they are on the other side to the danger of the Spaniards, a Nation fo "sierce and warlike, what thing it was that garded and protected them? Discipline it was and good "government, and nothing else, which maintained and preserved them in that weakness of their "discipline I say, which is ever best intertrained of them, who live in fear of the mightier that are "round about them. One quarter of the wall looking to the fields, is passing strong and exceeding "well fortified, having but one gate in all that side; which ordinarily is always warded by one of "the Magistrates. In the night, one third part usually of the citizens kept watch upon the walls, And
 "this watch they maintained not for custome and fashion, nor by vertue of any law: but they per"formed it with as great care, yea, and went the round and law to the sentinels with as much dili"gence, as the enemies were hard at gates. A Spaniard came not within the City; neither went "they forth themselves, unless it were upon just occasion. But on the Sea side the issue was open for "any man at his pleasure. By that gate which turneth toward the Spanish Town they never used to "go forth but in great number, even a third part wellnigh of the Townsmen, and those who the night "before had watched upon the walls. And this caule induced them to go abroad, for that the Spa"niards being no men at Sea gladly would traffick and trade with them: willingly buying of them
 "their strange merchandise from foreign parts brought in by ships: and venting unto them again "their Land commodities and fruits arising of the main. The desire of this mutual commerce and "their Land commodities was the caule, that the Spanish Town was open to the Greeks. And in great "necessary intercourse was the caule, that the Spanish Town was open to the Greeks. And in great "safety and security they were also, by reason that they were shadowed under the wing of the "Roman amity, which they intertained with as great loyalty as the Massilians, although they were "nothing so mighty and puissant. And even at this time they received the Consul and his army
 "with great countenance and liberality. Cato sojournd there some few dayes, whiles he was advertised
 "by his signialls where his enemies abode, and what their forces were: and because he would not be "idle whiles he layed there, he bestowed all that time in training and exercising his souldiers. It "happened to be that season of the year, when the Spaniards had their corn within their granges re"ady for the thrashing floor, whereupon he forbade the cornpurchers to provide grain, and sent "them home to Rome. War, faith he, shall feed and maintain it self. Being departed from * Emporia, "he waded and burnt the territory of the enemies, forced them to run away in every place where he
 "came, and put them in exceeding fright.

At the same time, as M. Helvius departed out of the farther Province of Spain with 6000
 "the garrison souldiers delivered unto him by the Pretor, he was encountered by a great army of the

the enemies fought more lustily in defence of their rampier. The Consul cast his eye all about him, to see how to break in at some place or other where least resistance might be made: and seeing the guard thin about the left gate, thither he conducted the Principals and the Hastati of the second legion: but the corpi de guard, which guarded that gate, was not able to endure their violent charge. The rest on the other side, seeing the enemies within the rampier abandoned the camp, and flung away their ensigns and weapons. The souldiers of the second legion followed the chase and killed them as they ran away, while the other rankless and rifled their tents. Vellutius Antius writeth, that there were 60000 fell that day upon the edge of the sword. Cato himself (that never loved to make the least of his own praise-worthy acts) saith, there were many slain: but setteth not down what number. He is thought to have performed that day three peeces of service worthy of great praise and commendation: first, in that he set a compals with his army far from his ships, far from his camp, and gave battail in the midst of the enemies, where his men could repose no hope at all but in their own vertue and valour: secondly, for sending those cohorts behind the enemies to charge upon their backs: and thirdly, for that he caused the second legion to march a great pace under their colours displayed, ranged as they were and ordered in battail array, for to approach and assail the gates of the enemies camp, while all the rest were disbanded and spread all abroad to pursue the enemy in chase.

After this victory achieved, he sat not still in rest and repose, but having founded the maer and brought his own souldiers laden with pillage into the camp, he allowed them some few hours for their night sleep, and led them forth into the territory of the enemy to forage and spoil: which was as effectual to enforce the Spanish Emptorians, and all their neighbour borderers to yield subjection, as the unhappy battel fought the day before. Many also of other Cities, which were retired to Emporia for refuge, rendered themselves to his devotion: whom he entertained all with gracious words, and when he had made them good cheer, bestowing wine and cates plentifully upon them, he sent them home to their own houses. Then immediately he dislodged and removed his camp. And all the way as he marched with his army there reformed Embassadors from divers States that yielded themselves unto him. By that time that he was come as far as Taracoon, all Spain on this side Iberus, was wholly subdued: and the barbarous people brought in as presents unto the Consul, all the captives and prisoners, as well Romans as Allies, and namely, Latins, who by many and sundry chances had been taken in Spain. The bruit went commonly abroad, that the Consul would lead his power into Turdetania. There was a false alarm likewise given, and spoken it was, That he would visit the mountainers that lay out of the way. Upon this vain and headless rumour, there were seven forts belonging to the State of the Bergians that revolted from him: but the Consul led his army against them, and without any memorable battel reduced them under obedience. And the Consul his back was no sooner turned, and he gone to Taracoon, but they rebelled again, even before he was departed from thence in any other expedition. Subdued they were the second time, but they found not the like favour as before, to have pardon: for they were all sold like slaves in open market, under the garland because they should not thus every while trouble the peace.

In this meantime P. Marius the Pretor, after he had received the old army at the hands of Q. Mutius whom he succeeded, and joined thereto the other army of old souldiers belonging to Appius Claudius, and which were come out of the farther Spain, he made an expedition into Turdetania. Now these Turdetans of all other Spaniards are counted to be the worst folkish, however, in confidence of their great numbers and multitudes they came forward and encountered the Roman forces. But the men of arms had no sooner charged them, but presently, they were disarmed. As for the footmen, they fought in manner not at all. The old approved souldiers, who knew the enemies very well, and were experienced in feats of arms, made a quick dispatch of this skirmish, and soon put all past peradventure. However, the war was not so ended, nor determined in one battel. The Turdetans levied and waged 1000 Celibarians, and so maintained war as with forrain mercenary forces.

The Consul being thus already with the Rebellion of the Turdetans, and supposing that other Cities would do the like, upon any good occasion and opportunity, disarmed all the Spaniards on this side Iberus of their armor and munition. Which they took for such an indignity, that many of them for very melancholly killed themselves: a martial and warlike nation, that thought they were as good be out of the world, as turned out of their arms: and reckoned no life, without their weapons. The Consul having intelligence hereof, commanded the Senators of all those Cities to repair unto him: and when they were assembled together, he used this speech unto them: "It concerneth you (qd. he) no less than us to give over this rebelling and warring. For never yet "to this day have ye entered into the action, but with more loss and damage of Spaniards, than toil and travel of the Roman army. To prevent this mischief that it should not happen, I suppose: one good way is, to contrive and work so, that ye might not possibly be able to rebel. Effect this I would fain, by the effect means and course of all other. Assist me I pray you herein "with your good counsel: I assure you I will not be directed by any advice more willingly than by "that which you yourselves shall give me. When they held their tongues, and would not speak a word, he said unto them again, that he was content they should pause upon the matter, and consult thereof a few daies. When they were called again & kept silence in this second meeting and conference, as in the former he made no more ado, but in one day raised the walls of all their Cities: which which done, he went forward against those that hitherto were not come in, not yielded obedience: and into what quarters soever he came, he received all the States one after another, there bordering and adjoining, into his protection: save only Saguntia, a wealthy City and of importance, which he forced with manteles and rolling pavilions, and such like fabrics. More difficulty in subduing these enemies he found, than others afore him who first came into Spain in this regard, for that in times past the Spaniards at the beginning revolted unto them, as being weary of the tedious yoke of subjection under the lordly government and tyranny of the Carthaginians. But Cato had more ado with them now, in that out of liberty and freedom, which they had enjoyed and been used to, he was to engage them (as it were) bond, and to bring them again to servitude. Besides, he found all out of frame and order, while some of them were up in arms, others were forced by siege to revolt, as not able to have held out long, unless they had been relieved and succoured in time. But of this nature and courageous mind was the Consul, that he would himself in person be present and manage all affairs, as well those of smallest moment, as also those of greatest weight and consequence: and not only devise and give direction what was best to be done, but would himself set to his hand, and execute most of the exploits and effect them fully. There was not one amongst them all that he commanded with more severity and rigour, than his own self. In living nearly, in spare feeding, in much watching, in painful travel he set himself to surpass and outgo the meanest common souldiers. And no privilege challenged he, no advantage sought he to himself in his whole army above others, but only honour and sovereign command.

The Pretor P. Marius had the more trouble in his war-service, by reason of the Celibarians, whom (as it hath been said before) the enemies had levied and hired with their money. And therefore the Consul being sent unto by the Pretor his letters, led his legions also thither. Being there arrived, (now the Celibarians and Turditans were severally encamped apart one from the other) the Romans tell presently to maintain light skirmishes with the Turditans, and ever and anon charged their corpi de guard: and how rashly and inconsiderately soever they began the game, yet they went away winners. As for the Celibarians, the Consul sent certain Tribunes or Knight Marshals unto them to compare giving them in charge to make them an offer and tender unto them the choice of three conditions. First, if they could be content to strange themselves to serve under the Romans, and to receive at their hands double wages to that they bargained for with the Turditans. Secondly, whether they would be willing to go their waies home under safe conduct and public security, besides that their siding with the Roman enemies should not be laid to their charge, nor bring them within the compals of any danger. Thirdly, if they had more mind to war, than, that they should set down some time and place, when and where they might come to assault, and fight out in a set battail. The Celibarians required to take a day for to consider better upon these points. So they assembled together in council, with great trouble and consultation, by reason that some Turditans were thrust in amongst them: upon which occasion, they might worse grow to any conclusion. Now albeit uncertain it was, whether there would be any war or peace with the Celibarians, yet the Romans gathered their provision out of the territory and boroughs of their enemies, like as in time of peace: yea, and more than that, they entered sometimes within their fortifications and defences, as if there had been some common traffick and commerce agreed between them, by way of private trade. The Consul seeing he could not draw the enemy to a battail, first led certain companies lightly appointed with banners displayed, to raise booties in one quarter of the country, which as yet was free, and not tired of the wars: but afterwards hearing that all the bag and baggage and other cariage of the Celibarians was left at Saguntia, he let forward thither to give an assault to the Town. But seeing that nothing would move and stir them, he paid not only his own souldiers their wages, but also the Pretor his army their due, and leaving the main host in the Pretor his camp, himself returned to the River Ebro, accompanied only with seven cohorts. With these forces, as small as they were, he won certain Towns, and there revolted unto him the Sederans, Ansetans, and Suesetans. The Lacetans (a Nation living out of the way alter a savage manner within the wilds and woods) kept in still in arms, not only upon a natural and inbred wildness, but also upon a guilty conscience, in that whiles the Consul and his army was employed in the Turdolan war, they had made sudden raids and incursions into the Lands of their Allies, and pitifully waited the same. And therefore the Consul advanced forward to assault their Town, and led against it not only his own cohorts and bands, but also the youth of his Allies, who had good cause to be angry, and to oppose themselves unto them. The Town which they inhabited, lay out in length, but was not wide and large in breadth: and within one half mile or less, he pitched down his ensigns, and planted himself. There he left behind a guard of choise companies, and straightly charged them not to stir out of that place, before he came unto them himself. The rest of his forces he led about unto the farther side beyond the Town. Of all the aid souldiers that he had about him, the greater number were the youth of the Suesetans, and those he commanded to approach the wall for to give assault. The Lacetans, when they took knowledge of their armor and colours, calling to mind how often they had overrun them at their pleasure, and waited their chance without check or empaachment, how many and sundry times they had in ranged battel discomfited & put them to flight, all at once let open the gate, and sallied out upon them. The Suesetans were loath to sustain the forcible charge of their onfer, that they hardly could abide their very shout & first cry. The Consul seeing now, that he came to pass indeed which he suspected would be for a gallip upon the spur to those said cohorts of his own that were left on the other side under the Town, and taking them with him in great haste, while all the Townsmen were spread abroad in following the chase after the Seditious, he led them into the Town at a place where there was no noise, no stirring, and not a man to be seen: and made himself master of all, before the Lacetans were returned back: but within a while he received them to mercy upon their supplication: who, poor men, had nothing to yield and lose but their bare armor and weapons. Immediately he followed the train of this victory, and led his forces against the bold strong Town of Pergium. This was a receptacle and place of lure resort for certain Rovers and Thieves, who from thence used to make many rodes into the peaceable parts of that Province. The principall and chief person of Pergium quit the place, and betook himself unto the Consul, and began to excite as well himself as the Townsmen: saying, that the government of the Town and the state thereof lay not in their hands. For why? these robbers after they were once received in among them, seized themselves wholly of that strength, and had all at their command. The Consul willed him to go home again, and to devise and forge some likely and probable cause why he had been absent and out of the way: with this charge and direction, that when he saw him approach under the walls, and the robbers aforesaid wholly amused and occupied in idleness thereof, then he should remember to join with the rest of his part and faction, and be possessed of the fortres and hold of the Town. This put he in practise and execution accordingly. So while the Romans of one side scaled the walls, and they on the other side had taken the fortres, these barbarians were suddenly at once surpris'd with a two-fold fear before and behind. The Consul when he had gotten the place into his own hands, gave orders, that all those who were gotten into the Cattle and held it, should remain free, themselves and all their kindred, and likewise enjoy their goods. The rest of the Perperans he commanded the Treasurer to sell and make money of them. As for the Rovers, they suffred according to their deserts. After he had set the Province in quiet, he laid great tributes and imposts upon the mines of iron and silver: which being once ordained and established, the whole province grew in wealth and riches, every day more than other. For these his exploits achieved in Spain, the L.L. of the Senat decreed, that there should be a solemn procession at Rome, to endure for three days.

The same winter, L. Valerius Flaccus the other Consul, fought in France a set field with the power of the Boians, near the forest of Lutetia, and won the victory. And by report, there were eight thousand Gauls there slain: the rest abandoned the war, and slip every one into their own Hamlets and Villages. The rest of the winter the Cons. kept his army at Placentia and Cremora about the Po, and repaired in these Cities whatsoever had been decayed and demolished during the wars.

The affairs in Italy and Spain standing in these terms: when T. Quintius had so passed the winter in Greece, the setting aside the Aetolians (who neither had been recompenced according to the hope that they conceived of the victory, nor yet could long time like of repose) all Greece throughout in general enjoying the blessing of peace and liberty, flourished and maintained their state exceeding well, admiring no less the temperance, justice, and moderation of the Roman General after victory, than his valour and prowess in war: there was an Act of the Senat of Rome brought and presented unto him, importing thus much, That war was determined against Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. Which when Quintius had read, he published and proclaimed a general Diet of Court at Corinth against a certain day, when and where all the States afflicious should assemble by their delegats and Embassadors. Now when there was met together from all parts a frequent number of Princes and great personages, in such sort, that the very Aetolians also were not absent, Quintius used unto them this of the like speech. "The Romans & Greeks have warred against King Philip as ye well know: and as with one mind and common counsel they have done, so either of them had several quarrels unto him, and privar causes and occasions by themselves to take arms. For Philip had broken the league and amity with us Romans, once while by sending aid and maintenance to the Carthaginians our enemies: otherwhiles by assisting our allies in these parts: and to you wards he hath so demeaned himself, that allbeit we could not longer and put up all the wrongs that he hath done unto us, the very injuries that ye have received at his hands, minister sufficient cause unto us to war against him for your sake. As for this dayes consultation, it reflecteth himself in your selves. For, this I propound unto you, Whether your will is to suffer Argos (which as ye know your selves Nabis the tyrant holdeth) to remain still under him in obedience: or whether you think it meet and reason, that almost noble and ancient City as it is, seated in the very heart of Greece, should be reduced unto liberty, to enjoy the same condition and state wherein other Cities of Peloponnesus and Greece do stand. This consultation I lay, as you well see, entirely toucheth you and your good, and concerneth us Romans no farther than this, that by the servitude of that one only City, we can not have the full and entire glory of setting Greece wholly in liberty. But if you regard not the state of that City, and are not moved with the example thereof and the danger, for fear the contagion of this mischief spread farther: we for our parts are content, and take all in good worth, and will not set you down and teach you what to do. Only I require your advice in this point, minding to resolve upon that which the Major part of you shall carry by voices. After the Roman General had ended his speech, all there began to deliver their opinions. And when the deputat delegate or agent for the Athenians had magnified and extolled as highly as possibly he could, the good

A good demerits of the Romans towards Greece, yielding them great thanks, that upon their request they had granted them aid against Philip, and without any petition at all, offered their help and succour against Nabis the tyrant: and seemed therewith, to be offended and displeased at some, who nevertheless in their talk and speeches found fault and carped at these great favours and benefits: yea, and spake badly of ignominious events, whereas it behoved them rather to acknowledge and commend how much they were bound and beholden already to the Romans for good turns past: it well appeared, that he pointed out directly the Aetolians, and girded at them. "Whereupon Alexander, a principall and chief man of their nation, inveighed first against the Athenians, who having been in times past the head Captains and maintainers of freedom, betrayed now the common cause, for love of their own privar flatteries. Moreover, he complained that the Aetolians, who first served Philip in his wars, and at the last (when they saw him down the wind and fortune to frown upon him) fell away like disloyal traitors & possessed themselves of Corinth to their own behoof, practising also to compass and gain unto them the City of Argos. As for the Aetolians, the first and principall enemies of Philip, and always allies and friends to the Romans, howsoever they had expressly and precisely covenanted in the league, to enjoy their towns and territories, after Philip was vanquished, were notwithstanding put besides Echinum and Phigaleum. He charged the Romans with fraud and deceit, who pretending an outward show, a vain title and colour of liberty, held the Cities of Chalcis and Demetrias with strong garrisons: and yet when Philip made some stay and balking to withdraw and void from thence his armed guards, they were ever wont to object and say, that Greece would never be in freedom, so long as Chalcis, Demetrias, and Corinth were in his hand: and finally he alleged against them, that under pretence of Argos and Nabis, they sought occasion to remain still in Greece and keep their armies there. Let them (quoth he) transport their legions once into Italy, the Aetolians would then undertake and promise, that Nabis should remove his garrison out of Argos, upon composition and with good will, or else they would compel him by force and arms, to be over-ruled by the puissance of all Greece united together in one general consent. By this vain babble of his, he moved Asellum first, the Prator of the Achazans, who spake in this wise. Never will Jupiter give us, quoth he, and Queen Juno the Patroness of Argos, suffer that City to be the recompence or price between the Lacedemonian Tyrant, and these pillaging and thieving Aetolians: to be brought to this hard point and their terms of extremity, as to sustain more milery and calamity when it is recovered by us, than when it was won and taken by him. O Quintius, it is not the feeling between us and them that can detest us from these robbers. What will then become of us, if we should make ourselves a fort and Cattle of strength in the midst of Peloponnesus? Might have they of the Greeks but their language, like as they carry nothing of men but their shape and visage. For look unto their manners, their fashions and behaviour, they are more rude and cruel than any barbarians nay, they are more savage than the most wild and ravenous beasts that be. We beseech you therefore O Romans, both to recover Argos out of the hands of Nabis, and also to establish the State of Greece in such sort, that ye leave these parts also safe and secure, though from the robberies and thieving hostility of these Aetolians. The Roman General Quintius, seeing them of all sides to blame and rebuke the Aetolians, said, that he would have answered them himself, but that he perceived them all so hatefully bent against them, that more needfull it was that they were to be appealed than farther provoked. And therefore holding himself justified and contented with that opinion which was conceived of the Romans and Aetolians, he said, that he would demand what their pleasure was to advise, concerning the war against Nabis, unless he desired Argos to the Achazans? And when they all were of one mind to make war, he exhorted them to lend aids proportionably to the power and strength of each State and City. To the Aetolians he sent an Embassador, more to discover and lay open their intention (as it fell out accordingly than upon any hope he had to obtain ought at their hands. Unto the Provost Marshalls of the camp he gave commandment to send for the army from Elasias.

About this time, when the Embassadors of King Antiochus came unto him to treat about alliance and a league, he answered, That he could say nothing to them nor determine of that point in the absence of those Delegats aforesaid: and therefore they were to repair unto the Senat of Rome. Then, himself in person prepared to make an expedition and voyage against Argos, with those forces which were brought from Elasias. And when he was about Cleora, Arifanus the Prator, with 10000 foot of Achazans, and 1000 horse met him in the way: and not far from thence they joyined both their forces and encamped together. The next day after they came down to the plain of Argos, and chose a place to fortifie and lie in leaguer about four miles from Argos. Now was Pythagoras the Captain of the Lacedemonian garrison, who had both married the tyrant's daughter, and was his wives brother besides. This Pythagoras against the coming of the Romans, had fortified with strong guards both the Cattles (for two there were within Argos) and other places, which either had caire accels or were situated. But as he was employed in these preparations and preparations, he could not dissemble and hide the fear which this arrivall and approach of the Romans strake into him: and beside this sort of terror from without, there happened also a storm of rain, which was one Demetrios an Argive, (a young Gentleman of nobility and courage than wisdom and discretion) who at the first by interposing a murall and impenetrable oath had conferred with certain persons of good sufficiency, about expelling the Romans: but as he studied to strengthen the conspiracy and his own side, he was not well assured of their fidelity, and could not judge which of them were true and which not. As he talked upon a time with his complices, the Captain of the garrison sent for him by one of his guards; whereupon he perceived that his complot was revealed: he exhorted therefore the conspirators that were in the way to take arms with him, rather than to die by torture upon the rack: and so with some few about him he marched forward into the market-place, crying often aloud, That as many as loved the safety of the Common-weal should follow him as their head and maintainer of their liberty: but no man moved he with his speech to go after him and take his part: for no hope saw they of any succour at all near at hand: so far off were they from making good account of a fire-guard of defence. And as he spake those words, the Lacedæmonians were come round about him, and killed both him and his fellows. After this were others also apprehended: the most part of them were slain, and some few cast into prison. A great number the night following slid down the wall by ropes, and fled to the Romans. These assured the Romans, that if their army had been near the gates, the commotion and conspiracy aforesaid would have taken effect: and in case their camp approached nearer, the Argives would not be in quiet, but make some insurrection: whereupon Quintius sent out the footmen lightly appointed, together with the horse-men; who skirmished with the Lacedæmonians about Cylarabis (a publick school and place of exercise about a quarter of a mile out of the City) who were sallied out at the gate, and without any great difficulty chased them within the town: and in that very place where the conflict was, the Roman Generall encamped. One day he spent in escourting an embassy, whether any new trouble and uproars arose among them within the City. But when he perceived once that they were all amored for fear, he assembled a Council to take advice. Whether he were best to give the assault upon Argos, or no? All the heads of Greece, (except Arifanus) agreed with one accord, that since there was no other cause of war elsewhere, it should begin there especially. Quintius in no case would do that course, but willingly he gave ear with evident approbation unto Arifanus, as he discoursed and reasoned against the generall opinion and consent of them all: and over and besides added this of himself, That considering the war was enterprised and taken in hand in the behalf of the Argives against the tyrant, there was nothing less becoming and more without-ence, than to leave the enemy himself, and to assail and batter the poor City of Argos. For his part he would fight at the head, even against the Lacedæmonians and their tyrant, the principall cause of this war. Then having dissolved the Council, he sent certain cohorts lightly appointed to purvey store of grain. As much as could be found ripe in those parts was cut, mowed, and reaped down immediately and laid up: all that was green they trampled under foot and spoiled: but the enemies soon after might have no good thereof. So he dislodged and removed from thence, and having passed over the mountain Parthenius, at three daies end he encamped in the territory of Carpe near to Tegen. In which place he expected the aids of his allies before he would invade the territory of the enemies. From Philip there came a thousand and five hundred Macedonians, and of Theffians forty horse. The Roman Generall staid not now for succours of men (whereof he had sufficient and plenty) but for his provision of victuals, which he had commanded the towns bordering near hand to furnish him withall. Besides, there came great forces by sea, and met him there: for by this time was Lucius Quintius arrived with forty sail from Leucas: sixteen covered ships of Rhodes. And now also was Eumenes the King, about the Islands Cyclades, with ten clove hatched and decked ships, thirty gallions, with other smaller vessels armed of sundry sorts. Likewise of Lacedæmonians that were exiled and banished persons, there were very many; who, chased and driven out by the oppression and wrongfull dealing of their tyrants, repaired now into the Roman Camp, in hope to recover their native country again. Now a great many had been expelled in divers and sundry ages, since time that the tyrant first usurped misdeed and were possessed of Lacedæmon. The chief of these exiled persons was one Agellipolis, a man to whom by right of descent and lineage the inheritance of the kingdom of Lacedæmon appertained. He whilst he was but an Infant hapned to be expelled by Lycurgus after the death of Clementis, who was the first tyrant at Lacedæmon.

The tyrant before thus round about with wars threatening both from sea and land, and destitute in manner of all hope, (considering the proportion of his forces to the power of his enemies:) yet nevertheless neglected not to wage war, but levied out of Creta one thousand more (even the chosen flower of all their youth) to the other thousand that he had from thence already. He had besides of mercenary souldiers three thousand in arms: also ten thousand of his own subjects and Citizens of Lacedæmon, together with those that he had taken out of the burroughs and villages in the country. Moreover, he fortified the City with trench and more. And that there might arise no trouble and stir within the town, he held the spirits of men in awe with fear of sharp and rigorous punishments. And forasmuch as he could not hope nor imagine that they desired and wished his good and safety, for that he held some Citizens in suspicion and jealousy: after he had brought forth all his forces into the plain, which they call Dromos, he commanded the Lacedæmonians to assemble together without any armour and weapons to an audience: and when they were assembled he environed them with his armed guard. And after some few remonstrances by way of a short preamble, Why they ought to hold him excused at such a time, if he feared every thing, and made all sure as well as he could: considering withall, it was expedient even for them also (as many as the present state of the world might bring in suspicion) to be kept short for being able to execute any attempt, rather than be surprized in the midst of their practices and complots, and is a running race.

And so to be punished accordingly: even for this cause (quoth he) I will have certain persons in safe custody and durance, untill such time as the tempest be overblown which now is coming. And when the enemies be once repelled, (from whom less danger there will be in case domesticall treasons may be prevented) then incontinently will I enlarge them and let them at liberty. This said, he commanded the names to be called of fourscore or thereabout of the principall of the youth; and as every one of them answered to his name, he clapt him up in fast in prison: and the next night following, murthered them every one. After this, certain lots (these were they who ever of old time were the Burghers and Villagers, a kind of peasants and country kerns) were accused to have intended to flie unto the enemy and to band with him: who likewise were whipped & scourged throughout all the streets, and then put to death. By the fearful example of this cruelty, the courages of the common sort were well cooled and abated, yea, and so abated, that they durst not once quench nor give attempt of any new designs tending to change and alteration. His forces he kept within his strength and places of defence, for neither thought he himselfe strong enough to enter the field and fight a set battell, nor durst abandon the City, seeing the minds of men to wavering, and their affections to unconstant.

Quintius having made his provision and set all things in good order, departed from his standing camp, and the second day came to Sellacia upon the river Oenus: in which very place Antigonus sometime King of the Macedonians struck a battell (men say) with Cleomenes the tyrant of the Lacedæmonians. And there, having intelligence, that from thence he was to mount upon an hard ascent and narrow passage, he set a short compass through the mountains, having first before Cleomenes him to level the ground and make the way even, and so got into a large and broad portage, untill he came to the river Eurotas, which runneth in manner hand under the walls of the City of Sparta: where, as the Romans were pitching their tents, even as Quintius himself with the horsemen and light van-couriers gone before, the Auxiliaries of the tyrant charged upon them who looking for nothing less, because no man had encountered them all the way as they marched, but passed on in their journey as in a peaceable country, were much troubled and affrighted herewith. This fear of theirs continued a good time, while the horsemen called upon the footmen, and they again unto the horsemen; and both the one sort and the other trusted in themselves but little or nothing at all. At length the standards of the legions with their ensignes came forward; and were within sight, and so loom as the companies of the vanguard advanced forth to fight, they who erewhile terrified others, were driven in fearfull haste themselves into the City. The Romans being retired so far from the wall, as that they were without dart-shot, stood a while ranged in battell array. But after that they saw none of the enemies come abroad against them, returned to their leaguer. The next day after Quintius took his way and marched with his army in order of battell along the town side, near unto the river, hard at the foot of the hill Mandur. The companies of the legionary footmen led the march in the vanguard, the light footmen and the horsemen followed in the reerward, and flanked the rest. Nabis kept within the walls his mercenary souldiers (in whom he reposed greatest confidence) arranged under their ensignes, and in readiness to fight, purposing to charge the back of his enemies. And the reerward of the Romans was not so soon passed by, but they sallied out of the town at sundry places at once, with as tumultuous a noise as they made the day before. Appian Claudius had the leading of the reerward, who having prepared beforehand the hearts of his souldiers, and advertized them to be prest and ready for what occurrence forever might happen, presently turned the ensignes, and set a compass with the whole army to make head against the enemies. Whereupon there ensued a hot fight which endured a good time, as if two armies had directly encountered one another. In the end, the souldiers of Nabis began to give ground and flie: in which flight of theirs they had made less hast, and better served themselves, but that the Achæans who were acquainted well with the ground, and knew the coasts of the country, hotly followed the chase: there made a foul slaughter and butchery among them; and the most part, such as were dispersed here and there in their flight they disarmed. Then Quintius encamped near unto Amycla, and having harried and wasted all the territory round about the City (which places were very well peopled and very pleasant:) when he saw no enemies issue out at the City gates, he removed his camp hard to the river Eurotas. From whence he made excursions, wasted all the vale lying under the hill Teigetus, and the lands butting and adjoining close to the sea.

Much about the same time L. Quintius made him self Master of the towns, situate on the sea side: some yielded willingly, others for fear or perforce. And being afterwards advertized, that the town Cytherium served for a place of safe retreat and refuge unto the Lacedæmonians in all their exploits and service at sea, and that the Romans lay encamped not far from the sea side, he resolved to assail it with all forcible means. This town at that time was very strong, well peopled with Citizens and other inhabitants, and sufficiently furnished with all warlike provision and munition. And in very good time it fell out, that as Quintius was entered into this difficult enterprise, King Eumenes and the Rhodian fleet arrived. A mighty number of mariners and sea-servitors, gathered out of those Amnades, within few daies made and furnished all engines and fabrics, which were to assault a City so well fortified both by sea and land. Now was the town-wall broken down with the sea-monition of the tortures, now was the wall broken by the push of the ram, and with all these means: so that by continuall battery was overthrown, and with the fall thereof all the wall that stood on each side came tumbling down and lay along. And the Romans endeavoured red at one time to enter the town, both from the haven (where the passage was more plain and easy) to the end, that the enemies might abandon the defence of the more open place; and aloft the breach made in the wall: and they mist it but very little of entrance there where they intended, but the hope they conceived of yielding the City, which anon was crossed again, and turned to nothing, staid their violence and heat of assault. Dexagoridas and Gorgopas governed the town then in equal authority. Dexagoridas had dispatched a courier to the Roman lieutenant, to signify that he would betray the town: and when the time and place of execution of this designement was agreed upon between them, the traitor was killed by Gorgopas: by occasion whereof, the City was the better defended with more careful heed by him alone: yea, and the assault thereof had been more difficult, but that Titus Quintus came to succour and help with four thousand chosen soldiers. He was no sooner discovered with an army arranged in battell array from the brow and top of the hill that is not far distant from the town: whereas L. Quintus withall from another side followed the assault with his ordnance and artillery both by sea and land, but Gorgopas then began himself to despair in very deed, and was driven perforce to take that very course, which in another he had punished by death: and upon composition that he might depart and have away with him those soldiers which he had in garrison, he delivered up the City to Quintus.

Before that Gythium was rendered, Pythagoras left as Captain at Argos, leaving the guard and defence of the City unto the charge of Timocrates of Pellena, came with a thousand waged soldiers, and two thousand Argives unto Nabis at Lacedaemon, and Nabis like as at the first arrival of the Roman fleet, and the surrender withall of the towns standing by the sea side, was much affrighted, so he had recovered again some little hope and was well quietted in mind, so long as Gythium held out till, & his garrison within the town kept their own, but after he heard once, that it also was yielded unto the Romans, and lost; seeing no hope left by land side, which was wholly possessed by the enemies, and that he was altogether shut up from the sea, he thought it best to yield unto fortune, And first he sent an herald into the camp, to know whether the enemies would permit and suffer him to send his Embassadors unto them. Which being granted, Pythagoras repaired unto the General with no other charge and commission, but only to request that they might parley with the Roman General. Hereupon the Council was assembled: and generally opined it was, that there should be granted unto him a conference; inasmuch, as both time and place was agreed upon and appointed. Now when they were come to the hills standing in the midst of that quarter, with some small companies of soldiers attending on either side upon them: they left their cohorts behind them, standing in guard, within the open view and sight of both parts: and then Nabis came down with a certain chosen guard for his body; and Quintus accompanied with his brother, Eumenes the King, Sabellus the Rhodian, and Arillhenus the Praetor of the Achaeans, with some few Knight Marshalls and Colonels. And then the tyrant being put to his choice, whether he would speak first, or hear another, began his speech in this wise.

The Orator of Nabis.

"If I could have bethought my self (O Quintus, and you all that are here present) & imagined what the cause should be, that you either proclaimed or made war first against me. I would have attended the issue of my fortune with silence. But now I could not have that Maistery and command of my self to forbear, but that before I perish, I would needs know the reason and cause of my ruin and overthrow. Surely if ye were such men as the Carthaginians are reported to be (with whom there is no regard of truth, no trust and security in covenants of fociety and alliance) I would not then marvel at all if you made small reckoning, & cared but little what measure ye offered unto me. But now, when I behold and advise you well, I see you are Romans, whose manner is to entertain most duly and precisely the observation of holy rites & divine Religion, and the faithful keeping of human league and alliance. When I consider and look into my self, I hope and think verily that I am one, with whom in general, as well as with the rest of the Lacedaemonians ye are linked by virtue of a most ancient league; and in particular regard of my self, a private amity and society hath been lately renewed by the war with Philip. But peradventure some man will say, That I have broken and overthrown the same first, in that I hold the City of the Argives. And how shall I be able to answer this, and excuse my self? Shall I plead to the Necessity of the matter, or to the circumstance of the time? The thing it self preferreth unto me a twofold plea for my defence. For being called by the inhabitants themselves of the City, who offered the town unto me. I received it at their hands, and in no wise seized upon by force: I received it, I say, when it fided and took part with Philip, before it was comprised within your league. As for the time it justifieth and cleareth me also and my doings. For even then when as I was possessed of Argos, I was allied and associated with you in good accord: and in our covenants, we articulated and capitulated to send aids unto you for your wars, and not to withdraw the garrison from Argos. And verily in this difference and question about Argos, I have the vantage: we'll in regard of the equity of the fact (in that I received a City not of yours but of your enemies) received it I say, not surprised by force, but offered and delivered willingly) as also by your own confession, for that in the conditions of the association agreed between us, ye left Argos free unto me. But it may be that the name of tyrant hurteth me: and some of mine accusations condemn me much, and namely, that I set slaves free, and divide lands to the poor commons. As for the name, thus much I am able to answer: that, such as I am, better or worse, still I am the very same man, and no other than I was when you, even you O Quintus, entered alliance with me: then, I remember well, I was called King among you; and now I see I am termed a Tyrant. And therefore

"therefore if I my self had changed the title and stile of my dignity and government, I must have yielded a reason and account of my levity and inconstancy: but seeing you have altered it, ye ought to answer for your vanity. Now as concerning the multitude, so augmented by the enfranchising of slaves: as touching the land also, parted and distributed among the poor and needy, I can maintain and justify my doings herein, & prove, that I am under the defence and privilege of the very time. For all these things, be they as they be may, I had done already, when ye made a league and covenant with me, and received aids at my hand in the war against Philip. But in case I had done so at this very present, I stand not now upon this, whether I either had offended you or broken your amity; but thus much I aver, that done I had according to the custom and fashion of our ancestors. And ye must not think to square and try the practice of Lacedaemon according to the rule and square of your laws and ordinances. For to let pass many other things (and needles it is to compare particulars) ye chuse your gentlemen or men of arms according to their revenue: according to revenue ye chuse likewise the footmen. Your will is that some few should excel in wealth and power, & the commons be subject and vassals unto them. Our Law-giver thought not good that the common-wealth should be ruled by a few, whom you call a Senator: that one or two States should excel & have preeminence in the City; but he thought that in the equality of wealth & worship, there would be many more to bear arms for their country, I have made a longer discourse I confess, than the ordinary and natural brevity of my speech in these parts will bear. And I might have knit all up in one word and said, that I had done nothing after I was entered into amity with you, wherewith you needed to have taken any offence & been displeased. Then the Roman General made answer to these points in this manner. No friendship nor association at all have we made with you but with Philip: the true & lawful King, of the Lacedaemonians; whereof, I must needs say that the tyrants also who afterwards held the leignory & sovereignty of Lacedaemon, have usurped the right, and enjoyed the benefit during the time that we were otherwise employed, and wholly busied, one while in the Punic wars, another while in the Gauls, and evermore in one or other: like as you also have done in this last Macedonian war. For what was less unfixing and more absurd, than for us who waged war against Philip for the liberty of Greece, to conclude amity with a tyrant; and such a tyrant, as of all others that ever have been is most cruel, most violent and outrageous with his own subjects? And considering that we were entered into the course and train of letting all Greece at liberty, albeit you had not possessed your self of Argos by covin, nor held the same by force, yet it behoved us to restore Lacedaemon also to her ancient liberty, and to settle her in her own laws, whereof ere while you would seem to make mention, as if you had followed the steps of Lycurgus. Shall we make care and take the pains to void the garrisons of Philip out of Iassus & Bargille; and when we have done, leave to be trodden under your feet Argos & Lacedaemon, two most noble Cities, the two lights as it were in times past of all Greece; which remaining still in servitude and slavery, might deface the rest of our glory & mar the title that we aim at, of Saviours and Deliverers of Greece? But you say, that the Argives friended Philip and took his part. We are content well enough, that you should not trouble your self and be angry for our sake. For we know for certain, that this was the fault of two or three persons at most, and not of the whole City: and we know as well, that it was not agreed in any publicke council, that you and your garrison were sent for and received into the Castle. As for the Thebaisians, the Phocians, & Locrians, they sided with Philip, we wot right well by a general consent of all; and yet when we enfranchised all Greece besides, we also set them at liberty. What think you then should we do in regard of the Argives, who are innocent for any publicke counsel intended against us? You said that you were blamed & charged for letting bondslaves free. No small objections these are: I assure you, not of little importance. But what are they in comparison of other bad parts and heinous facts, committed by you and your followers day by day, one in the head of another: Grant but liberty of an Assembly general either at Argos or Lacedaemon wherein the people may speak their minds freely, and what they know by you without impeachment: if you would learn the truth indeed, and hear the particular of a most proud and unupportable dominion and tyranny. And to let all old matters go by. What a bloody massacre committed this son in law of yours Pythagoras, even almost within my very sight in Argos? nay, what a slaughter and butchery made you your self, even when I was well near within the marches of Lacedaemon? But come on those persons whom in a general assembly you caused to be attached, and promised in the presence of all the Citizens to keep them safe and sure in ward: come on, I say, command them to be brought forth now bound as they be: that their poor fathers & mothers may understand that they are alive, whom they have mourned for so much, without cause, as if they had been dead. But you will say, let case all this be true, what is that to you Romans? Dare you indeed speak out and say so much to those that deliver Greece and set it free? to those I say, that for the freedom thereof have passed the sea have warred both by land and sea? And yet all this while (say you) I have not directly & truly wronged you, nor properly infringed & broken your friendship and amity. No have you not? How often would you have me to convince you of the contrary? But I will not use many words & much circumstance, but come to the very catch and point of the matter, What be the things I say you, wherewith friendship is commonly broken? I take it they are these two especially, namely, if you take my friends for your foes; and joy your self to my enemies. You have done both the one and the other: for you have taken by force and arms Messena, a City received into our society and alliance by the very same conditions and covenants that Lacedæmon was; H you I say our allies have forced a City allied unto us. Again, with Philip our enemy, you have not only concluded amity, but (God save all) contracted alliance and affinity by means of Phœtus a Colonnell and Commander of his: and making war against us, you have kept the seas all about Malta with your men of war and rovers: and I think I may safely say, you have taken prisoners, and killed more Roman Citizens than Philip himself. And the whole sea-coast of Macedony hath left infected our ships that use to bring provision unto our armies, and been more safe for passage than the promontory & cape of Malta. Do you forbear therefore to make such vain brag of fidelity: spare you of another, to speak of the rights of alliance; and laying off the mask of popular language and civil speech, talk as a tyrant and enemy as you are. Upon this, Antiochus dealt with Nabis, one while admonishing and advising him, another while requesting and entreating him, I now that the opportunity was offered, to provide for himself and his whole estate: he began to discourse unto him of the Tyrants of all the states confining thereabout one after another by name, who when they had reigned up and laid down their absolute sovereignty of command, and restored liberty to their subjects, passed their old age among their Citizens, not only in re-posit and security but also in great honour and reputation. These words uttered & heard between them and so the night drew on apace & parted the conference. The morrow after, Nabis promised, seeing the Romans would have it so, to quit the City Argos, to withdraw his garrison from thence, and to deliver again all the captives and fugitive traitors that were under his hands: and if they demanded any more of him, he requested that they would set it down in writing, that he might consult thereof with his friends. So both the Tyrant had respite and time granted to take advice, and also Quintus fate in Counsell with the principall heads of his allies what to do, for never would the liberty of Greece be otherwise firm and sure: and better far had it been, never to have entered into arms with him, than being once begun, to give it over. And he will, say they, be greater and more strong hereafter, as if his tyrannical government were approved, and no doubt he would vouch the people of Rome for author of his unjust rule and dominion, and will induce and incite by his example many in other free States and Cities, to lie in wait to work means to overthrow the liberty of Citizens, and to bring them into thralldom and bondage. The General, of himself was more affected and inclined to peace: for he saw, "that if the enemy were once encased within the walls, there was no way but to lie in siege against the City, and that would require long tract of time: forasmuch as it was not Gyrænum (and yet that was betrayed and im-mured and not forced by assault) but Lacedæmon, a most strong town both for men and munition, "that they were to lay siege unto and assault. And whereas the only hope was, that when they approached with the army, there might some dissension and sedition have risen among themselves within: now when as they saw the ensignes in manner advanced hard to the City gates,

* Hereupon it is, that they who are few words, and pity, are fast to speak Latin: and that manner of speech is called Lacertina. The answer of Quintus.

 "there was not one that mutined or stirred at all. He added moreover and said, that Phœtus the "Embassador newly returned from Antiochus, reported, how all was not found there, nor the "peace like to continue: and that he had passed over into Europe with far greater forces both for "land and at sea than at any time heretofore: and if (quoth he) the army should be wholly em"ployed in the siege of Lacedæmon, what other power have we to maintain war withal against "so puissant and mighty a Prince as is Antiochus? These were the remonstrances that openly he "gave out; but secretly he was troubled in mind for fear lest a new Consul should come in his place,
 "and have the government of the Province of Greece: and so he should leave unto his successor,
 "the honour of the victory of a war commenced by him, and in good forwardness. But when he "perceived that his allies were nothing inclined to his waies, notwithstanding all his contradic"tion and bending to the contrary, by making semblant that he now drew with them and was of "their mind, he went them all to approve his designment and intention. "Well, God speed our "hand (quoth he) let us besiege Lacedæmon since ye will needs have it so: but considering that "the laying siege unto Cities, is a thing as ye well know, that goeth so slowly forward, and "sometimes maketh the assailants sooner weary than the defendants: you ought even now to cast
 "this account presently with your selves, that we must lie all winter long about the walls of "Lacedæmon. And were there nothing but travell and perill, that during so long time we were "to endure, I would exhort and encourage you to suffer and abide the same, with stout bodies "and resolute minds. But besides all that, we must be at great cost and expences about fabrics, "engines, and instruments of artillery, requisite to the assault of so great a City: we must I say be "provided of victuals good store against winter, as well to serve us as you. Bewell advised
 "therefore (to the end that you should not suddenly in haste huddle up these matters, or as ye
 "are once entered into the sasion, give over and abandon it with shame) that ye dispatch
 "your letters forth and every one to the State wherein he liveth, and found them to the depth,
 "how their hearts serve them and what strength and forces they have. Of aids & succours have O
 "enough and to spare: but the more in number we are, the more maintenance shall we need. At "this time the territory of our enemies hath nothing but bare soile and naked ground: and "withall, the winter is coming on apace, all which seasons, carriage (especially far off) is cum"bersome and hard. This Oration at the first caused them every one to regard and look homeward
 "to domesticall difficulties and inconveniences, namely, the idleness, the envy and backbiting
 "of those which tarry at home, against them that are employed in warfare: the common liberty

A (which causeth men of one society and commonalty hardly to accord and foit together) the pub-like want of pleasure, and the nigardice of private persons: when they are to part with any thing out of their own purses: And therefore suddenly changing their minds, they put to the discretion of the Roman Generally, to do and determine what he thought expedient for the good of the people of Rome and their allies. Whereupon Quintus taking the advice only of his own Lieutenants and Provost-Marshals, engroffed these Articles and conditions following, according to which peace should be concluded with the Tyrant. Imprimis, That there be a truce made for the term of six months between Nabis and the Romans. King Eumenes and the Rhodiens, Item, That both Quintus and Nabis should immediately send Embassadors to Rome, that the peace might be ratified and confirmed by the authority of the Senat, Item, That from that day forward, wherein the conditions put down in writing should be presented unto Nabis, the true aforesaid should be kept. Item, That within ten daies next after ensuing, all the garrisons quit Argos and the rest of the towns within the territory of the Argives: and then thole peeces to be delivered void and free unto the Romans. Item, That no slave taken captive in wars, belonging either to the King, or to any publick state, or private person, be had away from thole towns: and if any before time had been carried forth, they should be restored again duly to their right Masters. Item, That Nabis should deliver again those ships that he had gotten from the maritime Cities, and that himself have no vessel at all but only two gallions, and those to have no more than six and twenty oars apiece to direct and rule them. Item, That he render all the runagate Traitors and captives unto all the Cities confederate with the people of Rome, as also make restitution to the Medesians of all their goods again, that either could be found, or the owners know certainly to be theirs. Item, That he restore to all the banished Lacedæmonians their wives and children: but of the wives, so many only as would be content to follow their husbands: and that none of them should be compelled against their wills to go with any exiled person. Item, That to as many mercenary souldiers of Nabis, as were either gone from him into their own Cities, or to the Romans, all their own goods should be justly and truly delivered again. Item, That in the Island of Cyru he should not be possessed of any one City: and look what Cities he then held, he yield them to the Romans. Item, That he enter into alliance with no Candiot, nor with any other whatsoever, nor yet make war with them: Item, That he remove all the garrisons out of all the Cities that himself had delivered up, and which had surrendered themselves and all they had, under D the protection and obedience of the people of Rome, and not molest them neither by himself nor any of his. Item, That he build no town nor Castle, either in his own land or in any other.
Item, That for the more assurance of performing these covenants, he give five hostages, such as it should please the Roman Generally to chooise: and namely, his own son for one of them. Last of all, That he make present payment of one hundred talents of silver, and fifty more yearly untill the term of eight years be run out. These Articles engroffed, were sent to Lacedæmon, after the Camp was removed nearer to the City. But nothing well pleased was the tyrant with any of them. Only he was well apaid, that beyond his hope and expectation, there was no mentioon at all therein of reducing the exiled persons home into the City. But that which offended and displeased him most was this, that both shipping was taken from him, and also the maritime E ports towns: for great commodity he gat by the sea. In scouring the coast from the cape of Malta with his pyrats and men of war: and besides, the youth and able men of those Cities, served his turn very well to furnish and man his ships with the very best souldiers and men of service that were. And albeit he scanned and considered upon these articles in great secrecy with his friends, yet were they all of them divulged abroad and current in every mans mouth: so vain are these counsels commonly and hardly to be trusted, as in all things else so especially in keeping of secret counsell. These conditions were controlled and found fault with, not so much by all men in general, as by each one in particular, as they took exceptions against those points that touched and concerned themselves. They that had married the wives of the banished, or were possessed of any part of their substance, chafed, and stormed thereat, as if they were to lose and forgo their F own, and not to render and restore the goods of others. The slaves who had been freed by the tyrants, were now not only to lose the benefit of that freedom, but also to endure harder servitude and bondage than aforetime: setting before their eyes how they should return again into the houses and hands of their old Masters, angry and incensed now against them. The hired souldiers were malecontent, for that they saw they should lose their pay after peace concluded: and saw full well, that there was no being for them in thole States and Cities, who hated the tyrants themselves no more than their followers and attendants. At first they muttered and murmured, whispering these things among themselves in their secret meetings and conventicles: afterwards they mutined, and on a sudden ran and took arms. The Tyrant seeing the multitude disquieted enough of themselves with this tumult, assembled the people to G gather. Where, after he had declared the conditions imposed upon him by the Romans, and in every article had untirly put to somewhat of his own devising, to aggravate all matters and make them seem more grievous and intolerable, at the rehearsing of every particular the whole assembly one while cried out, and another while the sundry parts thereof, set up a note of utter dislike. Then he asked their opinion what answer they would have him to return unto thole Articles, and what to do? They all in manner with one voice accorded and said, that there was no answering of the matter, but that he should plainly go to war, and make no more

ado. And that every man for his own part (as the usual manner is of a multitude, when they are all together) should take a good heart, and hope the best, saying that Fortune favoureth Fortitude. The tyrant insinuated with these their words, exceeded them himself, & assured them that Antiochus and the Ætolians would take their parts and assist them: and if they did not, yet were they strong enough of themselves, and had sufficient means to endure the siege. No more talking now nor thinking of peace, but every man was ready to run in huff to his several quarter, and stand upon their own guard, without any rest or repose from thenceforth. The Romans so soon as they saw some few of them to fall out of the City, and to discharge their darts among them, were soon put out of all doubt, that no other remedy there was, but they must to war again. After this, these particular skirmishes four daies together, at first without any assured issue of good speed, either of the one part or the other: but the fifth day after one conflict fought in manner almost of a full battell, certain Roman souldiers following the chase upon their enemies, and killing them in their flight, entered the City at certain void places, where the wall was not united: for in that order were the walls built of that towne those daies. Quintus then verily, having well bridled and tamed by this terror his enemies for making any more excursions, and supposing that there remained no more, but huffily to go to an assault, sent out certain of purpose for to call the mariners & sea-servitors from Gyreneum, whiles himself in person, accompanied with the Provost Mithras, rode about the walls to view the situation of the City. This Sparta in times past stood without murage. And the tyrants of late daies had built walls against the open flats and plain fields. The higher ground and of harder access, they fortified with strong corps de guards of armed footmen, instead of bulwarks of defence. When Quintus had sufficiently considered every corner, he supposed there was no other way but to invest it round about, and thereupon with all his forces united (which being all together Roman Citizens and Latine allies, foot and horse, land-souldiers and sea-servitors one with another, amounted to 50000 fighting men) he compassed and environed the City. Some brought scaling ladders, some fire, every man one thing or other, not only to give an assault, but also to terrifie and amaze them: with direction and expresse commandment, with a loud cry and shout at one in all places to approach the walls, & give the venture upon them: to the end that the Lacedæmonians affrighted at one instant on every side, might not know which way to turn them, and be so feek, where first to make head against the enemies, and in what place to come with succours. Having therefore divided the whole power of his army into three parts, he gave the one of them in charge to assault that quarter which was called Phærum: a second likewise to set upon that which is named Distryneum, and the third to force the cunton Hæpagonia: places all lying open and without a wall. The City being thus seized on all sides with so great fear, the tyrant moved and troubled to hear those sudden outcries & fearful news brought unto him by halty messengers: according as any place stood most in danger, at the first, either presented himself in proper person, or else lent some to help: but afterwards, seeing the fear so general, and no one place void of danger, he was so affonied, that unable he was either himself to give good direction to others or to hear theirs. So void was he, and disurnished of advice and counsel, yea, and bereft of his right wits and senses. The Lacedæmonians at first hand sustained the furious violence of the Romans in the narrow freights and passages, & at one time in divers places, three armies fought on either side: but afterwards, as the heat of the fight increased, the service was nothing equal of both parties: for the Lacedæmonians discharged shot from which the Roman souldiers easily saved themselves, by means of their large targets, and withall much thereof either fell short and besides, or else so feebly flung from them, that little or no harm they could do. For by reason of the straightness of the place, and the multitude who thronged and thrust together, they had not only no place to take their run, when they should lance their darts (the best means of all other to enforce them) but not so much as sure footing, and at ease to drive and level them with all their strength. Inasmuch, as of all the darts and javelins which were directly shot against them, none as it pierced to their bodies, & very few so much as stuck in their bucklers. Many some happened to be wounded from the higher places, by those that stood near unto them, and about their sides. And anon as they advanced forward they chanced to be hurt, not only with arrows & darts from off the houses, but also with tiles and flates ere they were aware. But afterwards, they covered their heads with their targets, which they set so close united together one under the other, that betwixt, that not only there was no place of entrance for the darts thrown and cast at random afoot, no, nor so much as any room for a weapon to get between, levelled though it were, and aimed near at hand: so as under this target-fence they approached nearer and nearer in safety. At the first the narrow and straight passages filled with the throng both of themselves and also of the enemies so thrust and crowded together, staid them for a while; but afterwards, when they had by little and little gathered upon the enemies, and put them back, and were come into a larger and more spacious street of the City, then their force and violence could not possibly be endured any longer. Now when the Lacedæmonians turned their backs, and fled apace to gain the higher places for their vantage, Nabis verily for his part trembling and quaking, as if the City had been quite lost, looked about him on every side, which way himself might escape and save his life. But Pythagoras as in all things else he performed the devoir and part of a conrigious Captain, so he was the only cause that the town was not lost: for he commanded to set fire on the houses standing next to the wall, which in the minute of an hour burned out on a slight flame, as being set forward by the help of those, who otherwise were wont to quench the fire: carelest

A whereupon the houses came rattling and tumbling down upon the Romans heads, and not only the tiles and boards, but also the timber pieces half burnt fell upon the armed souldiers, the flame spread still far and near, and the smothering smoke put them in fear of more danger than was. And therefore, as well those Romans who were without the City, in the hottest of their assault, retreated from the walls, as also those that were entered already, for fear left by the fire behind them they should be separated from their fellows, retired themselves. Quintus also seeing how the case stood, caused to sound the retreat, and so being recalled, they returned out of the City which they had as good as won into the camp. And Quintus conceiving more hope by the fear of the enemies, than of the thing it self and the service done, never gave over for three daies to terrifie them partly by skirmishing, and partly by intrenching and stopping up certain quarters, that they might have no passage at all to fly and shift for themselves. The tyrant constrained at length with their dangers menaced, sent Pythagoras again as an Orator unto Quintus. But he at first rejected him, and commanded him to avout out of the camp: yet in the end, after he had made most humble supplication, and cast himself prostrate at his feet, he gave him audience. The beginning of his speech was this, that he yielded all to the discretion and former award of the Romans. But seeing that he gained nothing thereby, and that his words took no effect, they grew at length to this point, That upon the same capitulations which few daies before were exhibited up in writing, a truce should be made, and hereupon was both the money and also the hostages received.

Whiles the tyrant was besieged and assailed, there came post upon post to Argos, that Lacedæmon was at the point of being lost: whereupon the Argives took such heart and courage unto them (by reason that Pythagoras with the best part of the garrison souldiers was departed before out of their town) that condemning the small number which remained in their fortres, under the leading of one Archippus, they expelled the rest of the garrison. As for Immocrates of Pellene their Captain, because he had behaved himself in his charge and government gently and mildly, they sent him away alive with safe conduct. At the very instant of this joyfull occurrent, T. Quintus arrived, after he had granted peace to the tyrant, and sent away from Lacedæmon, Eumenes and the Rhodiens, together with L. Quintus his brother to the fleet. The City of Argos in great joy proclaimed the celebration of their most solemn feast, and those so famous and renowned games and pastimes called Nemean, against the coming of the Roman army and their General, which they had forelet upon the ordinary time and day-by occasion of the troubles of war. And for the D honour of Quintus, they ordained him to be the overleer of these solemnities. Many things there were to redouble and increase this their joy and solace to the full. The Citizens were reduced from Lacedæmon whom Pythagoras of late and Nabis aforesaid had carried away. They also were returned home again who had fled and escaped, after the conspiracy of Pythagoras was detected, and the massacre begun. Now they saw their liberty again, whereof they had lost the fight a long time: now they beheld the Romans the authors thereof, and who for their sakes were induced to take arms and enterprise the war with the tyrant. Also, upon the very day of the Nemean games, the liberty of the Argives was published and proclaimed by the voice of the public beadle and crier of the City. But look how much joy and hearts content the Æchæans conceived in their common and general Council of all Æchæa, for the restoring of Argos into E their ancient freedom, so much troubled they were again, in regard that Lacedæmon was left still in servitude, and the tyrant to near unto them ready ever to prick their sides, whereby their joy was not so found and entire. But the Ætolians in all their Diets inveighed mightily against this, saying, That the Romans never gave over the war with Philip before he had abandoned all the Cities of Greece: as for Lacedæmon, it was left still under a tyrant and in the mean while the lawful and natural King who had been in the Roman camp, and all the rest of the noblest Citizens should live in exile. For now the people of Rome was become a pensioner to guard the body of tyrannizing Nabis. Then Quintus brought back his army from Argos to Elatis, from whence he departed to the Spartan war. Some write, that the tyrant when he fought with the Romans, came not immediately out of the City: but that he was lodged without by himself full opposite to the F Roman camp: and that after he had made good a long time, expecting the aid of the Ætolians, he was driven in the end to a battell, by occasion that the Romans charged upon the foragers and purveyors of his camp: in which battell he was vanquished and beaten out of the field, and craved peace, after that fifteen thousand of his men were slain, and four thousand taken prisoners, and above,

At one and the same time in a manner were letters brought both from T. Quintus touching the affairs achieyed at Lacedæmon, and also from M. Porcius the Consul out of Spain. And by order from the State, there was granted in the name of either of them a solemn procession to continue three daies. L. Valerius the Consul, after he had governed his Province in quietness upon the defeat of the Boians about the forest of Litana, returned to Rome against the general Assembly for election of Magistrates, and created Consuls, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus the second time, and T. Sempronius Longus: whose fathers had been Consuls in the first year of the second Punic war. Then the Assembly was holden for the election of Prætors, wherein were chosen P. Cornelius Scipio and the two Cneii Cornelii, the one Merenda, and the other Blasio: Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, Sextus Digintius, and T. Juventius Talla. When these elections were finished, the Consul returned again into his Province. That year the Ferentines asked to obtain a new privilege: to wit, That as many Latines as were enrolled in any Roman Colony, should be be Citizens of Rome. But they of Patuli, Salernum and Buxentum, who were Colonies established in their names entered there, and by that means affixing themselves as Roman Citizens, were adjudged by the Senat to be no Citizens of Rome.

In the beginning of this year, wherein P. Scipio Africanus was Consul the second time, with T. Sempronius Longus, two Embassadors of Nabab the Egyptian, arrived at Rome. For to give them audience, the Senat assembled together without the City in the Temple of Apollo. Their petition was, That the peace agreed upon with Quintus might be ratified: and their suit was granted. When it was moved, as touching the government of the Provinces: the Senat (assembled in great frequency) were all of this opinion. That forasmuch as in Spain and Macedony the war was ended, both Consuls should have the government of Italy. Scipio was of advice, That one Consul was sufficient for Italy, and that the other should be employed in Macedony. And why? there was need, I was menaced from King Antiochus: himself already was passed over into Egypte: And what think ye, quoth he, will he then do, when the Ætolians (who doubtless are enemies) of one side shall solicit and call upon him for to war, and Antiochus a warrior and commander to remove for the defeats and overthrowes of the Romans, shall prick him forward of the other? Whiles they debated thus about the Provinces of the Consuls, the Prætors call lots for their severall governments. The City jurisdiction fell to Cn. Domitius the forraim to T. Juventius. To P. Cornelius the latter Spain was allotted and the hither to Sex. Digintius. Cn. Cornelius Blasts had Sicily assigned unto him, and Merenda was charged with Sardinia. It was not thought good that a new army should be transported over into Macedony. But concluded it was, that the army there should be brought back by Quintus into Italy. So discharged, Item, That that the army likewise should be raised, which had served under M. Porcius Cato in Spain. Item, That both Consuls should govern Italy, and levy two legions of Citizens to go thither, that when those forces were diminished and reduced to go home, which it pleased the Senat to set at liberty, there should be eight Roman legions in all, and no more in pay.

In the former year, when M. Porcius and L. Valerius were Consuls, there had been held a solemnity of a sacred Spring. But when P. Licinius the high Pontiffes made report first to the College of the Priests, and by the advice and authority of that College, unto the LL. of the Council, That there was some error committed, and that it was not performed accordingly: the Prætors ordained, that it should be done again anew according to the discretion and direction of the Pontiffes aforesaid. Also that the great Roman Praies, which together with that Spring were vowed, should be exhibited with the accustomed cost and expenses: And that all young cattle that fell between the Calends of March, and the last day of April, in that year wherein P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius Longus were Consuls, should be accounted as consecrated for that sacred Spring above-named. After this, there was an assembly held for the choosing of Censors, wherein were created Sex. Atilius Petrus, and C. Cornelius Cethegus: who elected P. Scipio the Consul, President of the Senat, like as the Censors before them had done. In the survey and review of the whole Senat, they left out and discarded three only, and none of them who had borne office of State, and sat in the Ivory chair. Great love these Censors won amongst them of that calling and equality, in giving commandment to the Ædiles curule, that at the Roman games and praies they should set out places apart from the rest of the people for the Senators to behold the said disorders. For sometime they beheld the sports and pallimes all together, without regard and distinction. Few also of the Gentlemen or Knights of Rome had their horses of service taken from them: and rigorously dealt they with no estate and degree. The porch of Liberty, and the banister called Villa publica, were by them repaired and enlarged. The sacred Spring was celebrate: and the games vowed by Sev. Sulpicius the Consul, were by them exhibited. And whiles all men were amused and their minds occupied thereupon, Q. Pleminius who had been cast in prison for divers and sundry outrages committed at Lucris, to the great offence of God and man, had procured certain persons, who in the night season at one instant should set on fire many places of the City, to the end that whiles all the people were affrighted in this night-tumult, he might break prison and escape. This plot was discovered and reported to the Senat by some of them that were privy and accessory thereunto. And Pleminius was let down into a lower dungeon and there killed.

That year were certain Colonies of Roman Citizens conducted to Patenti, Valerorum, and Viternum, and three hundred men planted in each of them. Likewise Colonies of Roman Citizens were brought to Salernum and Buxentum. The Triumvirs who had the placing of them were T. Sempronius Longus, Consul for the time being; M. Servilius and Q. Minutius Thermus. The territory of the Campan was divided among them. Three other also departed for the purpose. D. Junius Brutus, M. Babius Tambulius, and M. Helvius placed a Colony of Roman Citizens in Sipontum to enjoy the lands of the Arpians. Likewise other Colonies of Roman Citizens were planted in Templa and Crotone. The lands belonging to Templa were won from the Brutii who had expelled the Greeks: and the Greeks remained in Crotone. The Triumvirs for Crotone were Cn. Ostavius, L. Aemilius Paulus, and C. Pleterius: and for Templa L. Carat, M. Arula, and C. Salsinius. Also that year were seen at Rome divers wonders and prodigious sights: and some were reported from other parts. In the common place place, in the publick Hall, Comitium and Capitol, were seen certain drops of blood. And oftentimes it rained earth. The head of Pulcrus was seen fire. News came that at Interamna there ran a stream of milk. Also that at Ariminum there were

A were two Infants both of free condition, born without eyes and nose, and another in the Picene country handless and footless. These strange tokens were by order given from the chief Pontiffes, looked unto and expiated, and a Novendiall sacrifice continued for nine daies, because the Adrians brought word that in their territory it rained flowers.

In Gaul near to Medolanum, L. Valerius Flaccus the Pro-Consul, fought a set field with the French Insubrians and Boians, Which Boians under the conduct of Dorniacus passed over the river Padus, for to solicit and raise the Insubrians. In which conflict were slain ten thousand enemies. About the same time his Colleague in government M. Porcius Cato triumphed over Spain. In this triumph he carried in pomp and flew 2500 pound weight of silver in bullion, and in coin 123000 Bigar pieces: of Ocan silver 540 pound weight, and of gold 400000 pound weight. Of the booty won from the enemies he dealt among his soldiers that were footmen 270 asses a-piece, and treble so much to every man of arms.

T. Sempronius the Consul having put himself in his journey toward his Province, led first his legions into the Boians country. Boioric at that time their Prince with his two brethren, having raised the whole nation to rebellion, encamped in certain commodious places: so as it appeared that the enemy entered their confines, they were ready to give him battell. The Consul perceiving how strong and confident the enemies were, dispatched a courier to his Colleague, to make hast if he thought it good and come unto him: for until his coming he would fall off, seem to retire and not fight. But the same cause that moved the Consul to stay, gave occasion to the Gauls to make more halts: for besides that the delaying & lingering of the Consul, encouraged the Enemies, they were desirous to have the trial of a battell before the forces of both Consuls were joyned together. Howbeit, for two daies space they did nothing but stand ready ranged for fight, if any should come forth to brave and dare them. On the third day they approached the trench and rampier of the Consuls Camp, and on every side at once gave the assault. The Consul immediately commanded the soldiers to arm. And when they were armed, he kept them in awhile, with intent to encrease the foolish confidence in the enemies, and to dispose of his own forces, and give direction, what companies should fall out at every gate. The two legions he commanded to issue forth under their colours: at the two side gates called Principales: but in the very passage without the Gauls stood thick and made head again, so that the way was stopped up. A long time they fought in those very straights. And they bestirred themselves no more with their hands and swords, than they pressed one upon another with their bodies and targets: whilest the Romans strived to advance their engines out of the gates, and the Gauls endeavoured no less, either to enter themselves within the camp, or else to impeach the Romans for going forth. But in this conflict there was nothing between them either won or lost, no ground gained the one of the other, before that Q. Victorius a principal Centurion of the Planis in the second legion, and C. Atinius, a Tribune or Marshall of the fourth, caught the banners from the engine-bearers (a thing often practised in time of extremity) and flung them among the enemies. For whiles these laboured and strained themselves to recover each one a banner, they of the second legion first brake through and got forth of the gate: so as now, they maintained skirmish without the trench, and the fourth legion stuck still in the gap. By which time there arose another tumult and noise in the contrary side of the camp: for the Gauls were broken in at the Quætors gate (or the gate against the Quæstorium) and slain those that valiantly made head and held them play: to wit, Lucius Posthumus a treasurer surnamed Tympanus, Marcus Atinius and Publius Sempronius two Colonels of the allies, and well near two hundred soldiers besides. Thus the camp on that part was won, until such time as one extraordinary cohort was sent from the Consul to defend the Quætors gate aforesaid: which either flew those that were within the rampier, or else drave them forth, and so withstood those that would have rushed in. And much about that very time the fourth legion also with two extraordinary squadrons brake forth at the gate. Thus at once there were three several battels in sundry places about the camp: and the dissonant cries and noises (according to the divers occasions of each party ministered by their fellows) turned and withdrew the minds and spirits of those that were in fight, from the present skirmish before them. In this manner maintained they the fight till noon: equally matched in strength and number, and little or no odds between them for hope of victory: but tedious travail and extremity of heat compelled the Gauls (whose bodies are soft and open, and soon running to sweat, and who of all other things can least away with thirst) to abandon the battell: and those few that remained behind, the Romans ran upon, rushed their colours, and chased them into their own hold. Then the Consul sounded the retreat: at which signal given the most part retired themselves: but a sort of them, upon a hot desire of fight, and good hope to be Masters of their camp, persisted still, close to their trench. The Gauls disdaining their small number issued all forth out of their Camp: and then the Romans being discomfited, were glad now of themselves for fear and flight to crudge unto the strength of their own hold, which they would not retire unto at the commandment of the Consul. Thus on both sides there was one while victory, and another while fearful flight: howbeit, when all cards were told and the reckoning made, the Gauls had the worst of the game: for of them were slain eleven thousand, whereas of Romans there died but five thousand. Then the Gauls retired themselves into the most inward parts of their country, and the Consul marched with his legions to Placentia. Some write, that Scipio and his Colleague with their this joyned forces, invaded and spoiled the countreys of the Boians and Ligurians, so farforth as they could pass for woods and bogs: others again record, that he, having done no memorable exploit at all, returned to Rome about the assembly for election of Consuls.

The same year T. Quintius spent the whole winter season at Elasia (whither he had retired his forces for winter harbour) in hearing mens causes and ministering justice to every one; also in reforming and redressing all such disorders as had passed in the States and Cities, through the licentious government and jurisdiction either of Philip himself or his Captains, whilst he advanced those favours of his own faction; and put down the right and liberty of others. In the beginning of the spring he came to Corinth, where he had given summons, that there should be holden a general Diet of the States. There in the assembly of all the Embassadors and agents from the Cities, gathered about him as it were to hear an Oration, he made a speech unto them: beginning first with the amity contracted between the Romans and Greece: and proceeding to the acts achieved in Spain by the Generals afore him, and those also of his own. All that he spake was heard and received with great applause, until he touched the point concerning Nabis: for it was generally thought unfitting, that he undertaking to set all Greece at liberty, had left a tyrant (not only a grievous oppressor of his own subjects, but also dangerous to all the Cities about him) to remain still as a fearful malady settled in the very bowels and heart of a most noble and renowned State. Quintius, notwithstanding their affections and dispositions, confessed, that he should not indeed have any ear at all to the motion or mention of peace with the tyrant, in case that Lacedaemon could have stood in safety without so doing: but now since that Nabis might not possibly be confounded and overthrown, without the present ruin and fearful downfall of the City, he thought it a better course in policy to leave the tyrant enfeebled and disarmed of all means "to offend and hurt any man, than to suffer so goodly a City to die in the cure, and under the hand as it were of the Physician, amidst those quick and sharp remedies which it were necessary to endure: and so in seeking to recover liberty, to perish and die for ever. And after he had discoursed of things past, he intreated, that his purpose and intent was, to go into Italy, and to have away with him his whole army: also that within ten daies they should hear news how all the garrisons had quit Demetrius and Chalcis: and that he would deliver out of hand unto the Achazans in their very fight, the fortrets of Corinth: that all the world may know, whether it be the Romans guide, or the fashion of the Achazians, to over-reach and lie: who in their common talk have not let to discourse, to sow furies, and to buzze into mens heads, that it was dangerous for Greece to put their liberty into the Romans hands: & that they had but made a change of their lordly rulers, admitting the Romans in lieu of the Macedonians. But as for them (quoth he) their tongue is no slander, being such persons as never took heed and made regard what either they did or said. But the other Cities he advertised to weigh their friends by deeds, and not by words: to be wise and well advised whom they are to trust, and whom they were to beware of: to use their liberty in measure and moderation: which if it be well tempered and qualified, is good and wholesome to particular persons and general States: but excessive if be, it would not only be grievous and unupportable to others, but also unruly, dangerous, and pernicious to themselves that have it. He gave them counsel, that the Princes and States in each City should maintain concord not only among themselves, but also with all other in one community: for so long as they accord and agree together, no King nor tyrant should be strong enough for them: whereas discord and sedition maketh overture and openeth ease way to enemies that lie in wait for the vantage: considering that the side which in civil contention is the weaker and goeth to the walls, will band rather with a forrainger, than give place and stoop to a Citizen. In conclusion, he advised them, to keep and preserve by their careful regard, this their liberty purchased for them by forrainger forces, and delivered unto them with faithful security of strangers and aliens: that the people of Rome might see, that they have given freedom to well deserving people: and thus their great benefit hath been well bestowed upon worthy persons. Whilst they hearkened to these sage admonitions, as uttered out of the mouth of a very father, the tears gushed plentifully out of their eyes for kind heart and joy: inasmuch as they troubled him in the delivery of the rest of his speech. For a while there was a plausible noise heard among them as they approved his words, and advised one another to ponder these sage sayings, and to imprint them deeply in their hearts, proceeding as it were from divine oracle. After silence made, he requested them to seek up all those Roman Citizens (if haply there were any) who lived in servitude and slavery among them, and within two months to lend them unto him into Italy: for it were a great ignominy and shame even for them, that in their countreys there should remain in bondage any of those, by whose means they themselves were set free and delivered out of bondage. With that, they all cried aloud with one voice, That for this above all the rest they rendered thanks unto him, in that they were admonished and warned by him, to perform their devoir and duty, both to religious and to necessary. Now a mighty number there was of captives in the Punick war: such as Antioch (when their friends redeemed them not by ransom) had sold in open market. And how great the multitude of them was, this may prove and testify which Polybius writeth so wit, that this cost the Achazans for their part * one hundred talents: and yet they ordained and set down, that there should but 500 Denarii be repaid unto their Masters for the redemption of every poll: for by this account Achaz had 1200 of them. Add now unto them as many as all Greece was like to have by that proportion [and see what number may arise.] The

A The assembly was not broken up and dismissed, before they might see the garrison descending from the fortrets of Corinth, who marched directly to the gate and went their waies. The General presently followed after, and being accompanied with them all, who called him with a loud voice, their Saviour and Redeemer he took his leave and bade them farewell: and so returned the same way he came to Elasia. From thence he sent his Lieutenant Ap. Claudius with all the forces, commanding him to conduct the army to Oricum by the way of Thessalie and Epirus, and there to expect and wait his coming: for he purposed they to take Sea and let over his army into Italy. He wrote also to L. Quintius his brother and Lieutenant, and Admiral likewise of the fleet, to gather all the ships of burden from along the Sea coast of Greece into that place. Himself went to Chalcis, and having withdrawn the garrisons not only from thence but also from Oricum and Eretria, he held a general Councell there of all the cities of Euboea: and after he had made remembrance unto them in what case he found them, and in what estate he left them, he dismissed the assembly. From thence he departed to Demetrius, where also he removed the garrison, and being attended with a train of all the citizens, like as at Corinth and Chalcis before, he took his journey into Thessalie: where the cities were not only to be set free, but also to be reformed, and from a general disorder and confusion wherein they stood, to be reduced and framed into some tolerable order and form of government. For they were not only tainted and infected with the corruption of the times, and the violent current of licentious outrage, which had taken head under the government of the King; but also of an inbred troublesome spirit and humor of their own, whereby since their first beginning and uprising, even unto our daies they never held Parliaments, Elections, Diets, Councells or any other assemblies whatsoever, without much trouble and sedition. He chose the Senate and Judges there in regard especially of their wealth, and in all Cities he made that part more mighty, unto which it was more expedient and beneficial to have all quiet and in peace. Thus having visited Thessalie, and taken a general review thereof, he came by the way of Epirus to Oricum, from whence he minded to cross the seas. From Oricum all his forces were transported to Brundisium, and so they passed forward throughout Italy to the City of Rome, in manner of triumph, sending before them as great a train of prizes by them taken, as they made themselves in their march. After they were come to Rome, the Senat assembled without the City for Quintius, where he had audience to declare and discourse of his worthy exploits: and willing they were to grant him triumph, according to his desires. Three daies together he rode in triumph. The first day he made a shew of all the armour as well defensive as offensive, also of brazen and marble images, of which he had taken more from King Philip, than he found in the faggots of the cities. The second day there was carried in pomp, the gold and silver both unwrought and wrought into plate, yea, and cast into coin. Of silver unwrought there was 8000 pound weight: of wrought, 270 pound weight. Many vessels of plate of all sorts, and most engraven, some of right curious and exquisite workmanship. Likewise brazen vessels, cunningly and artificially made: and besides, ten shields of silver, and in coin eighty four thousand Attick peeces of silver, which they call Tetradrachma, weighing almost four Roman deniers apiece: of gold there was three thousand seven hundred and fourteen pound weight, and one shield full and whole of beaten gold: and of Philip golden peeces in coin fourteen thousand five hundred and fourteen. The third day were born in view for a pageant, a hundred and fourteen coronets of gold, which were the presents of Cities given unto him. Moreover, there were led that day the beasts for sacrifice: and before his chariot went many noble prisoners and hostages, and among them, Demetrius, King Philip his son, and Armenes the son of Nabis the tyrant, a Lacedaemonian born. Then rode Quintius himself in a chariot into the City, and a great number of souldiers followed after, by reason that his whole army was retired with him out of his province. To every footman he gave two hundred and fifty Astres, double as much to a centurion, and triple to an horseman. Those who were redeemed out of captivity, followed his chariot with their heads haven, and much beautified the glory of the triumph.

In the end of this year, Q. Aelius Tubero a Tribune of the Commons, presented a request or bill unto the people, and they granted and enacted it, to wit, that two Colonies of Latins should be conducted, the one into the Brutians countrey, and the other into the territory of Thurium. For the conduct and planting whereof, there were ordained three Deputies called Triumvirs, whose commission was in force for three years, namely, Q. Nevius, M. Minucius Rufus, and M. Furius Cressipus for the Brutians: and for Thurium, A. Manlius, P. Aelius, and L. Appulcius. For the conducting of these officers, Cn. Domitius the Pretor in the City, called two several assemblies in the Capitol, in that year were certain Temples dedicated, one of Iuno Sospita in the herb-market, which had been vowed and set out to building four years before, by C. Cornelius the Consul, during the war with the French: and he in his Censorship dedicated it. Another Temple of Faustina: the Ediles C. Scribonius and Cn. Domitius, had likewise bargained for the building thereof two years before, and laid by the money therefore: and this Cn. Domitius being now Pretor of the City dedicated it. Also Q. Minucius Ralla, dedicated a Temple to Fortuna Primigenia upon the hill Quirinalis, having been created Duumvir himself for that purpose. Sympronius Sophus had vowed the same ten years before, in the time of the Punick war, and agreed for a certain price to have it built. Also C. Scribonius the other Duumvir consecrated the Temple of Jupiter within the island. Vowed it was six years before in the Gauls war by L. Furius Purpurio Pretor, and by him afterwards (when he was Consul) order was given for the edifying thereof. And these were the affairs which passed that year.

P. Scipio returned out of his Province and government of Gaul for the election of new Comitia, and to that purpose was the general assembly summoned; wherein were chosen L. Cornelius Merula, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The next morrow after were created Pretors, L. Cornelius Scipio, M. Fulvius Nobilior, C. Scribonius, M. Valerius Messalla, P. Porcius Licinius, and C. Flaminius. C. Annius Serranus, and L. Scribonius Libo, Ediles of the chair, were the first that exhibited the Stage-plays called Megalæa. And the Roman plays or games represented and set out by these Ediles, the Senat shew first and never before beheld apart from the rest of the people. And this (as all novelties and new fashions) ministered much talk: whiles some gave their opinion and said, That now at length that was given to this most noble and honorable State, which long ago was due; others again conferred thus, and gave out, "That whatsoever was added to the Majesty of the Senators and Nobles, was derogatory from the dignity of the people: and that all such kind of distinctions, whereby estates and degrees are severed one from another, are prejudicial as well to common peace as public liberty. For these five hundred and eighty years they, these plays and games have been beheld and looked upon in common, without any such precise difference. What new accident is suddenly befallen, why the Nobles should not be willing to let the Commons be intermingled with them in the Theatre? and why a rich man should disdain his poor neighbour to sit by him? This is a new appetite and strange longing of theirs indeed, full of pride and arrogance, a thing never desired nor taken up and practised by the Senat of any nation whatsoever. So as in the end even Africanus bewhored himself (men say) and repented thereof, for that he in his Consulship moved and periwaded the bringing up of this new fashion. So hard a matter it is to alter an old custome, and make a new order to be well liked. And men are ever more willing to keep them to ancient customes, unless they be such, as practise and experience do evidently check and condemn.

In the beginning of the year, wherein L. Cornelius and Q. Minutius were Consuls, news came thick of many earth- quakes, that men were not only weary of the thing it self, but also of the holy- dayes and solemnities that were published and proclaimed in that regard. For the Consuls could not intend either to assemble the Senate and sit in Council, or manage the affairs of the Common- weal, for being wholly employed about sacrificing and appeasing the wrath of the gods. In conclusion, the Decemvirs were commanded to peruse the books of Sibylla, and according to their answer and direction, a procession and supplication was for three daies solemnized. And before the Altars and shrines of the gods and goddesses, they made their prayers with garlands and coronets on their heads: yea, and commandment was given, that every household and family by it self should fall to their prayers and devotions. Also the Consuls by order from the Senat made proclamation, That upon what day a feast or solemnity was ordained by occasion of some earthquake, no man the same day should bring news of another. Then the Consuls call for the government of their provinces, and after them the Pretors did the like. Unto Cornelius befall Gaul, and to Minutius the Ligurians: C. Sempronius had the charge of the civil jurisdiction, and M. Valerius of the forrain: L. Cornelius governed Sicily, L. Porcius Sardinia, C. Flaminius his Spain, and L. Fulvius the lower. The Consuls looked for no war that year: but even then at that instant were letters brought from M. Cicilius Lord President of Pisa, which gave notice, that twenty thousand Ligurians were up in arms, having conspired together in all market Towns and places of resort throughout the whole nation, and that they had already wasted the territory of Luna, and having invaded and passed through the Pisan Land, had over-run also the Sea coasts. Wherefore Minutius the Consul, unto whom the government of Liguria was allotted, by the advice of the LL. of the Senat mounted up into the pulpit Restra, and published an edict, That those two legions of Roman citizens, which the former year had been enrolled, should within ten daies present themselves at Ariminum, in lieu whereof he would levy two other legions out of the City. Also he commanded the allies and Magistrates of the Latin nation, and their Embassadors leaguers, who owed knight- service, and were bound to find souldiers to come before him into the Capitol. And from among them he enrolled fifteen thousand foot and five hundred horse, according to the number of young and serviceable men that were to be found in each State: which done, he commanded them forthwith, to go directly from the Capitol to the gate of the City, and presently to take musters that all might be done with greater expedition. Unto Fabius and Flaminius were appointed three thousand Roman footmen and two hundred horsemen apiece, for to supply and strengthen their forces: also five thousand foot to either of them of allies of the Latin nation, with two hundred horse. Moreover the Pretors were charged to dismiss and call the old souldiers, so soon as they were arrived into their provinces. Now, when as the souldiers who were enrolled in the City- legions, repaired thick unto the Tribuns of the Commons, that they should take knowledge of as many of them as were exempted from warfare, for that they either had served out their full time by law appointed, or were sickly and diseased: behold the letters of Sempronius dashed all this, and cleared every difficulty and scrupulosity: wherein it was written, that fifteen thousand Ligurians were entered the territory of Placentia, and had made great waite and lamage therein putting all to fire and sword as they went, even as far as to the very walls of the Colony it self, and the banks of Padus. Also that the nation of the Boii made countenance and gave suspicion of rebellion. In which regards seeing there was a tumultuous and insolent war toward, the Senat passed a decree, wherein they signified that it was not their pleasure that the Tribuns should accept any excuses pretended by the souldiers, but that they should all meet

A meet and assemble together, according to the Edict. Over and besides they gave order, that the allies of the Latin nation, who had served in the armies of P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius and were discharged from souldiery by them being Consuls, should now be ready to shew themselves, against that day which L. Cornelius the Consul should appoint, and at what place fower of Herrania he should command by way of proclamation: Also that the said L. Cornelius the Consul in his march and journey toward the Province, might take up, enoel, and arme, what souldiers he thought good, out of all the burroughs and villages in his way, and have them with him whither soever he would, yea, and have commision to dismiss whom of them he thought good, and when soever he liked at his good pleasure.

After that the Consuls had taken musters, and were gone into their Provinces, then T. Quintus demanded to have a day of audience in the Senat concerning those affairs that he had concluded with the assistance of the ten Delegates above said: and that it would please them to confirm and establish the same by virtue of their assent and authority. Which they might do with more ease, in case they would hear the Embassadors themselves speak, who were come out of all Greece, a great part of Asia, and from the Kings. These embassies were admitted into the Senat by C. Scribonius the Pretor for the City, and all dispatched with a gracious answer. But because the dispute about Antiochus required long time of debate, therefore it was referred and put over to the ten Delegates, of whom some had been in Asia, or at Ephesus with the King, And Quintus was commanded, that together with those said Delegates he should hear what the King his Embassadors could say, and to return unto them such an answer, as might stand with the honor and welfare of the people of Rome. The chief of this embassage from the King were Menippus and Hegesias. Then Menippus began and said, "That he knew no such perplexed difficulty in their embassage, considering they were come simply to treat for peace, and to contract a league and alliance. For, saith he, there are three sorts of confederacies and associations, whereby States and Kingdoms ordinarily conclude league and amity one with another. The first, when they that are vanquished in war, have conditions and articles imposed upon them: for when all is yielded into the hands of him that is the mightier and more puissant, then it is in his power and at his discretion and will, to give unto the conquered party what he list, or to take from him as he pleaseth. The second is, when they that are equal in warlike forces give over on even hand, and be content to make peace and amity, upon indifferent and equal conditions, one with the other: in which case, demand and claim is made, restitution and amends performed according to the accord and agreement: and if in time of the wars, any have been molested and troubled in their possession, they fall to composition either by the form and tenor of ancient law, or respective to the good and profit of both parties. The third is, when they that never were enemies, meet and confer together about concluding some friendship, by way of solemn alliance and society, who neither give nor take any conditions: for that belongeth properly to Conquerors, and those that are conquered. Seeing then that Antiochus is comprised in this last kind, I marvel (of he) that the Romans should think or say, It is reasonable to tender articles unto him, or to prescribe and let down, what Cities of Asia they would have to be free and exempt, and which they would have to be tributary: and into what Cities they would expressly forbid the King his garrisons, or the King himself to enter and let foot. For in this wise ought they to make peace with Philip their enemy in times past, and not to draw a contract of amity and association with Antiochus, a friend at this present. To this Oration Quintus shaped his answer in this sort, "For as much as it pleaseth you to make your speech thus distinctly by way of division, and severally to rehearse all kinds of confederacies and accords. I also will let down as methodically in order two conditions, without which, you may let the King your matter to understand, that he must not look to entertain any friendship with the people of Rome. The one is this, that if he would debar us to intermeddle with the Cities of Asia, he likewise himself have nothing to do with all Europe. The other, that if he cannot contain himself within the compass of Asia, but will needs encroach upon it the Romans likewise may have liberty and power both to maintain those amities which they have already, and also to entertain new with the States of Asia. Hereat Hegesias inferred and said, "That this was an indignity intolerable and which he could not abide to hear, namely that Antiochus should be disfavored of those Cities of Thrace and Chersonesus, which Selucus his great grand- father had conquered with singular honor from King Leptimachus, whom he vanquished in war and slew in field, and settled the same in him as his rightful inheritance. As for the same cities possessed by the Thracians, Antiochus himself with as great praise and glory hath partly by force of arms regained out of their hands, and partly re- peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and desolat, and namely Lyfymachia it self as all the world seeth: and more than that, hath re-edified to his exceeding charge and expence, those that lay along in their ruins, and were consumed with fire. What liketh then is there between these two demands, namely, that Antiochus should quit the possession of that which either he acquired or recovered in that sort: and that the Romans should abstain and forbear Asia, which never appertained unto them? To conclude, Antiochus (with he) is desirous of the Roman friendship, but in such terms as may stand with his honor, &c. nor purchase himself shame and reproach. Then Quintus rejoined again in this manner: "For as much as of he, we balance and weigh things according to honesty (as in truth it is befitting the chief and principal State of the world, and to great and mighty a King to prize that only at "leastwise principally above all other regards) I would gladly know of you, Whether ye think it more honest of the twain, either to will and wish that all the Cities of Greece whatsoever; or wherefore should enjoy liberty: or to make them homagers and tributary? If Antiochus thinketh it be an honorable thing for him to reduce into servitude and bondage as his own, those Cities which his great grandfather held by right of arms, and whereof neither his father nor grandfather afore him were in possession; the people of Rome likewise esteemeth it a material point that toucheth their faithfulness and constancy, not to forsake the Greeks, whose protection and defence they have enterprised and taken in hand, And like as they have freed Greece out of the hands of Philip, so they intend to deliver those Cities of Asia which are of the Greekish race and descent, from the subjection of Antiochus. For the Greek Colonies were not sent into Babylonia and Ionia, to live in servitude under the King, but to increase and multiply, that a multitude of ancient nation might spread over the face of the whole earth. Now when as Heghianus knew not how to flit and turn himself, and could not deny but that the cause of liberty which the Romans pretended in the title of their quarrel, was of more honesty and credit, than that other of slavery: Let's lay away all these circumstances of words (quoth P. Sulpicius, the ancientest person of all the ten Delegates) and choose ye one of the two conditions which even now were expressly offered unto you by Quintius, or else make no more talk about amity with the Romans. Then quoth Menippus, As for us, we may in no case, neither will we capitulate and covenant any thing prejudicial to the Kingdom and royal state of King Antiochus. The morrow after Quintius when he had brought all the Embassadors of Greece and Asia into the Senat, that they might know what affection the people of Rome carried, and what mind Antiochus bare to the Cities of Greece, he declared before them all as well his own demands, as those of the Kings partwilling them to make report unto their own Cities, and assure them, that the people of Rome would maintain them against Antiochus (unless he departed out of Europe) with the same vertue, valour, and fidelity wherewith he had defended their liberty against Philip. Then Menippus was earnest with Quintius and the LL. of the Senat, beseeching them instantly not to proceed in halt to a decree whereby they should set all the world in trouble and upore: but both take leisure themselves and give respite unto the King to deliberate farther of the matter: for no doubt, upon the relating of the conditions, he would consider upon them, and either obtain somewhat at their hands, or for peace sake yield his consent to all. Thus was the matter wholly and entirely deferred: and agreed it was, that the same Embassadors should be addressed unto the King, who had been with him at Lysimachia, to wit, P. Sulpicius, P. Villius, and P. Elinus.

Scarcely were they gone from the City and crossed upon their journey, but Embassadors arrived from Carthage, who reported, that without all doubt Antiochus made preparation for war, and therein used the hand and ministry of Annibal: in so much, as it was feared also that third Punick war would break out withal. Annibal, as we said before, having fled his native country, repaired unto Antiochus, and was in great account and estimation with the King, for no other cause and policy in the world, but that the King who projected and plotted long time in his spirit to levy war upon the Romans, could find no man more fit than Annibal to break his mind unto, and with whom to discourse upon a matter of such consequence. Annibal his long and resolution was ever one and the same still, namely, To make war within Italy: and that Italy was able to furnish a forain enemy, with men munition, and victuals. For this he cast with himself and considered, that if all were quiet there and no troubles set a foot, but that the people of Rome might with the forces and riches of Italy, furnish themselves to make war without Italy, there was no Monarch nor nation under the sun able to make head against the Romans. He demanded therefore to have the command of 100 close ships with hatch and deck, 16000 foot; and 1000 horse: and with the said fleet he would first sail into Affrica, where he assured himself that he should be able to solicit and induce the Carthaginians to rebellion: but if they held off and made it goodly and strange, yet would he settle in some part of Italy and levy war against the Romans. His advice and counsel furthermore was, that the King should with all his other forces pass into Europe, and in some one part of Greece keep his power together, and not to take the Sea, but to be ready ever to cross over; which would be sufficient to make a shew and raise a bruit all abroad of war. When he had perswaded the King to this designment and resolution, supposing that he was likewise to found and prepare the hearts afore-hand of his own countrymen to this purpose: he durst not dispatch any letters unto them, for fear they might chance to be intercepted by the way, and to discover the whole plot. He happened at Ephesus upon a Tyrian one Arifson, a man whole industry and dexterity he had tried in some small promises wherein he had employed him. Him he plyed with gifts in hand, but fed him more with large promises of great rewards, which King Antiochus also himself seemed to make good and give his word for: and so sent him to Carthage with credence and instructions. He acquainted him with the names of all those persons with whom he was to talk and confer: he furnished him with secret tokens, whereby they might assuredly know, that he was no counterfeiter, but came with a message from him. Now whilst this Arifson conversed in Carthage, the friends of Annibal knew no sooner about what errand he came, than his very enemies. At the first, much talk and discourse there was in every corner of the City where they met, and at their feasts and merriments, of this matter. Afterwards at their council-table some stuck not to say, that the exile of Annibal was to little or no purpose, if whilst he was absent he could contrive and compass new plots, and by soliciting and tempering mens minds,

A disquiet and trouble the state of the City. There is a stranger, say they, one Arifson a Tyrian, hither come with instructions from Annibal and King Antiochus: certain men there are, that daily have privy conference with him, and devise in secret of that, which anon will break out to the utter ruin and overthrow of all. "Whereupon they all cried with one voyce to convent Arifson presently before them, and to examine him about what business he was thither arrived: and unless he would bewray and declare the matter, to send him with Embassadors of purpose to Rome: "For why? we have (say they) felt the smart enough, and paid sufficiently for the folly and rash head of one harebrained man already. Let privat persons bear their own load hereafter, and at their own peril commit a trespass: provided always, that the Common-weal be preserved clear "not only from all fault, but also from all appearance and bruit of any such intent. Arifson being called before them stood stiffly upon his integrity and excused himself, and evermore used this for his best and surest defence. That he had brought no letters at all to any person: howbeit he could not render a ready & sound reason of his coming thither: but especially he was shrewdly troubled and put to his trumps when they charged him, That he had talk and communication with those only of the Barchine faction. Hereupon arose some debate and altercation in the house: whilst some were of opinion that he should be apprehended for a spie, and clapt up fast in ward: others again were of mind that there was no cause to make such a stir and tumult: for it was an evil precedent to be given, that strangers coming to their City, should be troubled and hardly intreated: and the like measure no doubt would be offered to the Carthaginians in Tyria & in other Towns of matchlike, whereunto they use to have resort for exchange and traffique, so for that day the matter was put off. Arifson framing himself to play the crafty Carthaginian among the Carthaginians, wrote a certain bill, and in the shuffling in of the evening, hung it up in the most conspicuous and publick place of all the City, even over the seat where the head Magistrate useth daily to sit: and himself about the third watch gat to hisporch and escaped. The morrow after, when the Sultanes were set on the bench to minister law, the bill afore said was seen, taken down, and read: whereinto this effect was written. That Arifson was not come with a message to any person in particular, but to all the Seniors or Elders in general (for so they call the Senat.) After that the thing was by this means made a publick matter, and the whole state of the Senators reputed culpable, they were not loath to search into privat persons. Howbeit thought good it was, that Embassadors should be sent to Rome to give information hereof to the Consuls and the Senat, and withal, to make complaint of certain wrongs done by Masaniffa.

Masaniffa understanding that the Carthaginians were suspected and in some ill name among the Romans, and also at jar and variance within themselves; and namely, that the great and principall men were had in jealousy by the Senat for their conferences with Arifson; and their Senate likewise suspected by the people, by reason of that writing above named of the said Arifson taking this for a good advantage and opportunity to do them some injury, not only invaded their maritime parts and made spoil, but also forced certain tributary Cities to the Carthaginians for to pay himself tribute. That quarter of the country they call Euphrya. It is the Sea coast of the lesser Syria, and the country is exceeding fertile: there is in it one only City named Lepus, which paid to the Carthaginians for tribute, a talent every day. All this region Masaniffa then had plighted for, Eyes, and for one part thereof he made some claim, as being litigious whether it pertained to his Kingdom, or the Seignory of the Carthaginians: and because he knew for truth, that the Carthaginian Embassadors were about to go to Rome, as well to purge themselves of some crimes wherewith they were charged, as to complain of him; therefore himself also addressed his Embassadors to Rome, who should lay open more matter against them of deeper suspicion, and debate withal as touching the right of those tributes. The Carthaginians were no sooner heard speak concerning that Tyrian stranger but the LL. of the Senat grew into some doublet they should wage war with Antiochus and the Carthaginians both together. And this presumption of all the rest made the suspicion most pregnant, because when they had the party among them and were purposed to send him to Rome, they neither made the man himself sure, nor the bark wherein he arrived. After this, they fell to debate and argue with the Kings Embassadors, about the territory and land in controversy. "The Carthaginians pleaded for themselves, and stood much upon their bounds and liberally. "For that the land in suit lay within that precinct, by which P. Scipio the Conqueror limited out that territory which pertained to the seignory of the Carthaginians. Also they alledged the "cession of the King himself, who at what time as he pursued Apheret, that fled out of his own realm and with a company of Numidians ranged abroad about Cyrene, made request unto them to give him leave to pass through this very ground, as if (without all question) it belonged to the Carthaginians. The Numidians answered again to these points & said plainly to their faces, "that they lied in their throats, as touching that supposed limitation and bounding by Scipio: "and moreover, if we would go (say they) and search the very original indeed of the law, what land at all ought the Carthaginians have of their own proper inheritance? For being but meer "strangers, they had aiter much praier and entreaty as much ground allowed them and no more, "to build them a City in as they could compass with thongs cut out of one bull hide. And look whatsoever they had encroached upon; without that nest and fear of theirs in Brysa they gat and held it by force and violence. And as for the land now in strife, they are not able to prove, that they always held the same in possession, no, nor that they kept it any long time together. But as occasion and opportunities served of advantage, one while they, and another while the Numidian

"Kings made reentry and enjoyed it, and evermore he went away with the possession thereof. That was the stronger, and had the keener sword. In these considerations they requested the Romans to leave the thing in that state and condition, wherein it stood before that the Carthaginians were enemies, or King Masinissa friend and ally to the Romans; and not to intermeddle between, nor take a part, but let the winner wear it, and him have it that can hold it. In conclusion it was thought good, that to the Embassadors of both parties this answer should be returned, namely: That they would send certain Commissioners into Africa, to decide this controversy about the land in question, between the people of Carthage and the King. So there were sent of purpose, P. Scipio Africanus, C. Cornelius Cethegus, and M. Minutius Rufus. Who having heard what could be said, and seen the thing, left all hanging still in suspense and undecided, without adjudging it by their definitive sentence to the one or the other. But whether they so did, on their own head and self accord, or by direction from the Senat, is not so certain as it seemeth agreeable unto that present time in policy, to leave them as they found them, and the controversy still depending. For unless it were so, Scipio himself alone, in regard of the knowledge that he had of the thing, and of his authority with the persons (so much bound they were unto him on both sides) might with a word of his mouth, or a nod of his head, have ended all this matter.

The five and thirtieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the five and thirtieth Book.

Publius Scipio Africanus being sent Ambassador unto Antiochus, asked at Ephesus with Annibal (who had sided with Antiochus) to this end, that he might rid him of that fear which he had conceived of the people of Rome, as touching the taking away of his life. Among other matters passed between them, when he demanded of Annibal, whom he judged to have been the noblest and greatest warrior that ever was, he answered that it was Alexander King of the Macedonians: for that he with his power had discomfited and defeated an infinite number of armies, and withal, passed through his life in distant and remote parts of the world unto which a man would not believe that it were possible for any person to go and see them. When he asked again of him whom he deemed for the second: Who he? Pyrrhus (qd. he) because he taught the manner how to pitch a camp, & besides, no man had the craft to gain him, and hold for advantage, nor could let his corps de guard or plain garrisons better than he. And might proceed still to know whom he took to be the third. Annibal named his own good self. At which answer Scipio fell a laughing: And what would you have said then (qd. he) if your hap had been to have overthrown me? Marry then (saith he) I would have let my self before Alexander, before Pyrrhus, and before all other. Among other prodigious fights, whereof there were reported very many, it is said, that in the year wherein Cn. Domitius was Consul, an Ox spake, and said these words: Rome, look to thyself! The Romans prepare to war with Antiochus. N. This the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, provoked by the Aetolians, who solicited both Philip and Antiochus to wage war against the people of Rome, revolted from the Romans, and after he had lived war against Philip, and the people of Rome, revolted from the Romans. The Aetolians likewise abandoned the friendship of the people of Rome, with whom Antiochus King of Syria bandied: who warred upon Greece, and surprised many Cities, and namely, Chalcis and Euboea among the rest. Besides, this book containeth the partial affairs in Liguria, and the preparation of Antiochus for the war.

The five and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

In the beginning of that year wherein these affairs thus passed, Sext. Digitius Pretor in high Spain, fought battels (rather ordinary, and for number many, than otherwise memorable and worth the speaking) against those States, whereof after the departure of Cato a great sort had rebelled. And those battels for the most part were so unfortunate, that hardly he could deliver up to his successor the one half of those foldiers which he had received. And doubtless all Spain would have taken heart again. If the other Pretor P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Cn. Scipio, had not sped better in many of his conflicts beyond Iberia. Upon which terror, no fewer than fifty good Towns revolted unto him. And these exploits performed Scipio as Pretor. Who also in quality of Propretor, encountered the Lusitanians upon the way, as they returned homeward charged with a mighty great booty raised out of the hale Spain, which they had utterly pillaged and spoiled: where he fought from the third hour of the day unto the eighth, with doubtful event. For number of foldiers he was inferior to his enemies, but for all things else he had the vantage, and went beyond them. For his battalions were well appointed and close compacted of armed men, and to be charged upon the enemies marching in a long train, and the same encumbered with a deal of cartel: besides, his foldiers were fresh and in heart, whereas the other were wearied with long travel, vel. For the enemies set forth at the third watch, and besides their night journey, they had marched three hours also of the day, and without any repose or rest at all, they came to a conflict presently upon their travel on the way. And therefore at the beginning of the battel, so long as they were in any heart, and their strength served, they troubled and disordered the Romans with the first charge they gave; but afterwards for a while they came to be equal in fight, in which hazard of doubtfull issue the Propretor vowed to set forth certain solemn games to the honour of Jupiter, in case he might discomfit the enemies, and kill them in chase. At the length the Romans advanced forward more hotly, and the Lusitanians retreated, yea, and anon turned their backs quite. And when as in this train of victory the Romans pursued them hard in the rout, there were of the enemies slain upon 12000, 500 and forty taken prisoners, all in manner horsemen: and of military engines they carried away one hundred thirty and four. Of the Roman army seventy and three only were lost. This battel was fought not far from the City Ilipa. And thither brought P. Cornelius his victorious army, enriched with prey and pillage. Which was laid all abroad before the Town, and every man had leave given to challenge and claim his own. All the rest was given to the Treasurer for to be sold, and the money raised thereof, was parted among the foldiers.

Now had not C. Flaminius the Pretor as yet taken his leave of Rome, when these things fell out in Spain, and therefore both he and his friends talked and discoursed much upon these occurrences both good and bad: and so far much as a great war in his Province was broken out to a light fire, and himself was to receive from Sext. Digitius but a small remnant of an army, and the same timorous still and full of fright, as not well recovered of their former flight, he had assented to bring about, that the Senat would assign unto him one of the City-legions: to the end that when he had joined thereto those foldiers which himself had enrolled according to an order set down by the Senat, he might out of all that number chuse forth six thousand and five hundred footmen, and three hundred horsemen. With which legion (for in the army of Sext. Digitius he reposed small confidence) he minded to make war. The ancient Senators denied and said, That acts of the Senat were not to be made upon every flying tale and report set abroad and blazed by some particular persons in favor of Magistrats. Neither would they hold any thing for certain, but which either the Pretors themselves wrote out of the Provinces, or Embassadors sent of purpose, related. And there were any such commotion and trouble in Spain, they were of advice that the Pretor should levy in half without Italy, such cumulatory foldiers, as in that case were usually taken up. The intent and mind of the Senat was, that foldiers should in that sort be preft out in Spain, Valerius Antias writeth that C. Flaminius both sailed into Sicily to levy and muster men, and also as he made sail from Sicily toward Spain, was by wind and tempest put with the shore of Africa: where he found certain foldiers dispersed over the countrey, remaining of the army of P. Africanus: of whom he took a military oath to serve him in his wars: and that to these levies raised into two Provinces, he joynd also a third in Spain.

The war of the Ligurians likewise grew as fast: for they had already besieged and invested Pifa with forty thousand men: and thither resorted and flocked daily unto them great multitudes as well for hope of pillage, as upon the bruit and rumor that went of the war, Minutius the Consul came at the day appointed to Arretium, which was the Revelation: where he had commanded all his foldiers to meet him: from whence he marched with a four-square Battalion toward Pifa. And when the enemies had removed their camp a mile from the City on the other side of the River, the Consul entered the Town, which no doubt by his coming he preferred. The next day himself also encamped on the other side of the River, almost half a mile from the enemies, from which place he made light skirmishes with them and saved the territory of his allies from the excursions and robberies of the enemies. He durst not as yet try a battail in pitched field, as having but raw and new foldiers, and those gathered out of many kinds of men and not so well known among themselves, that one might surely trust another. The Ligurians bearing themselves bold of their numbers, not only came forth into the field ready to bid battail, and hazard all upon a throw: but having multitudes at commandment and to spare, sent out into all parts sundry companies to spoil and raise booties as far as to the marches and frontiers of the countrey. And when they had gathered together much cartail and great force of pillage, they had a strong place of defence ready at hand, well manned and guarded, by means whereof all was conveyed into their burroughs and Towns.

Thus while the Ligurians war was settled about Pifa, the other Consul L. Cornelius Merula entered with his army by the utmost confines of the Ligurians into the territory of the Boians: where the war was managed far otherwise than with the Ligurians. For the Consul entered the field in battail array, but the enemies fell off, and would not fight. In so much as the Romans seeing none to come forth and present themselves, ran abroad into all parts to speed their hands with pillage. And the Boians chose rather to suffer their goods to be ransacked, making no resistance, than to save the same with the hazard of a battail. The Consul when he had wrought his pleasure and consumed all with fire and sword departed out of the territory of the enemies, and marched toward * Mutina securely without any regard of himself, as through a peaceable country of his friends. The Boi perceiving one that they were gone out of their limits, followed after with a full and silent march, seeking some convenient place for to lay an ambush. And having in the night season passed beyond the Roman camp, they seized themselves of a streight passage within a saltmarsh, through which of necessity the Romans must pass, and there they forlayed them.

This

the City, riding in triumph: then Marcus and C. Trinius, both Tribuns of the Commons, protested, that they would interpose their negative, and cancel the order of the Senat in that behalf.

The Censors for that time, were Sex. Julius Papius and C. Cornelius Cethegus, created the year before. Cornelius took a review of the City and numbered the people: and there were accounted by his survey 143,704 polls of Citizens. Great floods arose that year, and Tiber overflowed all the flats and plain places of the City: and about the gate Flumentana certain houses and buildings were overthrowen withal, and laid along. The gate Calmontina besides, was stricken with lightning, and the wall about it was likewise blasted from heaven. At Aricia, Lanuvium, and in mount Arventum, it rained stones. And reported it was from Capua, that a great swarm of Wasps came flying into the market place, and leaped upon the Temple of Mars: which being with great care taken up and gathered together, were afterward consumed with fire. In regard of these prodigious tokens, order was given, that the Decemvirs should search and peruse the books of Sibylla: whereupon a novendial sacrifice (to continue nine dayes) was appointed, a publick procession solemnized, and the City was cleaned and hallowed. About the same time M. Porcius Cato, dedicated the Chappel of Virgin Victory, near to the Temple of the Goddess Victory, two years after that he had vowed it. In that year also the Triumvirs, C. Manlius Vellio, L. Apollinus Fullo, and P. Aelius Tubero, (who had preferred a bill of request about the planting of a Colony) had commission granted, to conduct a Colony of Latins into the countrey of Tiburinus: and thither went three thousand footmen and three hundred horsemen: a small number in comparison of the largeness and quantity of the territory. There might well have been set out thirty acres for every footman, and three score for an horseman: but by the motion and advice of Apollinus, one third part of the Lands was excepted and reserved, to the end, that afterwards in time, they might enrol new Colonies if it pleased them. And therefore the footmen had twenty acres, and the horsemen forty apeece.

Now approached the end of the year, and more ambition there was, and hotter suit for place of dignity in the election of Consuls, than ever had been known any time before. Many mighty men, as well of the Patrin and nobles, as the Commoners, stood and laboured hard for the Consulship, to wit, P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Cneus, who lately was departed out of Spain after he had achieved many worthy deeds. L. Quintus Flaminius who had been Admiral of the navy in Greece, and Cn. Manlius Vellio, all of the Nobility. But of the Commons were C. Laelius, Cn. Domitius, C. Lucius Sulpicius, and M. Atilius. But all mens eyes were fixed upon Quintus and Cornelius. For they desired one place, being both of them nobly descended, and their self glory for feats of war: recommended both the one and the other. But above all other things, the brethren of these competitors, two most renowned warriors of their time, set the debate on a light fire. The glory of Scipio, as it was the greater of the twin, so it was more subject to envy. The honour of Quintus was more fresh, as who that year had newly triumphed. Over and besides, the one of them had been now almost ten years continually conversant in the eyes of men (a thing that methinks great men not to highly regarded, by reason that they are grown stale, and the world is full already of them) also he had been twice Consul, and Censor since he vanquished Annibal. But in Quintus all was fresh and new, to win the good grace and favor of men, And more than that, he neither after his triumph had obtained ought of the people, nor, to say a truth, requested any thing. He alledged, that he made suit for his own natural and whole brother by both sides, and not for a Cousin German: in the behalf of a very companion and partaker with him in the managing of the war (for as himself served by Land, so his brother performed many exploits by sea.) So he obtained, that Quintus should be preferred before his competitor, whom Africanus and his brother Africanus brought in and graced, whom the whole race of Cornelius seemed to condescend, even then when Cornelius, Consul, was president of the election and held the assembly: whom the Senat had given to grave attestation of, in adjudging him to be the best man simply in all the City, and thought most worthy to receive the goddess, same Idaea, coming from Pessinus to the City of Rome. Thus were L. Quintus, and Cn. Domitius Aemilius created Consuls, in which sort, that Africanus was of no credit, and bare no stroke at all (ye may be sure.) In the election of a Consul out of the third estate of Commons, albeit he employed himself, and did his best for C. Laelius. The next day after were the Pretors elected namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Fulvius Centumalus, A. Atilius Serranus, M. Atilius Tappinus, L. Valerius Tappinus, and Q. Salentinus Serranus. This year M. Aemilius Lepidus and L. Aemilius Paulus, the Censors, bare themselves for in their offices they made their year to be notable and much spoken of. They condemned and fined many of the City grasiers or farmers of the common pastures: and of that money which arose of their amendments, were certain gilded shields made, which were set up on the finial or lantern of Jupiter Temple. They made one terrace or gallery without the gate Trigemina, with a marchants Hall or Burse adjoined thereto, near Tiber: and another from the gate Fontinalis they built in length as far as to the Altar of Mars, leading to Mars field.

For a long time nothing was done in Liguria worth the remembrance. But about the end of the year, twice were the Romans in great jeopardy: for both the camp of the Consul was assailed and hardly defended: and also not long after, as the Roman host marched through a streight pass, the army of the Ligurians kept the very gullet of the passage, and the Consul (seeing he could not make way through, turned his coings, and began to retire the same way he came: but by that time, some of the enemies had gained also the back part of the pass, inasmuch as the

A lamentable remembrance of the Caudine overthrow, not only presented it felt to their spirit and mind, but also was in manner an object to their eye. Now had he amongst his auxiliary or aid-forces, to the number almost of eight hundred horse. Whose Captain promised the Consul, that he and his would break through whither way he would, let him only buttell him which of the two quarters were better peopled and inhabited: for the first thing that he did, he would fire their villages and houses: to the end, that the fear and fright thereof might force the Ligurians to depart out of the chafe which they held and besege, and run to succour their own neighbours. The Consul commended him highly, and fed him with hope of large rewards. Whereupon the Numidians mounted on horseback, and began to ride about the corps de guard of the enemies, without offering to charge upon any man. At the first, a man that had seen them, would have thought nothing more contemptible, being both men and horse, little, spare and gaunt. The horseman unarmed and without weapon, save that he carried about him some light darts: the horses without bridles: and as they ran flitting out from their hostes, and bearing their heads forward without any reining at all, they made a very ill favoured sight. And the riders, for to make themselves more despised, would on purpose seem to take fals from their hostes, and made their enemies good sport. Whereupon they (who if at first they had been assailed, would have been heedful & ready to have received the charge) now lat fill (many of them unarmed) to behold this pleasant pastime. The Numidians would gallop toward them and presently ride back again, but so, as by little and little they gained ground, and advanced neerer to the pass, yet making semblance, as if they had had no rule of their hostes, but were carried thither against their will. At the last, they set upon their hostes indeed, and brake through the mids of the enemies guards: and so soon as they had recovered the open ground, they let on fire all the houses near the high way side, and so forward they burnt the next village they came unto, and destroyed all afore them with fire and sword. First the smoke that was decried, afterwards the outcry heard of them that were affrighted in the villages, and last of all, the children and old folk that fled to save themselves, made a trouble and hurlyburly in the camp: inasmuch, as every man of himself without advice, without warrant or direction, made what halt he could to run and save his own. Thus in the turning of an hand, the camp was abandoned, and the Consul delivered from siege, arrived thither where he intended.

But neither Boians nor Spaniards (with whom that year the Romans made war) were so spitefully and maliciously bent against them, as the whole nation of the Ætolians. They at the very first were in very good hope, that presently upon the remove of the forces out of Greece, Antiochus would have entred Europe, and seized upon the vacant possession thereof: and that neither Philip nor Nabis would be in reit and do nothing. But seeing them not to stir in any place, they thought it high time to make some trouble and confusion themselves, for fear lest by delays and lingering, all their designments would turn to nothing: and therefore they published a Diet or Council to be holden at Napactum. In which assembly Thas their Pretor, after he had made grievous complaint of the wrongs received by the Romans, moving and soliciting the state of Æolia (for that they of all other nations and Cities of Greece, were least honoured and let by after that victory, whereof they had been the cause) gave his advice, that there should be Embassadors sent to all the neighbouring Kings, not only to sound their minds and affections, but also to incite and prick them every one forward to enter into arms against the Romans. So Damocritus was addrest to Nabis, Nicander to Philip, and Dicaarchus the brother of the Pretor unto Antiochus. Damocritus had in commission to signify unto the tyrant of Lacedæmon, "That by the loss of his maritime Cities, the very strings and sinews of his tyranny and Kingdom were cut in sunder: For from thence was he furnished with soldiers, from thence had he his ships and servants at sea: whereas now, he might see the Achæans LL, and rulers of Peloponnesus, whilst himself was pined up and encircled within his wals and never should he have opportunity to recover himself, if he let pass this that presently was offered unto him. No Roman army was now in Greece: and never would the Romans think it sufficient cause, to pass over the Seas with their legions into Greece, for any occasion of Gythium or other Laconians inhabiting the Sea-coasts. These pretors were laid forth to incense the courage of the tyrant, to the end, that when Antiochus was once passed over into Greece, he being troubled in conscience, that he had broken the Roman league by committing outrage upon their allies, might of necessity join and band with Antiochus, and "Seemable reasons and reasons used Nicander for to provoke and persuade Philip: and "such more matter he had to enforce that point, as the King was depoted from much higher degree of estate than the tyrant had been, and also had sustained far greater losses. To this, he alledged the ancient name and renown of the KK, of Macedon; and how that nation had overrun the whole world and filled all places with their noble conquests & victories. Moreover he said, that he advised him to take a course, which was safe both to be enterprised, and also easy to be executed. For he gave not Philip counsel to fight, before that Antiochus were passed over with "an army into Greece: and considering that he without the aid of Antiochus had maintained war "so long against the Romans and Ætolians, what possible means had the Romans to withstand him assisted with Antiochus & the Ætolians his allies, who even then were fiercer enemies than the Romans? Over and besides, he inferred this reason also, what a brave and doughty Captain "an Antiochus was, a man even born to be an enemy to the Romans, and who had slain already more "leaders and souldiers of theirs, than were left behind. These were the allegations of Nicander to Philip. As for Dicaarchus, he had other motives to persuade with Antiochus. First, and principally

"that (because these Cities sometime were in bondage through the inquiry of those times where-
 "in they were oppressed) there shall be a right pretended, and the same be effectual to reduce
 "them again after so many ages into servitude? What wanteth it but ye may as well say that we "have done just nothing, in delivering Greece out of the hands of Philippi and the his successors "and posterity, may claim again and lay title to Corinth, Chalcis, Demetrias, and the whole Thessi-
 "lian nation? But what mean I to maintain the cause of the Cities of Greece, whom it were more
 "meet and reasonable, that both we and the King himself would give audience unto, and let them "plead what they can for their own selves? With that he commanded the embassages of the Ci"ties to be called in, which were prepared and instructed aforehand by Eumenes, who made this "reckoning, that whatsoever strength went from Antiochus, should accrue and come unto him and "his Kingdom. Many were admitted to speak: and whilst every one set forward his own cause, I
 "some by way of complaint, others in manner of demand, each one putting in for himself without "regard of right or wrong, so he served his own turn, they fell at length from reasoning to wrangling
 "and wrangling: in so much, as the Ambassadors returned to Rome as uncertain and doubtful in all "matters as they were when they came, without releasing or obtaining any one thing at all.

When they were dismissed and gone, the King held a Council as touching the Roman war, in "which assembly, some delivered their opinion more freely and stoutly than others: but generally
 "the more bitter speech that any one used against the Romans, the greater hope he had to enter in"to especial grace and favour with the King. One above the rest, inveighed much and spake against "those proud and insolent demands of the Romans, who imposed hard laws and conditions upon
 "Antiochus, the mightiest King of all Asia as if he had been no better than Nabis, whom they had "conquered and subdued. And yet (saith he) they left unto Nabis some leignory and dominion in "his own country and City of Lacedaemon: whereas if Lampsacum and Smyna should be at the "command of Antiochus, they deemed that an unworthy thing and a very indignity. Others opened
 "and said, "that those two Cities were but small causes, and not worth the naming, for to punish
 "a Prince to stand upon and to war for. But always (say they) men begin with just and reason"able demands, to make an overture and way to compals and obtain that which is unjust. Unles
 "one would believe, that when the Persians requested of the Lacedaemonians, water and earth,
 "they stood in need of a clot of turf or ground, or a draught of water, in like sort for all the world
 "the Romans do but found and try the King, in their demands touching these two Cities, for o"ther Cities likewise, so soon as they shall perceive that those two have shaken off the yoke of "obedience, will soon revolt and turn to that people which is their deliverer, and at other hands
 "they hope for liberty. And say, that freedom were not to them more dear and precious than "bondage, yet it is the nature of every man to feed and please himself with a bare hope of a change "and new world much more than with the assured hold of any present state whatsoever. There "was in place at this council, Alexander of Acarnania, one who sometime had befriended Philippi but
 "of late dayes was slain from him and followed the court of Antiochus, a more wealthy and magni"ficent Prince: and being taken for a politician who had a special insight into the state of Greece,
 "was not ignorant of the affairs of Rome, had wound himself into high favour and inward friend"ship with the King, that he was taken in to be one of his privy council, and acquainted with all "his secrets. This man, as if the question in hand had been, not, Whether war should be levied or "no; but, Where, and by What means, and How it should be managed, spake aloud and said, "That "he made full reckoning and account in his very spirit and heart of the victory, in case the King
 "would pass the Seas over into Europe, to plant & settle himself in some part of Greece, and there
 "wage war: for at his very first coming he should see in arms already the Aetolians, that inhabit
 "the very heart and centre of Greece, who would be the only Captains and port-configns to march "before them, ready to venture and enter upon the most difficult and dangerous enterprises of "war. Again, in the two canons and angles as it were thereof, he should find Nabis of the one "side from Peloponnesus, at hand to rise and raze those quarters, with intent to regain the City of "the Argives, to win again the maritime Cities, which the Romans have diseized & disposed "him of, and have mured and shut him within the walls of Lacedaemon. On the other side from "the Macedons, Philippi would no doubt take arms, so soon as he shall hear the first alarm and found of "trumpet. Full well (quod he) know I his courage, and of what spirit and stomach he is right well I
 "wot that he hath fostered in that breast of his for a long time, anger and despite, like to the wild
 "and savage beasts, which either are kept within iron gates, or fast tied and bound: and as well I "remember, how many a time he was wont (during the wars) to pray heartily to all the Gods,
 "to vouchsafe for to give him Antiochus for his helper and assistant: and if now he might enjoy "his wish, and have the thing so long desired and prayed for he would without any delay, enter in"to arms and war incontinently. Only (quod Alexander) we must not linger and stay nor dilly dally "for as much as herein consisteth the very point of victory, even betimes to seize upon some con"spicuous places of advantage, before the enemies be possessed of them. Also with all speed, Antioch
 "is to be sent into Affrick, whereby the Romans may be distracted, and compelled to turn them "selves sundry ways. Antioch only was not called to this council: for by reason of the fore-
 "said conferences with Philippi, the King had him in some jealousy, and therefore he was out of favour,
 "and of no credit and account with him. At the first, he put up this disgrace and made no words,
 "but afterwards he thought it a better course, both to demand the cause of so sudden strange "and alienation of his, and also to take some good time to excuse and purge himself. And therefore "upon upon a day having simply asked of the King, and heard the cause of his anger toward him. "My "father Antioch (quod he) O Antiochus, when upon a time he sacrificed unto the Gods, caused me

 "a very little one, to be brought and presented before the Altar, where he forced me to touch the "same with my hand, and to take an oath, Never to be friend unto the people of Rome. To accom"plish and fulfill this oath, I maintained the wars for the space of six and thirty years, verue of "this oath, in time of peace I was driven out of my native country: and being fled from thence,
 "this oath brought me into your court: and by the guidance and direction of this oath, if you "should disappoint me of my hope, yet whatsoever I know there are forces, wheretoever I hear
 "there is any stirring and rustling of arms, I shall feel all the world over, until I find some Roman "enemies. And therefore, if there be any of your Courtiers that have a mind and desire to advance "themselves in your good grace and would grow by carrying tales and accusing me unto you, let "them find some other subject and matter to do this by me: for I hate the Romans and am like"wise hated of them. That this is truth which I say, my father Antioch and the Gods in heaven,
 "can testify. Wherefore, whensoever you shall think to make war with the Romans, see you enter"tain Antioch for one of your greatest and most assured friends: but if any occurrent shall force
 "you to peace, seek some other counsellor and not me, to consult withal about that point. This "speech was so effectual, that not only it prevailed with the King, but also reconciled Antioch unto "his grace. And to they departed out of the council with a full resolution to make war.

At Rome it was commonly talked and discoursed, that Antiochus was an enemy, but no provi"sion and preparation there was for war, but only whetting the edge of their stomachs. For both
 "C. Consuls had no other Province but Italy assigned unto them to govern. And they were either to "agree between themselves, or else to call lots, whether of the twain should hold the general assembly, "and be president of the election for that year. And he whose hap was not to be charged with "that business, was to be in readiness to lead forth the legions into any place out of Italy, as need "should require. And to this Consul it was permitted to enrol two new legions of Citizens, and
 "besides of allies and Latins 30000 foot, and 800 horse. To the other Consul were appointed "those two legions, which L. Cornelius the Consul of the former year had under his governance, al"so of allies and Latins 15000 footmen out of the same army and 500 horse. As for Q. Minucius, "his commission was continued till for the conduct of that army which he had in Egryna. And for
 "to supply and make up the broken companies, he was allowed to enrol 4000 Roman footmen, "and 150 horse, and likewise to levy of the allies 5000 foot, and 150 horse for that service. To
 "C. Domitius it fell by lot, that he should go with a power out of Italy, whither soever the Senate "gave order: and unto Quintius to govern Gaul. Then the Pretors election followed, who like"wise call lots for their Provinces. M. Fulvius Centumalus had the civil jurisdiction, and L. Scrib-
 "onius Libo the forrain, L. Valerius Tappus governed Sicily, Q. Salustius Sarra, Sardinia: M. Ba-
"binius Lampron high Spain, and A. Attilius Severanus the bale. But these two changed their Pro"vinces, first by an order from the Senate, and afterwards by an act also of the Commons. For to "Attilius Macedon was assigned and the navy, and to Babinius the country of the Brutii. Flam-
"inius and Fulvius continued in the government and command of Spain, and to Babinius Lampron
 "for the role of the Brutii, were those two legions appointed which the year before lay in the City,
 "with commission to take up and levy of allies fifteen thousand foot, and five hundred horse to go
 "thither. Attilius had in charge to cause thirty gallees to be made with five banks of oars
 "on a side, and to take out of the harbors and docks as many old vessels as were fit for service, and "to enrol mariners and rowers. The Consuls also were enjoined to deliver unto him two thou"sand of the Latins nation, and a thousand Roman footmen. It was commonly voyced, that "these two Pretors with two armies both by Land and at Sea, were prepared against Nabis, who "openly now assailed the confederates of the people of Rome. But still the Ambassadors were loo"ped for, who had been sent unto King Antiochus, and the Senat commended the Consul Domitius "not to depart from the City before their return. The Pretors, Fulvius and Scribonius, whose "charge it was to minister law and execute justice in Rome, had commission to provide a hundred "gallees, besides that fleet which Attilius was to command. But before that either Consuls or
 "Pretors went forth into their Provinces, there was a procession holden, in regard of the prodigies
 "and fearful sights that were reported. For word was brought out of Picenum, that a flee-
 "goat had yeared six kids at once, and that it rained earth at Amisernum: and at Fornice, that a gate "and wall of the City were smitten with lightning: and (that which most of all troubled and "frighted the Consul Domitius) that an Ox spake these words, Rome, take heed to thy self. In regard
 "of the other prodigious tokens, there was a supplication holden: but as for the Ox, the South-
 "sayers and bowel-priests gave commandment, that he should with great care be kept and nouth"fied. The Tiber also with more violence overflowed into the City than in the former year, and over"threw two bridges and many buildings, especially about the gate of Flumentum. Moreover, a mighty
 "Gorge stone shaken out of the Capitol cliff, fell from thence into the street called Ingratum, either
 "by the force and violence of rain, or some earthquake (which if there were any, was so little, that it "could not be perceived) and that stone killed many a man. In the country also, by reason of this "deluge, much cattle was carried away with the flood, and many farm houses and granges were "born down and laid along.

Before that L. Quintius the Consul was arrived into his Province, Q. Minucius fought a bat"tled with the Egerians in the territory of Pise, and slew nine thousand enemies: the rest he dis"comfited,

committed, put to flight and chased into their camp; which being assailed, was defended manfully with much fighting until dark night: and then the Ligurians slipped away in the night season secretly. And by the dawning of the next day the Romans entered and seized thereof when it was empty of the enemies. Lest pillage was there found, for that ever and anon what booties soever they gat in the country they sent home to their houses. Mimius notwithstanding gave the enemies no repose from that time forward. For being departed out of the territory of Pise he came into Liguria, where he destroyed their boroughs and Castles, and put all to fire and sword. There the Roman souldiers filled their hands with the Tuscan prizes, sent thither by the foragers and robbers.

Much about this time the Embassadors returned to Rome, from the KK. who brought word and made relation of nothing that was sufficient to enforce them to proceed in any halt to war, I but only against the Lacedæmonian tyrant, by whom (as the Achaean Embassadors all gave intelligence) the Sea coasts of Laconia were wronged and assailed, against the covenants of the league. Whereupon Attulus the Pretor was sent with a fleet to defend the assailed, and forasmuch as there was no imminent peril from Antiochus, it was thought good, that both the Consuls should go into their Provinces. Domitius took his journey, and went the neerest way by Ariminum, and Quintus came into the Boians country by the way of Liguria. And these two Consuls armies in divers quarters, waited all abroad the enemies country. At the first few of their Gentlemen and Horsemen, together with their Captains: afterwards, all those of Senators calling: and last of all, as many as were of any repute, worth and worship, to the number of fifteen hundred fled to the Consul.

Likewise in both Spain that year the affairs went prosperously: for not only C. Flaminius won by force of markelets and engines of battery the rich and strong Town Litabrum, and took prisoner live their Lord Corribus a noble Prince; but also M. Fulvius the Pro-consul fought with two armies of the enemies twice, and put them to the worie: and won by assault two Towns of the Spaniards Vesellia and Holone, with many other fortresses: the rest of themselves revolted unto him. After this he made a journey into the Oretans country, and there having gotten two towns, * Nolit and Casby, he set forward and marched to the river Tagus. In that quarter there stood * Talenum a small City but strongly fortified: whiles he assaulted it, there came a mighty army of the Vedions to aid the Toletans, with whom he fought a tier field, and won the day, and having defeated the Vedions, he forced the Toletans with engines of battery, and won the Town.

But all the wars which at that time were in hand, nothing troubled the LL. of the Senate much as the expectation of the war, which Antiochus had not yet begun and entered. For albeit they had ever and anon can advertisements and intelligences of all things by their Embassadors, yet many flying tales and headie bruits there went without any certain Authors, reporting lies as well as truths. And among the rest there ran a rumor, that Antiochus, so soon as he was come into Ætolia, would presently put over a fleet into Sicily. Whereupon the Senate, notwithstanding they had sent Antiochus the Pretor with a fleet into Greece, yet forasmuch as there was need not of force only but also of authority to entertain the hearts and affections of their allies, they sent over T. Quintus, Q. Ostorius, Gn. Servilius, and P. Silius as Embassadors into Greece, and gave order that M. Cælius should advance his legions out of the country of the Brutians, toward Tarentum and Brundisium: that from thence if need required, he might sail over into Macedonia. Moreover, that M. Fulvius the Pretor should put out a fleet of thirty sail, for the defence of the coast of Sicily and that the Admiral thereof should have full commission there to command (now L. Oppius Salsinator, who the former year had been one of the Ædiles of the Commons, had the conduct of those ships.) Also, that the same Pretor should address his letters unto L. Paterius his Colleague, and advertised him that it was to be feared, that the armada of King Antiochus would cross over out of Ætolia into Sicily: and therefore it was the will and pleasure of the Senate, that he should take up and enrol into that army which he had already of tumultuary souldiers 1000 footmen, and 400 horie, by whose means he might defend that coast of the Province which looketh toward Greece. For the levy of these forces, the Pretor took musters not only in Sicily, but also in the Isles adjacent and lying thereabout, and fortified with good garrisons all the Towns upon the Sea side which lie toward Greece. Those rumours aforesaid were fed still and maintained by the coming of Attalus the brother of Eumenes, who reported that King Antiochus was passed over Hell-spont with an army: and that the Ætoliens were in that forwardness, that they would be prest and ready in arms against his arrival. Great thanks were given as well to Eumenes in his absence, as to Attalus there present in place. Also order was taken, that he should have a lodging allowed him at his pleasure, and his charges born for his diet and house-keeping. Moreover, there were given him 25 presents, two great horses of service, two pair of horsemen armors, as much silver plate as amounted to an hundred pound weight: and of gold plate, as much as weighed 20 pound.

And forasmuch as messengers one after another advertised and gave warning, that war was at hand it was thought requisite and expedient, that the new Consuls should be chosen in convenient speed: whereupon a decree passed from the Senat, that M. Fulvius the Pretor should forthwith dispatch his letters unto the Consul, to certify him of the Senats pleasure, namely, that he should commit the government of his Province and the army unto his Lieutenant, and return himself unto Rome, and in his way send out his writs aforesaid for the publishing of an assembly

A general for the election of Consuls. The Consul obeyed the letters, directed forth his summons in manner aforesaid, and came to Rome. In this year a great ambition there was, and much suit for the dignity of government. For that three noblemen stood for one place, namely, P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Cneus, who the former year had the republic; L. Cornelius Scipio, and Gn. Manlius Falst. The Consulship was conferred upon P. Scipio, so as it might appear to the whole world, that this honour was deferred only and not fully denied to so worthy a personage. His adjunct companion in government was M. Aclius Glabrus, a man by calling a commoner. The morrow after were the Pretors chosen: to wit, L. Æmilius Paulus, L. Æmilius Lepidus, M. Junius Brutus, A. Cædus, Mammilius C. Levis, Sc. L. Appius, both surnamed Salinator. This Appius was he that had the conduct into Sicily of a fleet of thirty sail. Mean while that these new Magistrates call lots for the government of their Provinces, M. Cælius was commanded to pass over with all his power from Brundisium into Epirus, and to keep his forces about Apollonia. And M. Fulvius the Pretor of the City had in charge to build fifty new Galeaces called Quinquereges of five banks of oars on either side. And thus verily the people of Rome was provided against all enterprises and attempts of King Antiochus whatsoever.

Neither was Nabis behind for his part in levying war: but assailed with great force the Town of Ophymus: and of a mischievous and malicious mind against the Achæans, for sending a garrison to aid the besieged Townsmen he forsook and waited their country. The Achæans durst not go in hand with war, before their Embassadors were returned from Rome, and until they might know the pleasure and will of the Senat: but after the return of those Embassadors, they both published a Diet and general Council at Sicyone, and also sent their Embassadors to Quintus for his advice and counsel. In this Diet, all their opinions inclined and tended to make war out of hand: only the letters of T. Quintus made some stay of the enterprise, wherein he advised them to expect the Pretor and navy of the Romans. Now when the State there assembled in council were directed some perishing still in their former opinion, and others of mind to take with them the advice of him unto whom they had sent for counsel: the multitude at length looked what Philopemenes would say in that behalf. The Pretor he was for the time and in those days surpassed all other in wisdom and authority. Then he rose up and used this preface and said, "That it was a good custom among the Ætoliens, and well ordained and provided, that the Pretor himself in all consultations of war should not deliver his own opinion: and therefore willed them of their selves to resolve and determine with all speed possible what they pleased. As for the Pretor, faith he, he will be ready to execute with fidelity and careful diligence their decrees accordingly: yea, and indevor so far forth as mans policy may reach unto, that they shall not repent of their resolution: be it war or peace. This brief speech of his was more forcible and effectual to incite them to take arms, than any persuasive Oration, wherein he openly could have shewed his desire to follow the wars. And therefore with exceeding accord of all in general they agreed upon war. As for the time and means of managing the same, it was wholly referred to the discretion of the Pretor, to use his own liberty and pleasure. Philopemenes, besides that Quintus so advised, was also himself minded to wait for the Roman fleet which on the Sea side might defend Gythium: but fearing again that their present necessity could abide no delays, and lest not only Gythium should be beset, but the garrison also military, which was sent to the defence of the war he let sloop and put to the Sea the Achæans shipping. The Tyrant likewise had rigged and dressed a small fleet to empeach any aid and succours that haply might be sent to the besieged by Sea, to wit, three covered ships with hatch and deck three Brigantines or Pinnaces, and as many Gallions. For the old ships were by composition and covenant delivered up to the Romans. And to make proof and trial of these new vessels how swift and nimble they were, and what to see how all things else were well fitted for a battail, if need were; he made every day certain shows and representations of fight at Sea, and exercised both mariners and souldiers by such kind of false alarms: supposing, that herein principally consisted the hope of his siege, in case he could cut off all their aid from the Sea side. Now the Pretor of the Achæans as he was equal to any of the best and most renowned commanders and Captains of that time in Land service, either for experience and practise or wit and policy: so at Sea he was but a novice and a learner as being an Arcadian born, an Inlander far within the main, and ignorant besides of all former forces, but that he had born arms and served a little in Cady, whiles he had the leading there, of some auxiliaries. One old Gally there was a Quadrifente, taken at Sea 80 years before, at what time as the called Nicola the wife of Craterus from Naxos came to Corinth. And having heard much talk of this ship (for indeed he had been sometime of great name in the Kings royal fleet) he commanded her, all rotten as she was now, and ready to fall in pieces, to be shot into the Sea from out of the Bay of Argium. This ship as admiral, made way before the rest, wherein Tiso of Parra, a Captain General of a fleet was aboard; and he commanded the ships of the Laconians, making sail from Gythium. And at the first he chanced to drift and run against a new strong ship and being old of her self leaking and taking water at every joint, the war went asunder and fell aspires. All within her were taken prisoners. The rest of the fleet, having lost their captain, fled as fast as possibly their oars could make speed and away. Philopemenes himself was in a light swift frigat or pink, and fled again, and never stayed until he was arrived at Parra. This mishap nothing discouraged and abated the heart of this martial warrior, who had run through many and sundry adventures: but contrary-wise wrought this effect, that he abhorred himself and said, That if he were overtaken and put to the worie in service at Sea, wherein Philoponemes having given commandment to his light armed aid-fouldiers so prelie forward till H, and to follow the chafe as fast as they could (knowing well that the Borémen would have much ado and trouble in their flight) conducted himselfe the main army and heavily charged, by a more open way to the River Enneus: where he encamped himselfe a little before the going downe of the sun, and there he waited for his light appointed fouldiers, whom he had lett to follow after the enemies. Who being come about the time of the first watch brought word, that the Tyrans with some few were entred into the City, but the unarmed multitude were dispersed, and wandered all about the forest and the woods. Then he wilked them to repose and refresh their bodies: which being done, himselfe chose out of all the fouldiers besides, who because they were consumed into the camp, had well hearted themselves with taking their refection and some small sleep certain elect and special men, and took them forth immediately with him, having about them nothing but their swords, and set them in good order to keep two port-waies, by which men got to Phara and Bardolphes, where he presumed that the enemies would take their way and retire themselves upon their flight: and nothing was he deceived. For the Lacedaemonians so long as the day light lasted, had withdrawn themselves to the middle of the forest, through by-lanes and blind paths; but when the night was come, and that they defied lights within their enemies camp, they kept themselves aloof over-against them within cloie and secret lanes: and when they were once passed beyond, and thought all to be in safety and security, they came down into the more open high waies, where they were received and caught up by their enemies that forsaied them in ambush: so they were every where by numbers either killed or taken prisoners: in such sort as scarce one fourth part of their whole army escaped. Philoponemes having shut up the tyrant cloie in the City, spent almost thirty daies consequently ensuing in waiting and spoiling the territory of the Laconioms: and when he had thus weakened and in manner broken the back of his enemy, he returned home, and the Achaens held him a paragon, and equal to the Roman Generall for glorious deeds of arms, nay, in the service of the Laconian war they preferred him before the other.

During the war between the Achæans and the tyrant, the Roman Embassadors, who carefully and diligently visited the Cities of the Allies, for fear lest the Ætolians had alienated any of their Affections from them to King Antiochus travelled but little in going about to the Achæans, whom by reason of the hatred they bare to Nabis, they hoped verily to be fast and faithful enough unto them in all other things. And first they came to Athens, from thence to Chalcidæum and so to Theffaly: and after they had conferred with the Theffalians in a frequent council of the city, they turned their way to Demetrias, where there was published a solemn Diet to be holden by the Magnesians. Where they were to frame their speech more curiously than in other places, because certain of their great men and Potentates were estranged from the Romans, and altogether made for Antiochus and the Ætolians. The reason was this; because when news came that Philip his son, who was left hostage with the Romans should be rendered again unto him, and likewise therein but remitted which had been imposed upon him, among other false tales and untruths it was reported, That the Romans would receive Demetrias also into his hands. And rather than that should come to pass, Eurylochus a principal and chief man among the Magnesians, and some others of that faction, desired to have a new world and an alteration. By the coming of the Ætolians and Antiochus. To these Magnesians, they were to come and purchase their words in, in driving them of that foolish vain fear which they had conceived, that thereby they did not put Philip clean beside his hope, and so give him occasion to be ill affected unto the Romans; considering that he alone was to them of far greater importance in all respects, than were the Magnesians, put all together. Thus much only they said by way of advertisement. That as all Greece generally was much beholden and bound unto the Romans for the benefit of Liberty, which they by their means enjoyed, so that City and State especially above all others was obliged unto them. For there, not only a garrison of Macedonians had been maintained to keep them in awe, but also the King had built him a royal palace to seat himself there, to the end, that they might evermore have in their eye, they Lord to command them. But in vain, and to no purpose was all this, in case the Ætolians brought Antiochus in his head to make his residence in the house and palace of Philip; and would needs entertain a new and unknown King in lieu of the old, so long a time, and so well known. The sovereign Magistral of that City, they call Magnetarches; and for that time Eurylochus was the man: who bearing himself big and stout of his high place, said plainly, That he knew no cause, why either he or the Magnesians should suppress and smother the remembrance of so noble touching the delivery of Demetrias into Philip his hands. For rather than to suffer that, the Magnesians were to oppose themselves, yea, to do and dare any action whatsoever. And in the vehement heat of speech he went so far, that he considered he had cut one word and said. That Demetrias seemed free in outward shew and appearance, but in very truth was at the command and devotion, yea, and at every beck of the Romans. At this speech there arose a dissonant bruit and murmuring of the assembly, which jarred and varied one from another, whiles some looked him up, others were offended, and took it in great delight, that he should presume to utter and speak so much. And Quintus was in such an heat of choler therewith, that stretching forth his hands to Heaven, he called the Gods to witness this ingratitude and disloyalty of the Magnesians. At whose words they were all greatly terrified. Then Zeno one of the chief, a man at that time of great authority and reputation, as well in regard of the honorable part that he ever carried in the whole course of his life, as also for that he always stood firm and true but in vain and to no effect. After him Thou and the rest of that faction, were heard with the general applause of all: and they effected to much, that without any farther proroguing of the Diet, and referring the matter to another day, yea, and without staying so long until the Romans were out of the place and absent, they concluded to make a decree, by virtue whereof Antiochus should be sent for to affrontable Greece, and to decide the quarrel between the Romans and the Ætolians. This decree was not so proud and insolent, but Demetrius his Pretor accompanied it with as arrogant and reproachful a trumpet of his own. For when Quintus required of him to see the said decree, he without any respect of the honorable personage of the man, made answer, That for the present time he had somewhat else to do of greater importance; but he would give him the decree and an answer withal shortly, and that within Italy, encamped upon the bank of Tiberis. So great a spirit of senseless folly in those days had possessed the nation of the Ætolians, and their chief Magistrats! Then Quintus and the delegates returned to Corinth.

After the Romans were dismissed, the Ætolians held no more general council of the whole Nation, because they would make semblance and seem to do nothing of themselves as touching the cause and question of Antiochus, but sit still and expect the coming of the King. Many, they treated and debated the matter by their Aspelei (for so they call their special and privy Council which consisteth of certain elect chosen persons) by what means there might be an alteration and change in the affairs of Greece. This was held of all men for certain, that in every City and State, the chief and the best men generally were for the association of the Romans, and contented themselves with the present condition wherein they stood: but the multitude and those who had not all things to fall out to their own good liking, were desirous of a change. And one day above the rest, the Ætolians entered into a designment and plot, which was not only out of all measure audacious, but also most shameless, namely, to surprise and possess themselves of Demetrius, Chalcis and Lacedæmon. And to each of these Cities there was sent one of their principal personages, namely, Thou to Chalcis, Alexandrus to Lacedæmon, and Diocles to Demetrius. This Diocles had the help and assistance of Emphylochus a banished man (of whose flying away, and the occasion thereof we have spoken before) who otherwise had no hope at all to return again into his native country. The kinsfolk and friends of Emphylochus and thereof that faction, upon instructions given them by his letters, willed his wife and children to present themselves in the frequent assembly of the citizens in habit of mourners, in poor array, and vailed after the manner of humble suppliants, there to beseech them all and some, not to suffer him a guiltless person, neither convicted nor condemned, to wax old and pine away in exile. All that were plain and simple men seemed to be touched with pity and commiseration. The wicked and seditious persons conceived some hope to make a confusion in the State by these Ætolian troubles: in so much as every one was of opinion and gave his voice, that he should be restored and sent for home. This ground being laid and matters thus prepared, Diocles with his horsemen (for then was he the Captain of the Cavalry) took his journey, under a colour and pretence to reduce and bring home this banished person his host and good friend; and in one day and night travelled a mighty great journey, and came within six miles of the City. And betimes in the morning by day light, accompanied with three elect troops he marched forward, commanding the rest of the horsemen to follow after. When he approached the gate, he caused them all to alight on foot and to lead their horses in their hands by the reins of their bridles, and to go without order, resembling travellers and waifaring men, so as they seemed more like to the ordinary train of Captain Diocles, than to the men of arms and warriors under his charge: and leaving one of his troops at the gate, for fear lest the horsemen behind might be shut out, he led Emphylochus by the hand, and brought him through the mids of the City and the market place home to his house: and all the way he was met with many of his lovers and friends that welcomed him, and joyed for his return. Among the whole City was full of horsemen, and all places of opportunity and advantage were seized and possessed by them. Which done, divers were sent to massacre the chief of the adverse part in their houses. Thus the Ætolians became masters of Demetrius.

As for Lacedæmon, they devised in no hand to force the City, but by some wile to entrap and surprise the tyrant. For seeing the Romans had despoiled him of all his Sea coast Towns: and the Achæans driven him within the walls of Lacedæmon, there was no doubt, but who so ever could first take his life from him, should carry away all the thanks, and carry especial favor with the Lacedæmonians. Good occasion and pretence they had to send unto him a power of armed men, for that he had importuned them by his prayers for some aids, considering that by their advice and persuasion he had rebelled. So there were given unto Alexandrus a thousand footmen, and thirty elect horsemen, drawn out of all the flour of the City. Demetrius the Pretor delivered unto them from the privy council of that nation (of which we have before spoken) "That they should not believe that they were to be employed in war against the Achæans, or in any other service, according as each one might imagine and conceive in his own head: but he charged them to be ready to perform and execute obediently whatsoever fuddain designment Alexandrus upon the present occasion should happen to attempt, were it never so unlooked for, strange, inconsiderate, and audacious: and to rest upon this, That they were sent with him to accomplish that, and for no other purpose. Thus Alexandrus with the conduct of these men thus prepared to his hand came unto the Tyrant: and no sooner was he arrived, but he possessed him presently with a world of hopes: giving to understand, "That Antiochus was already passed over into Europe: that shortly he would be in Greece, and over-spread all seas and lands with his armies and armados; that the Romans should full well know and find, that they have not now to deal with such an one as Philip: that the numbers of his foot and horses by land can not be counted, nor his ships at Sea numbered: that the battail of his Elephants at the very fight will decide the matter and finish the war. Moreover, that the Ætolians with all their forces, were ready and prett to come to Lacedæmon: (as need required) at any time: but indeed, desirous they were to shew and muster before the King at his arrival, a goodly number of armed soldiers. Nabis therefore himself should do very well, not to suffer those forces which he had, to decay with long repose and idleness, but bring them forth and train them abroad, make them to move in their armour thereby both to whet and sharpen their courages, and also to exercise and inure their bodies: for by use and custom, the labour will be lighter; and by the civility and graciousness of their General, not without delight and pleasure. Hereupon, they began to issue out of the City, and oftentimes went into the plain lying hand by the River Eurotas. They of the tyrants guard kept commonly in the battail or middle ward: and himself with three horsemen at the utmost (with whom Alexandrus for the most part was joined ordinarily to ride before the captains, taking survey and viewing the utmost points and wings of the army. The Ætolians were placed in the right wing, as well those that came before to aid the tyrant as those thousand that were newly arrived with Alexandrus. Now had Alexandrus taken a custom, one while to come as it were amongst the ranks before in the company of the tyrant, and to intrude him in some matters sounding to his commodity: otherwhiles, to ride to his own men into the right wing, and soon again to return to the Tyrant, as if he had given them charge of somewhat necessary to be done. But upon that day which was appointed for to do the feat and murder the tyrant, after he had ridden forth with the tyrant to the usual place, and kept him company a while, he took occasion (as his manner was) to make a step aside to his own soldiers; and then he went in hand with those horsemen which were sent with him from out of Ætolia, and said thus unto them: "Now first, you must adventure and execute that lustily and without delay which you were commanded to perform by my direction and leading. Be ready with heart and hand, and be not slack and idle to exploit that, which ye shall seem to argue and interpose his own wit and advice to cross: be that either standeth still, or will seem to undertake and enterprise. And look whosoever misse, let him make account, he shall never go home again to his own country. With that he put them all a quaking, for well they remembered what their charge was when they came forth from home. Now was the Tyrant a coming on horseback from the left wing: Then Alexandrus commanded his horsemen to couch their lances down, and to have their eye upon him. He also settled himself to take a good heart unto him, which was not a little daunted at first with the cogitation of so great a designment that he had projected. When he was now approached and come near the Tyrant, he ran with full carrier at him, gored his horse, and overthrew himself to the ground. He was not so soon unhorsed and laid along, but the horsemen stabbed him with many a thrust: whereof the most part did no harm, considering they were driven against his collar: but in the end they found where his body was naked and unarmed, so he gave his last gasp before he could be rescued by his guard in the main battail aforesaid. Then Alexandrus taking with him all the Ætolians, made all the half he could to possess himself of the royal place. The Pensioners and Squires of the body, seeing this murder done before their eyes, were at first mightily affrighted: but afterwards perceiving the army of the Ætolians to go their wayes and depart, they ran to the breathless carcase left among them, and of men that should have guarded his body and retorted his death, they became a sort of idle gazers and lookers on. And surely there would not have been one stirred, in case the multitude had immediately been called to an assembly; and if after amidst down, they had been entertained by him with some Oration or Remonstrances framed according to thetime. The Ætolians were kept many together, in arms still, without any outrage or wrong done or offered to any one person. But all things that they did, heightened the speedy ruin and destruction of those that had committed this fact: as it could not otherwise be in Fall reason, but they should so be served, who had plaid so lewd and treacherous a part. The Captain and Ring-leader of all this mischief kept him self close shut within the royal palace, spending both night and day in rifling and searching the Tyrants coffers and his treasury. And the Ætolians for their part also felt so ransacking as if they had won that City by assault, which they made commensurate and semblance to see free. The indignity of these their pranks, the contempt withal and small regard made of them, encouraged and animated the Lacedæmonians to gather together and consult of the matter. Some were of opinion and said, That the Ætolians were to be thrust out by the head and shoulders, and to be sent away with a mischief, and taken from them: to be recovered, which under a colour of being restored, was intercepted and taken from them: others advised and said, that for fashion at leastwise, some one of royal blood should be let up for to be the head in this action. Now there was of that race and stem one Luconicus a young Child, brought up with the children of the late Tyrant: him they mounted upon horseback, and then they took arms with all speed, and as many Ætolians as they could light upon, wandering here and there in the streets, they ran upon and bowed in peeces. Then they assaulted the palace, where they also murdered Alexandrus, albeit with some few about him he made resistance and defended himself. The rest of the Ætolians gathered together about Chalciceus (which is a Chappel of Diana made of brass) and there likewise they were massacred: A few of them flung away their weapons and fled, some escaped to Tegra, and others to Megalopolis; where being apprehended by the Magistrates, they were sold in port-fale, so that they would offer most. Philopemestor hearing of the Tyrants death, went to Academus, where he found all things out of order and in confusion by reason of the same. And having called forth the principal in chief citizens, he used unto them such a speech, as indeed Alexander should have made, and thereby knit the Lacedæmonians in league and alliance with the Achæans; which he effected the sooner, because it chanced even then, that Antillas was come before Gythium with four and twenty Gallies of five banks of oars on a side.

About the same time, Thous had not so good speed before Chalcis; by means of Enthymidas, a great and chief man of the City (one who by the might and stronger hand of those that sided with the Romans, had been expelled the City after the coming of T. Quintus and the Embassadors, or delegates) and also of Herodotus of Cannus, a Merchant and a man that in regard of his wealth and riches bare a great side in Chalcis: Thous, I say, sped not so well by their means, notwithstanding that the supposit and part-takers of Enthymidas were well disposed to betray the Town; as Enthymidas did in the surprising and seizing of Demetrius. This Enthymidas from Athens (for there he had made choicero dwell) first came to Thiber, and so from thence went forward to Salsonea. Herodotus abode at Thronium, and not far from thence within the gulf of Malta, he had 2000 footmen, and Thous two hundred horsemen, and about thirty light Caravels. Which Herodotus was commanded to set over into the Island Arantia with six hundred footmen, that from thence, when he perceived once the Land-forces to approach Anle and Enripus, he might cut over to Chalcis. As for themselves, they conducted the rest of the forces in all the halt they could, and who by night journey marched unto Chalcis. Miltis and Xenocides (that had the managing of the affairs in Chalcis, and might do all in all there, now that Enthymidas was banished) remained in Chalcis, and whether they mistrusted somewhat themselves, or had some inkling and intelligence of the matter. I wot not, but afraid they were at first, and had no other hope at all but flight to save themselves: howbeit afterwards when their fear was well allayed and settled, seeing evidently, that not only their own country was betrayed, but also the Roman society abandoned; they plotted in this wise, and entered into a counsil as followeth.

It befell on the very same time, that a solemn anniversary sacrifice was celebrated at Eretria to the honour of Diana Amatoryn; to which solemnity there resorted not only the inhabitants of those places near at hand, but also a number of Carytians. Thither they sent certain Orators, to request and entreat the Eretrians and Carytians, both to take some pity of their estate, considering they were born in the same Island, and also to have some regard to the alliance of the Romans; and not suffer Chalcis to fall into the hands of the Ætolians: who no doubt, if they might get Chalcis, would not be long ere they had Eretria too. Sirly Lords (say they) were the Macedonians, and rigorous, but the Ætolians would be much more unsupportable. These Cities were principally respective to the Romans, whose virtue and prowess in war, whose justice and bounty in victory they had lately experienced; and therefore both States armed the flower and manhood of all their youth and sent them. The Townsmen of Chalcis having committed the guard of their walls to these, went forth themselves with all their forces passed over Enripus, and encamped near Salsonea. From whence place they sent first an herald, and after him Embassadors to the Ætolians, to demand of them. Wherein they had to offended either in word or deed, that their allies and friends should come to molest and assail them so by way of hostility? To whom Thous the General of the Ætolians made this answer: That they were not come to smother and trouble, but to deliver and free them from their servitude under the Romans. For bound they were and tied now with a brighter and more glittering chain indeed, but far heavier, than at what time as they had the garrison of the Macedonians within their Castle. The Chalcidians replied against and inferred, that they neither were in bondage, nor needed at all the garrison of any. And thus the Embassadors departed from the party, and returned to their own people. Thous and the Ætolians, whose whole and only hope was to come upon them on a sudden and surprise them at unawares, returned home again as they came, being not able to maintain open war, nor to assail a City so well fortified both by sea and land. Enthymidas being advertised that his country-men lay in camp at Salsonea, and that the Ætolians were dislodged and gone, retired himself also from Thiber to Arantia. And Herodotus likewise, after he had wittily and with great longings expected from Antiochus certain daies together, to see some signal (but in vain) sent out a pinnace or brigantine, to know what the cause might be of such stay; and understanding that the enterprise was given over by his competitors and fellows in the plot, he returned to Thronium from whence he came.

Quintus likewise having intelligence of these occurrences, as he sailed with his fleet from Cornith, encountered Emmesus in Enripus near Chalcis. And thought good it was between them that Emmesus the King should leave at Chalcis five hundred footmen in garrison, and himself go directly to Athens; and Quintus kept on his way to Demetrius whether he intended, supposing, that the deliverance of Chalcis would make somewhat to induce the Macedonians to embrace again the society of the Romans. And to the end that those persons in Demetrius who sided with him might have some forces for their defence, he wrote unto Emmesus the Pretor of the Thebans, to put the youth in arms; and the six Villius before unto Demetrius to send their Ambassadors, not minding otherwise to give the attempt, unless some part of them inclined to respect the Ætolian society. Villius entered the mouth of the haven with a five banked Gallies. Thither ran the the whole multitude flocking unto him. And Villius demanded of them, whether they had rather that he came to them as to friends or enemies? Unto whom Enthymidas the Magistrarch, answered, that he was come unto his friends: but he would to him forbear the haven, and suffer the Magistrates to be at peace and liberty, and to beware that under a pretence of parle, he did not follicit and disquiet the multitude. After this there was no farther talk and speech between them but plain debate and altercation whiles Villius the Roman blamed and challenged the Magistrates, as unthankful persons, and forewarned them of the miseries and calamities that hung over their heads; and again the multitude cried out aloud, and accused as well the Senat as Quintus. Thus Villius without doing any good, returned to Quintus. But Quintus having dispatched a messenger to the Pretor, that he should reduce home his forces, retired himself again by sea to Cornith.

The affairs of Greece thus interlaced and blended with the Roman, have carried me away as it were out of my lists: not for that they were necessary and important to be written, but only because they were material to the cause of the war against Antiochus. After the Consuls were elected (for there I began my digression) L. Quintus and Cn. Domitius, the Consuls went into their several provinces, Quintus in Liguria and Domitius against the Boii. As for the Boii, they held themselves quiet, yet, and the whole body of their Senat with their children, their exstains also with their Cavalry, to the number in all of fifteen hundred, yielded themselves to the Consul. But the territory of the Ligurians was overrun and waited, and some fortresses won: whereby not only there were prizes got of all sorts, and prisoners taken, but also diverse captives, as well citizens as allies were recovered out of the enemies hand. This very year a Colony was planted at Vidobona by an act of Senat and Commons: and there went thither three thousand and seven hundred footmen, and three hundred horsemen. The Triumvirs, who had the placing of them, were Q. Naevius, M. Minucius, and M. Furius Crassipes. Every footman was endued with fifteen acres of land, and the horsemen with twice as much. It was a territory held last in the tenure of the Brutians, and they had conquered it first from the Greeks.
